COMMISSION.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith: To Our right trusty and well-beloved Councillors Henry Labouchere and Sir John Patteson, Knight, and Our trusty and well-beloved George Cornewall Lewis, Esquire, Greeting: Whereas We have deemed it expedient that a Commission should issue to inquire into the existing state of the Corporation of the City of London: Know ye that We, reposing great trust and confidence in your zeal, ability, and discretion, have nominated, constituted, and appointed, and do by these presents nominate, constitute, and appoint you, the said Henry Labouchere, Sir John Patteson, and George Cornewall Lewis, to inquire into the existing state of the Corporation of the City of London, and to collect information respecting its constitution, order, and government. And We do hereby enjoin you to inquire and collect information respecting the rights, privileges, powers, jurisdictions, Civil and Criminal, of the said Corporation, and the Administration of Justice within the same, its Prisons and Police, and also into the mode of electing and appointing the different Members of the said Corporation and its different Officers, and also into the state, rights and privileges of the Freemen and Liverymen thereof, and also into the nature, amount, and quality of the property of the said Corporation, and into the nature and amount of its Income and Revenue from whatever source derived, and into the management and expenditure of the same, and into all other matters and things in any way relating to the said Corporation concerning which you shall think it necessary to inquire for Our full and complete information in this behalf: And We do further enjoin you to consider whether any measures may be necessary to make better provision for the future Government of the said City of London, and to report to Us the result of such consideration: And, for the better discovery of the truth in the premises, We do, by these presents, give and grant to you, or any two or more of you, full power and authority to call before you, or any two or more of you, such or so many of the Officers of the said Corporation, and such other persons as you shall judge necessary, by whom you may be the better informed of the truth in the premises, and to inquire of the premises and every part thereof by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever: And We do hereby give and grant unto you, or any two or more of you, full power and authority, when the same shall appear to be requisite, to administer an Oath or Oaths to any person or persons whatsoever to be examined before you, or any two or more of you, touching or concerning the premises: And We do also give and grant to you, or any two or more of you, full power and authority to cause all and singular the Officers belonging to the said Corporation to bring and produce upon Oath before you, or any two or more of you, all and singular Charters, Rolls, Records, Orders, Deeds, Books, Papers, or other writings belonging to the said Corporation, or to any of the said Officers of the Corporation as such Officers, touching or concerning the premises: And Our further will and pleasure is that you, or any two or more of you, upon due examination of the premises, do and shall, within the space of twelve calendar months after the date of this Our Commission, certify unto Us in writing, under your hands and seals respectively, what you shall find touching or concerning the premises upon such inquiry as aforesaid: And We further will and command, and by these presents ordain, that this Our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you Our Commissioners, or any two or more of you, shall and may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment: And We do hereby direct and appoint that you, or any two or more of you, may have liberty to certify your several proceedings from time to time to Us, as the same shall be respectively completed and perfected: And We do hereby command all and singular Our Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, Mayors, Bailiffs, Constables, Officers, Ministers, and all other Our loving subjects whatsoever, as well within liberties as without, that they be assistant to you and each of you in the execution of these presents, and for your assistance in the due execution ot this Our Commission. We do hereby authorise and empower you, or any two or more of you, to appoint a Secretary to this Our Commission, and to attend you, whose service and assistance We require you to use from time to time as occasion may require. In witness whereof We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent. Witness Ourself at Westminster, the Twenty-second day June, in the seventeenth year of Our reign.

By Warrant under the Queen's Sign Manual,

C. ROMILLY.

REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

YOUR Majesty having been graciously pleased to issue a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the 22d day of June 1853, and to nominate constitute, and appoint us, Your Majesty's Commissioners therein-named, "to "inquire into the existing state of the Corporation of the City of London, and "to collect information respecting its constitution, order, and government;" likewise to enjoin us "to inquire and collect information respecting the rights, "privileges, powers, jurisdictions, civil and criminal of the said Corporation, and "the administration of justice within the same, its prisons and police, and also "into the mode of electing and appointing the different members of the said "Corporation and its different officers; and also into the state, rights and privileges "of the freemen and liverymen thereof, and also into the nature, amount, and "quality of the property of the said Corporation and into the nature and amount "of its income and revenue from whatever source derived, and into the "management and expenditure of the same, and into all other matters and things "in any way relating to the said Corporation concerning which we should think "it necessary to inquire for Your Majesty's full and complete information in this "behalf," and further to enjoin us "to consider whether any measures may be "necessary to make better provision for the future Government of the said "City of London, and to report to Your Majesty the result of such consideration."

We, Your Majesty's Commissioners, having made due inquiry into these matters, in the execution of Your Majesty's commands, now humbly beg leave to report the nature and extent of our investigation, and the conclusions at which we have arrived.

We lost no time, after the receipt of Your Majesty's Commission, in informing the Lord Mayor of the nature of the inquiry which we were ordered to institute, and we received from the Town Clerk, Mr. Serjeant Merewether, a letter offering, on the part of the Corporation of the City of London, to furnish us with all such information, both oral and documentary, as would assist us in the performance of our duty. Having procured all such parliamentary papers and other authentic documents as were likely to throw light upon the subjects referred to us, and having especially referred to the second report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales, presented in 1837, which relates exclusively to London and Southwark,* we proceeded to the examination of witnesses on the first of November last. The course which we adopted, was to receive in the first instance the evidence of persons who condemned the constitution of the Corporation of London, or impugned its administration; who had complaints to make against any specific acts of its officers; or who had suggestions to offer for the improvement of the Corporation, either in its form or management. When this class of evidence had been completed, we examined all the principal officers of the Corporation, and other of its leading members. As the reporters of the public press, and other persons were admitted during our examinations, and as facilities were afforded to the City authorities for obtaining, day by day, authentic notes of the evidence which we received, the witnesses connected with the Corporation were fully apprised of the statements which had been made to us by the previous witnesses, and were thus enabled to afford such explanations relative to the system of the Corporation or the conduct of its governors and officers, as seemed to them requisite. We think it right to state that we found the utmost readiness in all quarters to assist us in the execution of Your Majesty's Commission, by the communication of facts and suggestions. This readiness was manifested, not only by independent witnesses, who were unconnected with the Corporation, but also by the governing members of the Corporation, and by its officers, all of whom willingly came forward to describe their several duties, and to state the facts respectively falling under their cognizance.

Having carefully considered and compared the statements and opinions which have been thus brought before us, we will proceed to set forth, in compliance with the injunctions of Your Majesty's Commission, the views which we have been led to form upon the existing state of the Corporation of the City of London, its constitution, order, and government, its jurisdictions, civil and criminal, its prisons and police, the mode of electing its members and officers, the rights of its freemen and liverymen, its property, revenue, and expenditure; and lastly, to state our opinion "whether any measures may be "necessary to make better provision for the future government of the said City "of London."

In reporting the results of our inquiries into the Corporation of London, we propose first to explain the peculiarity of its position as distinguished from other municipal corporations in England, and afterwards to describe its existing constitution and administration; to which we shall annex such suggestions for the amelioration of defects in the system as appear to us to be indicated by our investigation. In describing the existing constitution and administration of the Corporation of London, we shall abstain from repeating those facts which were laboriously ascertained and accurately set forth by the Municipal Commissioners in their report of 1837, already cited. We shall likewise confine ourselves to those institutions which form a part of the Corporation of London, or are necessarily connected with it, and therefore we shall say nothing upon the Trading Companies, which are not constituent portions of the Corporation.

The first report of the Commissioners for inquiring into the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales was presented to Parliament in March 1835; and in a subsequent part of the same year the important Act of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, intituled "An Act to provide for the Regulation of "Municipal Corporations of England and Wales," founded upon this Report, received the Royal assent (9 Sept. 1835). The first report of the Commissioners did not extend to the Corporation of London; and accordingly in the Act which was founded on that report it is not included among the boroughs enumerated in the schedules, to which alone the Act applies. The Commissioners did not, as we have before mentioned, report upon the City of London until the year 1837, when they made it the subject of their second report. No legislative measure was, however, founded upon this report, and indeed the Commissioners themselves appear to intimate their opinion that the defects which they pointed out might be effectually remedied by the Common Council, without recourse to Parliament. "As we are commanded" (they say) "by the terms of Your Majesty's Commission, to collect information respecting "the defects in the constitution of the municipal corporations, we shall point "out what appear to us to be the principal defects in that of the Corporation "of London. It is to be recollected that with respect to many of these, the "powers possessed by the Common Council enable the Corporation, if so "disposed, to apply remedies to a great extent without the assistance of the "legislature. We mention this, not with the view of entering into a discussion, "which we consider not to be within the authority of our Commission, as to "the remedies proper to be applied; but because the circumstance that the "remedy is within the reach of the Corporation itself gives a peculiar "character to the continuance of the defect."

Since the year 1837, in which the second report of the municipal Commissioners was presented, an Act has been passed relative to the City Police (2 & 3 Vict. c. 94.); also an Act regulating elections in the City of London, (12 & 13 Vict. c. 94.), an Act providing for the sanitary improvement of the City, (11 & 12 Vict. c. 163), and other enactments have been made, by which the Corporation of London was affected. Various changes have likewise been made since that year by Acts of the Common Council, but no substantial or systematic reform of the Corporation of London has been accomplished, either by the legislation of Parliament, or by measures of the Common Council, since the presentation of the report of the Municipal Commissioners in 1837.

The operation of the General Municipal Act of 1835 may be described as twofold: first, it reformed the constitution of all the enumerated boroughs; secondly, with respect to many of them, it enlarged their districts by advancing their boundaries. This latter object was effected with respect to ninety-three boroughs, by the adoption of the boundaries of the Parliamentary Boroughs, fixed by the Boundary Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 64. With respect to the boundaries of boroughs, prior to the Act of 1835, the Municipal Commissioners make in their first report, the following statement: "In most important towns "the suburbs have extended themselves far beyond the limits of the corporate "authority. The population of the city and county of Bristol is 59,000; the "suburbs beyond the city contain an additional population of 45,000. The "population of the city of Rochester is only 9,891; the district immediately "adjoining it, including the town of Chatham, comprises nearly 22,000 persons. "The city of Carlisle contains 8,356 persons; the suburbs are of as great extent, "and contain a population of 10,713. At Hull, the municipal borough contains "15,996; the county of the town, including the borough, 32,958; the suburbs, "which are beyond the jurisdiction of the borough magistrates, contain 20,000 "more." (p. 30.)

The principle adopted by the Boundary Commissioners with respect to the parliamentary boroughs was to recommend the inclusion, within the new boundary, of those parts of the town which had been built since the original limits had been fixed. In their report to Lord Melbourne, dated 10th February 1832, they state that "they adopted as their guide the "principle of including the whole of the modern town within the new "boundary." (Sess. Paper, 36, 1832.) The borough of Liverpool and the city of Bristol, in both of which the extension of the area of the parliamentary borough to a considerable distance beyond the old limits was recommended by the Commissioners, may serve as examples of their procedure in this respect. The nature of the changes proposed for the city of Bristol is clearly explained in the annexed statement, extracted from the report on that town.

TABLE showing the PRESENT CONDITION of the PRESENT CITY of BRISTOL, and of the PROPOSED BOROUGH—(1831-2.)

Bristol.	Population, 1831.	Number of Houses.
City - - - - -	59,034	9,700
Out Parish of St. Philip and St. Jacob - -	15,777	3,022
Out Parish of St. James and St. Paul - -	4,495	967
Clifton - - - - -	12,032	1,703
Part of Bedminster, near City - -	12,000	2,200
Bristol within proposed boundary - -	104,338	17,842

According to this statement, the original city of Bristol contained a number of persons and of houses little more than half of those contained in the enlarged district formed by the Commissioners, which was intended to include the then existing town and its suburbs. The adoption of the limits fixed by the Boundary Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 64. in the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, had therefore the effect of rendering the boundaries of the municipal, as well as the parliamentary borough co-extensive with the existing town, as enlarged since the original area of the municipal borough had been determined.

Now, as the City of London is not enumerated in the schedules to the Municipal Corporations Act, neither its internal constitution, nor its boundaries have been affected by the provisions of that Act. The position of the Corporation of London is indeed so peculiar as to render its comprehension in a general measure of municipal regulation a matter of extreme difficulty, and to point it out as a fit subject for special and separate legislation. The antiquity, extent, and importance of its privileges, the long series of its charters, the large amount of its revenues, its metropolitan position, and its historical associations, combine to give it a character different from that of any other municipal borough. It may be added that the continued predominance of the popular element in the formation of its governing body furnished a reason in 1835 for excepting it from the Municipal Corporations Act; seeing that one of the principal defects which that Act was intended to remedy, was the practical exclusion of the principle of popular election from the government of the borough, and the accumulation of power in the hands of a small body of persons. The Commissioners state in their general report of 1835, "The most common and most striking defect in "the constitution of the municipal corporations of England and Wales, is "that the corporate bodies exist independently of the communities among "which they are found. The corporations look upon themselves, and are "considered by the inhabitants, as separate and exclusive bodies; they have "powers and privileges within the towns and cities from which they are "named, but in most places all identity of interest between the corporation "and the inhabitants has disappeared." From the defect described in this passage the Corporation of London has for many years been exempt. The manner in which the Common Council is elected has produced to a great extent an identity of interests between the governing municipal body and the existing municipal community, and has secured to the latter a council representing their general opinions and feelings. The Municipal Commissioners particularly advert to the Common Council of London as distinguishing that Corporation from the close corporations which then prevailed throughout the country.

First Report, p. 32.

First Report, p. 36.

But, although the constitution of the Corporation of London has secured to the inhabitants of the City a fair representation of their interests, that representation is confined to the persons dwelling within the narrow area of the City proper, and does not extend to the population of the larger portion of the metropolis. The boundaries of the City of London were fixed at an early period of our history, and there is no record of their having ever been enlarged so as to follow the growing size of the town, and to include the houses added from time to time, to the ancient City, and forming with it continuous lines of streets.

Second Report, p. 2. Merewether, 4788-92.

The area of the metropolis is more or less arbitrary, inasmuch as London cannot be said to be recognized by the law as one town, and its boundaries have never been fixed either by enactment or custom. Different metropolitan districts have indeed been appointed for special purposes: thus the metropolitan district fixed for the Commissioners of Police, the metropolitan district of the Commissioners of Sewers, under the Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, and the metropolitan district of the Postmaster-General differ from one another, as well as from the metropolis according to the limits adopted by the Registrar-General and used by him for the late census.

The earliest formation of a metropolitan district for statistical purposes arose from the bills of mortality prepared and issued by the company of parish clerks. London, within the bills of mortality, was formed of the parishes included in these lists, with successive augmentations from 1603 to 1817. The metropolis, as returned by Mr. Rickman in the census abstracts of 1801 to 1831, consisted of this district, with some additional parishes. Since that time the metropolis of the Registrar-General has been used for the census and other statistical objects. The metropolis recognized by the Registrar-General is formed of thirty-six registration districts, extending from Hampstead in the north to Wandsworth in the south, and from Stepney in the east to Chelsea in the west. Its greatest dimensions measured in these directions are 11 and 15½ miles. It is according to this division that the census of the metropolis for the year 1851 has been arranged; and we append to this report a statement showing the area, number of inhabited houses, population since 1801, and assessment for each of these thirty-six districts, as constituting the metropolis according to the Registrar-General. It appears from this statement that the entire metropolis within these limits contains an area of 78,029 acres, with 305,933 inhabited houses; that its population was 958,863 in 1801, and 2,362,236 in 1851, having more than doubled in the last fifty years; and that the value of its property assessed to the poor rate in 1852 was 9,964,348*l*. It appears, further, that the area of the City of London proper is 723 acres; that it contained 14,693 inhabited houses in 1851; that its population was 128,833 in 1801, and 129,128 in 1851; and that its assessment was 953,110*l*. in 1852. The relation therefore of the City of London proper to the entire metropolis, measured by these facts, stands thus :—

	Entire Metropolis.	City of London.
Area in acres	78,029	723
Population in 1801	958,863	128,833
Population in 1851	2,362,236	129,128
Inhabited houses in 1851	305,933	14,693
Assessment in 1852	£9,964,348	£953,110

It will be observed that, whereas the population of the entire metropolis has more than doubled in the last fifty years, the population of the City of London has remained nearly stationary. This difference is owing to the fact that the City of London was covered with houses, and fully peopled at the beginning of this century; whereas, in the outskirts of the town, a great addition of new houses and a corresponding increase of population has taken place since that period. This difference will be more forcibly shown if we compare with the City some of the outlying parishes, in which the great increase of buildings in this century has taken place. Thus in the following districts the population has consider ably more than doubled since 1801 :—

Districts.	Population in 1801.	Population in 1851.
Pancras	31,779	166,956
Islington	10,212	95,329
Stepney	34,909	110,775
Poplar	8,278	47,162
Lambeth	27,985	139,325
Newington	14,847	64,816
Total	148,475	724,367

As the metropolis grows, not in its central portion but at its extremities, by adding, as it were, successive annular portion to its area, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the City, which lies at its centre, forms in successive years a constantly smaller and smaller portion of the entire metropolis, as measured by its population. Thus in 1801 the population of the City was about a seventh part of the population of the metropolis; whereas in 1851 it was only an eighteenth part. A similar remark, though probably in a less degree, applies to the comparative amounts of the rateable property. As to the area of the City, it forms an insignificant portion of the surface of the entire metropolitan district, being only a 108th part. The importance of the City of London in relation to the rest of the metropolis arises, not from its area or its population, or even its rateable property, but from its central position, and from the magnitude of the mercantile and pecuniary transactions which are daily carried on within its limits.

From this statement it results that the area included within the boundaries of the City of London forms only a small portion of the entire metropolitan district. It is, however, the only part of the metropolis which has a municipal corporation. The city of Westminster, Marylebone, Finsbury, and the Tower Hamlets north of the Thames, and Southwark, Lambeth, and Greenwich south of the Thames, are indeed parliamentary boroughs, returning members to the House of Commons, and they are all situated within the limits of the metropolis; but they are not municipal boroughs, nor do they possess any municipal organization. In all that large part of London which lies without the City, those functions of government which are ordinarily performed by municipal authorities are provided for either by general statutes, irregularly reinforced or modified by local Acts, or by parochial institutions; or, lastly, in some cases, by the interference of the executive government.

The whole district of the City proper lies to the north of the Thames; a certain connection, however, subsists between the Corporation of London and a portion of the present parliamentary borough of Southwark, the exact nature of which is described in the report of 1837 and in the evidence annexed to our report, but which is of so limited an extent as to be little more than nominal. The Corporation hold courts leet for Southwark, the steward of which is appointed by the Court of Aldermen; they likewise hold quarter sessions four times a year, at which, however, no business is transacted; they appoint the judge and prothonotary of the Borough Court, and also the coroner and high bailiff. Second Report, pp. 2 & 217. See Corner, 2180. Corner, 2174. Pritchard, 4133. Pocock, 4153. Sturmy, 4167. Stevens, 4173. Corner, 2186 221.

The Municipal Corporations Act has now been the law of the land for nearly twenty years; all the important municipal corporations in England are subject to its provisions, and it appears on the whole to have been attended with beneficial effects, and to have given satisfaction to the country. Upon a consideration of these facts, we have come to the conclusion that, in revising the constitution of the Corporation of London, it will be advisable to apply to it the leading provisions of that statute, making, at the same time, due allowance for those peculiar circumstances already adverted to, which distinguish the London Corporation from other corporations, and which render a difference of institutions, in certain respects, expedient.

In laying down this principle, however, for our guidance, we are desirous of limiting its application to the constitution of the Corporation. That portion of the Municipal Corporations Act which consists in an extension of the boundaries of the borough so as to comprehend all portions of the town and its suburbs lying beyond the old limits, seems to us inapplicable to the case of the metropolis. If the procedure of the legislature in the Municipal Corporations Act were taken as a precedent, absolutely and without discrimination, in reforming the London Corporation, it would be necessary, not only to alter its constitution, but to advance the present boundaries of the City until they surrounded the entire metropolis; a process by which an area of 723 acres would be converted into an area of 78,029 acres,—by which a population of 129,128 would be converted into a population of 2,362,236.—and an assessment of 953,110*l.* would be converted into an assessment of 9,964,348*l.* A change of this magnitude would not only alter the whole character of the City Corporation, but it would, as it seems to us, defeat the main purpose of municipal institutions. London, taken in its full extent, is (as it has with literal truth been called) a province covered with houses; its diameter from north to south and from east to west is so great that the persons living at its furthest extremities have few interests in common; its area is so large that each inhabitant is in general acquainted only with his own quarter, and has no minute knowledge of other parts of the town. Hence the two first conditions for municipal government, minute local knowledge and community of interests, would be wanting, if the whole of London were, by an extension of the present boundaries of the City, placed under a single municipal corporation. The enormous numbers of the population and the vast magnitude of the interests which would be under the care of the municipal body would likewise render its administration a work of great difficulty. It may be added that the bisection of London by the Thames furnishes an additional reason for not placing the whole town under a single municipal corporation. All roads, streets, sewers, gas-pipes, and water-pipes, in short, all means of superficial or subterraneous communication which run in continuous lines from north to south, are necessarily stopped by the river. Many of these are directly or indirectly the subjects of municipal control; and therefore a municipal body which governed the metropolis both north and south of the Thames would find that the continuity of its operations was, in many respects, broken off by natural circumstances. These considerations appear to us decisive against the expediency of placing the whole of the metropolis under a single municipal corporation, without adverting to those more general questions of public policy which naturally suggest themselves in connection with the subject.

It will nevertheless appear in the course of this Report, that the present character of the London Corporation, its exclusive possession of powers of municipal government in the metropolis, and the functions applicable to the entire metropolis with which it has been partially invested, render it necessary for us to consider the best means of extending municipal institutions to the rest of the metropolitan district, as well as of securing that joint action between different portions of the metropolis for certain specified purposes, which ought, we think, to exist for the common advantage. We shall, therefore, return hereafter to this subject, confining ourselves, however, within the limits pointed out by the terms of our Commission.

Before we advert in detail to the constitution of the Corporation, we desire to draw attention to the character and state of those documentary authorities which, to a great extent, form the legal basis of that constitution. The present legal relations of the Corporation of London are indeed mainly founded upon custom and prescription; but custom and prescription must have some legal beginning, and long usage is the evidence by which they are proved. We find also the Corporation of London in possession of a body of charters, dating from a very remote period, and reaching in a continuous series down to the 15th year of George the Second. Upon them the Corporation found many of their most important rights or privileges.

These charters were so fully abstracted and commented upon by the Municipal Commissioners in their report of 1837, that it is unnecessary for us to do more than refer to their observations (which will be found in pages 5—25 of the abstract of evidence given at the conclusion of their report), so far as regards the contents of those charters, which may still be considered as in force, and as having any practical bearing upon the constitution, rights, and working of the Corporation. They are in number one hundred and twenty; the earliest of which is one granted by William the Conqueror about the year 1070, the last is one of the 15th George the Second. It has been suggested to us that these are not all in force at the present day; that many of them have been surrendered; that some were granted for temporary purposes only, and have long since expired; and that many important rights claimed by the Corporation are destitute of legal foundation, as resting upon charters which have ceased to be in force. In the case of any particular right or particular charter, it is certainly possible that legal questions of this kind, subtle and difficult in their nature, might arise. The evidence before us does not enable us to say with certainty whether legal questions could often be successfully disputed with the Corporation; but it is clear from that evidence that the present condition of the Corporation charters is far from satisfactory, and leads in practice to considerable inconvenience, and occasionally even to great hardship on individuals.

The City of London has no governing charter; in which respect it differs from many of the English Corporations. It is true that the great Inspeximus Charter of Charles II. recites and includes almost all the former ones, but it gives no explanation of them; it collects them, but does nothing towards their interpretation. There is no authoritative exposition of the multifarious rights and privileges, many of which are said to be founded on the language of these charters. Hence arises considerable uncertainty as to the meaning of the charters themselves. A document of the simplest and shortest kind may be put forward as the legal basis of rights the most various and important; and the apparently simple and obvious meaning of a charter may be controlled by usages affecting its import. There are likewise difficulties inherent in the documents themselves, which render it desirable that the whole subject should be put upon a clearer and more satisfactory footing. The brevity of the ancient charters, the antiquity of the language in which they are couched, and the vagueness resulting from the use of concise and general expressions, make it often a hard matter accurately to define their meaning. They refer often to a state of things which has wholly passed away, and their language has therefore to be explained often through the doubtful medium of antiquarian research. It is also often uncertain what charters and what portions of charters are actually in force; how far a subsequent charter repeals or interferes with the provisions of a former charter; a question depending upon the intentions of those who gave and received the charter many centuries ago, and obviously full of doubt and obscurity. There is also the further question as to the alteration effected in the authority of the customs and charters of the City by general Acts of Parliament in which the City is not specially named. The customs of the City having been solemnly confirmed by Act of Parliament have themselves the force of an Act of Parliament, and we have been told in evidence by witnesses peculiarly conversant with the subject, that the highest legal authorities are divided as to the effect of general Acts of Parliament within the City, when they conflict with the City customs and do not repeal them by express enactment.

The following extract from the evidence of Serjeant Merewether, the Town Clerk of the Corporation, will show the uncertainty with which this question is surrounded, and the consequent inducement to litigation which the present state of things creates:

"So far as the point may be considered as resting upon decisions now, the view of the Courts would be, that general words in an Act of Parliament do override the customs of the City?—I should think a proposition of that kind would involve many distinctions. In some cases it might be so, and in some it might not. I think it would be very difficult to extract from the cases a general proposition either one way or the other.

"The question would very much depend upon the wording of the particular Act, and the nature of the particular custom?—Precisely so.

Qu. 5341-3. See also Pulling, 1899, 1900.

"It would be open to argument in each case as it arose?—Yes."

From this complicated state of charters and of local laws arise, as we have said, occasionally, cases of considerable individual hardship. It appears to be the practice of the Corporation of London to refuse access to the documents upon which they found claims, even of wide extent; and further, to avoid disclosing to any one who may resist such claims the legal grounds on which they are made, except under the compulsion of a court of law. A standing order of the Common Council lays it down that "no officer of this Court "shall be at liberty to show, lay open, or expose any of the books, "papers, or records of the Corporation to any person not a member of "the Corporation, without leave or licence of this Court." The proceedings in the case of the Corporation of London v. Combe & Co., an account of which will be found in the evidence annexed to our Report, illustrates the operation of this rule. In this case the Corporation of London instituted a suit against Messrs. Combe, Delafield & Co. to enforce their right of metage over corn landed by the defendants in the Port of London. The defendants filed a bill of discovery, to obtain an inspection of certain documents in the possession of the Corporation; the first and the second answers to this bill of discovery were excepted to as insufficient, and a third answer was put in. An order for the production of the documents was afterwards made by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce; but the Corporation appealed against the order to the Lord Chancellor. Lord Lyndhurst, then Lord Chancellor, confirmed Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce's order; but the Corporation further appealed from Lord Lyndhurst's decision to the House of Lords. The defendants in this case were wealthy brewers, able, if they thought fit, to carry on a long and expensive contest with the Corporation of London; but if any defendant of moderate means were brought by them into court, and if he believed that his defence depended upon obtaining access to documents in their posession, but which they withheld from the public, it is manifest that he could not prudently resist litigation conducted in this spirit. The right claimed in this case was of a very extensive nature, not confined within the boundaries of the City proper, but including the metage of all measurable articles landed on either bank of the Thames from Staines in Middlesex to Yantlet Creek in Kent, a distance by the river of about eighty miles.

It was pointed out to us by the Recorder that Lord Eldon, on one occasion, rebuked a corporation for the voluntary production of their charters, referring to a case where the corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne had lost 7,000*l.* a year by taking this course. There is no doubt that the present state of the City charters, their antiquity, their large number, and the uncertainty as to their interpretation, and their repeal or modification by subsequent charters or Acts of Parliament, may render it the duty of a cautious counsel to advise the City, in all litigated questions, to adhere to the practice which they have hitherto followed, and to treat their charters as the title-deeds of a private proprietor. It appears to us, however, that if in the present state of the City charters their publicity would expose the Corporation to the risk of losing important rights by merely technical objections, and if at the same time litigant parties may be debarred from the knowledge of facts materially affecting their rights, some remedy for this double inconvenience ought to be devised. Upon the subject of the City charters we therefore recommend that if the measures, which it will be our duty to suggest, should become the subject of legislation, and the constitution of the Corporation of London should undergo certain alterations, the Crown, under powers previously conferred by Parliament, should subsequently issue one comprehensive charter to the Corporation of London incorporating and digesting all such provisions of former charters as it might be deemed desirable to retain, and were consistent with the new legislation affecting the City; upon which all preceding charters would be repealed. We further recommend that, if such an incorporating charter as we describe were issued, it should be made public in an authentic shape.

We have alluded to the customs of the City, a subject nearly connected with that of the charters. These customs are numerous and often important; modifying, and in some instances contravening, the ordinary law of the rest of the kingdom. Since the time of Edward IV. the citizens of London have enjoyed the right granted to them by that King of certifying these customs (whenever a dispute arises which involves any of them) ore tenus, by the mouth of the Recorder. The Recorder's certificate is in practice reduced to writing and read by him to the court which has cognizance of the dispute. With a view to the more exact determination of these customs, many of which are certainly salutary and few of which present matter for objection, we would recommend that they should be collected and embodied in the general charter which we have already suggested.

Having made these recommendations upon subjects affecting generally the whole Corporation, we come to the consideration of the position and functions of its chief officers.

Under this department of the subject we may begin by stating that we see no reason for recommending any alteration in the title, station, or general functions of the Lord Mayor, who is the first magistrate of the Corporation. But the mode of his election is not satisfactory. He is elected by the livery of London in Common Hall, who, though their number is large, do not include the whole body of freemen. The exclusion of the freemen who are not liverymen from a participation in the rights now enjoyed by the livery with respect to the election of Corporation officers is open to much objection. The general tenor of the evidence which we have received is unfavourable to the elections in Common Hall, and we see no valid reason for continuing so wide a departure from the system sanctioned by the Municipal Corporations Act as is involved in conferring the election of the chief magistrate of the Corporation upon members of the trading companies, who are not necessarily connected with the City by property, residence, or occupation. Though the election of Mayor is vested in a large constituent body, the choice of the livery is practically restrained within very narrow limits, inasmuch as it is confined to the aldermen, who are twenty-six in number, and, moreover, to such of the aldermen as have served the office of sheriff. In general, moreover, the livery select candidates who had not previously filled the office of Mayor; and the common practice is for them to nominate the two senior aldermen who have not passed the chair. One of the candidates presented by the livery is subsequently selected by the aldermen, each of whom is entitled to vote in this second stage of the election.*

The present mode of electing the Mayor seems to us, therefore, objectionable on two grounds: first, on account of the formation of the constituent body; secondly, on account of the restriction of the choice. We have already stated our opinion that it is desirable to take the system of the General Municipal Act as the guide for reforms in the London Corporation, unless there should be special reasons which render it inapplicable. We therefore suggest that, in accordance with the provisions of the Municipal Act, the election of the Lord Mayor be vested in the Common Council. At the same time, we recommend so far a departure from that Act as, instead of restricting the choice of the Common Council to a member of their own body, to permit them to elect any person qualified to be a common councillor, whether actually a member of the Common Council or not. In this manner, the range of choice will be enlarged, at the same time that the election will be placed in proper hands; and an opportunity will be afforded of electing persons of commercial eminence connected with the City and its interests, who may not have obtained an alderman's gown. We should consider it an advantage if a greater degree of sympathy between the higher class of merchants of London and the Corporation should thus be established than that which now exists, and such as is also found in other great commercial cities; as we are desirous that all classes should combine as much as possible in taking their share in the duties and honours of municipal government. We recommend, likewise, that the person to fill the office of Mayor should be elected by the Common Council, and that no ulterior selection from two candidates be vested in the aldermen.

In conformity with the universal practice in English boroughs, we propose that the Lord Mayor should be a magistrate of the City during his year of office, and for the year succeeding his mayoralty.

We pass to the consideration of the aldermen. Their present numbers, position, and functions appear to us to require considerable modification; but we think there exist sound reasons against applying to London the provisions of the Municipal Reform Act respecting aldermen, without addition or qualification. Nothing would be gained by destroying the direct connection of the aldermen with their wards, which has been stated to us to be productive, in many instances, of considerable advantages, and to which we are unable to see any practical objection. We recommend, therefore, that they should continue to be elected by the burgesses of their wards out of those qualified to be Common Councillors. With regard to the tenure of their office, we recommend that the precedent of the Municipal Corporations Act should be adopted, that they should hold office for six years, but that half their number should go out every third year, and that it should be determined by lot who shall go out of office at the expiration of the first three years after the commencement of the new system of election; any alderman going out of office to be forthwith re-eligible if still qualified to be elected. We further recommend that the aldermen, during their tenure of office, should continue, as at present, to be justices of the peace for the City of London. It is possible that the aldermen, considerably reduced in number (as we shall hereafter recommend), may find the increased duties of the police magistracy to be a burden inconsistent with the efficient discharge of their other municipal functions, and to demand the devotion of too large a portion of their time. In order, therefore, that the Common Council might be enabled to relieve the magisterial services of the aldermen, we would recommend that the provisions of the 99th section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76, with reference to the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in boroughs, should be extended to the City of London.

According to the present constitution of the Corporation, the aldermen exercise certain powers, not merely as justices of the peace and as members of the Common Council, but also as constituting a separate body, entitled the Court of Aldermen.* The powers which are exercised by the Court of Aldermen are either exclusive of those of the Common Council or concurrent with them; but the Court of Aldermen has in no case any power of revising the acts of the Common Council, nor is its assent necessary to any act of the Common Council. Both the Common Council and the Court of Aldermen are, in the main, executive bodies; and in order to promote harmony and unity of action in the Corporation, we recommend that the Court of Aldermen be abolished, and that all the powers which it possesses as a body be transferred to the Common Council. Whatever functions the aldermen discharge as justices of the peace with respect to prisons, or any other similar matters, they would continue to discharge, notwithstanding the abolition of their separate court. This recommendation agrees substantially with one of a series of resolutions passed by the Court of Common Council on the 24th of February, 1854, and transmitted to us by the Corporation; a copy of which is inserted in the appendix.

It appears, from the evidence before us, that the duties of prison inspection and prison management have been performed by the aldermen in a very satisfactory and efficient manner. The new prison at Holloway erected by the Corporation is stated by Captain Williams, one of the inspectors of prisons, to be one of the best within his knowledge; and he speaks very highly of the manner in which the prisons of the City generally are conducted and inspected. Several of the prisons themselves require improvement; and there are certain endowments connected with them, left at various times for the benefit of prisoners confined therein, and amounting in the whole to about 1,600*l.* a year, the distribution of which, though not at all complained of, as far as the aldermen who distribute them are concerned, is yet open to abuse and leads to mischief, from causes beyond the control of those who manage the distribution. It appears also that these charities are now unfairly distributed among the prisoners, owing to the strictly local character of many of the bequests. Thus, for instance, the prisoners from Middlesex imprisoned in the City prisons, although forming far the largest proportion of the total number of prisoners, are comparatively disregarded in the distribution of the charities, from the circumstance that they were left in many cases by citizens of London, for the benefit of persons imprisoned from the City itself. This leads occasionally in practice to the distribution of an unreasonable and excessive sum among a small number of prisoners, while a much larger number of prisoners who want it, and to whom it might be of real service, though in the same prison, are excluded from the benefit. We think that the visiting justices should have a discretionary power in the apportionment of these alms, subject to the control of the Secretary of State, who should be empowered to allow or to frame rules upon this subject, within which the discretion of the visiting justices should be exercised. The visiting justices should be, as at present, the aldermen, with whom we propose to associate the judicial officers of the city, and any one or more stipendiary magistrates who may be appointed in pursuance of the power which we have already recommended to be given to the Common Council.

The appointment of the recorder, which is now vested in the Court of Aldermen, would, under the general recommendation given above, be transferred to the Common Council. The City of London has for many centuries elected its own magistrates, and of late years, at least, this privilege appears to have been well used. The present judicial officers are spoken of by every one who has given evidence upon the subject in the highest and most respectful terms. It does not appear to us, therefore, that there is any ground for suggesting that an important privilege, justly and highly prized by the citizens of London, should be taken from them, and vested, according to the precedent of other boroughs, in the Crown. But there is no reason why the aldermen, who will form only a portion of the new Common Council, should retain the privilege of solely electing the recorder. The Common Council at present elect the common serjeant and the judge of the Sheriffs' Court. We propose that it should, for the future, also elect the recorder. The various magistrates' clerks are at present appointed by the Court of Aldermen. It seems fit that this mode of appointment should continue substantially unchanged, and that they should be appointed by the aldermen as magistrates. The officers of the various prisons in the City are, in like manner, at present appointed by the Court of Aldermen. We think the appointment of these officers should be still exercised by the alderman as visiting justices.

We intimated that we were about to recommend a reduction in the number of the aldermen, as well as the abolition of their separate court. We have already suggested that the election of aldermen by wards should be retained, but the present division of wards is inconvenient and unequal, and was remarked upon as defective by the Municipal Commissioners in their report of 1837 (p. 14). We can only suggest generally the principles on which the existing wards should be remodelled; inasmuch as, for the purpose of making a proper re-adjustment, local inquiries must be gone into, and questions of boundary must be considered, which do not fall within the scope of our Commission. We recommend that, as far as possible, the area and population of the wards be made equal, and we do not apprehend, from the evidence which we have heard upon this subject, that this would be attended with any insuperable difficulty. The charities left to the inhabitants of a particular ward have been suggested to us as creating a difficulty in the way of an alteration, but, unless Parliament thought fit to extend the sphere of their operations, they might still go to those who inhabited what would be known as the old ward, in the same manner as endowments left to the inhabitants of a diocese, which has been altered since the date of the endowment, are without difficulty administered in practice for the benefit of the old diocese. Upon the best consideration we can give to the subject, it appears to us that the City of London might properly be divided into a number of wards not less than twelve nor more than sixteen. We propose that each ward should send one alderman and five councilmen to the Common Council. The number of the Common Council would thus be reduced to something between seventy and one hundred, a number, as we think, abundantly sufficient, and not open to the objections which have been justly made to the present number of that body, now consisting of twenty-six aldermen and two hundred and six common councilmen, in all two hundred and thirty-two members. Under the Municipal Corporations Act, the number of members of the Town Council, including both Aldermen and Councillors, cannot exceed 64.

The number of members usually appointed to serve on each of the committees of the Common Council seems to us likewise inconveniently large. A diminution in the numbers of the entire body would probably be followed by a diminution in the numbers of members on the committees, a change which we regard as desirable. The practice of making a pecuniary allowance to the members of the committees for their attendances ought likewise, in our opinion, to be discontinued.

It being assumed that the members of the Common Council would, inclusively of the aldermen, continue to be elected by wards, we have next to consider by what constituency they are to be elected. The voters in the ward elections must now fulfil two conditions: first, they must be freemen of the Corporation; secondly, they must be occupiers of premises within the ward, rated at not less than 10*l.* per annum, and residing within seven miles of the City.* The freedom of the City is acquired by patrimony (or inheritance from parents) by apprenticeship, or by redemption. Before the year 1835, no person could be admitted to the freedom of the City who did not belong to one of the trading companies; but by a resolution of the Court of Common Council of 17th March 1835, this condition was repealed, and it is no longer necessary that a freeman should be a liveryman or member of one of the City companies.† At present, therefore, the system which governs the elections of the Corporation is wholly anomalous; two elective bodies exist, which might by possibility be independent of each other. In the Common Hall elections, none vote but liverymen of companies, who, though they must be freemen, need not occupy premises within the City. At the wardmote elections, none vote but ten pound occupiers within the ward, who, though they must be freemen, need not be members of companies. It is therefore a conceivable case that the majority of the voters in Common Hall might not be entitled to vote in the wards, and that a majority of the voters in the wards might not be entitled to vote in Common Hall; so that one set of interests might predominate in the election of the Lord Mayor, and another in the election of aldermen and common councilmen. The anomaly of the present state of things would be removed by the entire abolition of the elections in Common Hall, which we have already recommended with respect to the Lord Mayor, and which we shall presently recommend with respect to the other officers; but although the constitution of the Corporation would thus be rendered consistent, we think that the qualifications for the wardmote voters are susceptible of improvement. The present restriction of the wardmote suffrage to persons who have acquired the freedom of the City by patrimony, apprenticeship, or redemption has, in our opinion, the effect of excluding many persons qualified by their respectability and their interests to be wardmote voters, and therefore of narrowing the constituency, without elevating its character. We therefore propose that this restriction, which is repugnant to the system of voting prescribed by the Municipal Corporations Act, be abolished, and that every one who has occupied for a twelvemonth any tenement within the ward rated to the police rate at 10*l.* per annum and upwards, should have a vote in all ward elections, without any additional condition. The condition of residence within seven miles of the city which is now required, and still more the condition of residence for three years within the borough, or within seven miles of it, which is required by the Municipal Corporations Act, seem to us unsuited to the special circumstances of the London Corporation. The number of persons who are connected with the City by the relations of business, and who occupy premises in it, although they do not reside within it, and often not within seven miles of it, is considerable. These persons are in general, by their intelligence and position in life, well qualified to be municipal electors, and their connexion with the City is sufficient to give them an interest in its welfare. We likewise propose to retain the existing pecuniary qualification of 10*l.* per annum, which, on account of the high value of house property in the City, will exclude no respectable tenements. We may remark that the franchise which we propose for the wards agrees with that contained in a Bill which originated with the Corporation itself, and was presented to Parliament in the year 1852, but was opposed by the trading companies and thrown out by the Select Committee of the House of Commons, to which it was referred. The same qualification is likewise adopted in the recent resolutions of the Court of Common Council. The existing qualification of freedom for a common councilman seems to us no longer applicable, and we propose to substitute for it a qualification similar to that prescribed for town councillors in boroughs having four or more wards, by the Municipal Corporations Act (S. 28); that is to say, the possession of real or personal estate of £1000, or being rated to the local rates upon an annual value of not less than £30.

The recent Act requires that the voter's name should be in the parliamentary register of voters for the City of London; hence it adds the condition of residence within seven miles of the City, which did not previously exist.

Complaints have been made to us as to the defectiveness of the lists of voters, to be signed by the Alderman of the ward, which are required by the recent Act of 12 & 13 Vict., c. 94.; but we believe that the defects adverted to have arisen from the fact that the freedom of the City is a necessary element in the qualification of the voter; and in the qualification which we have proposed this element is omitted.

Acland 116, and see Merewether, 5051.

We propose that the Common Council, with reduced numbers, and an enlarged and improved constituent body, be entrusted with the election of all the superior paid officers of the Corporation. This is the scheme of the General Municipal Act, and we see no reason for thinking that it is unsuited to the circumstances of the City.

We have already suggested that the election of the Lord Mayor, of the recorder, and of other officers at present elected in Common Hall and the Court of Aldermen, should be transferred to the Common Council; all such elections as are at present in the Common Council should, we think, be retained in the hands of that body. The general recommendation we have given is intended to include the sheriffs, chamberlain, and any other officers whose places may still be retained under the amended system, and who are now elected by the livery in Common Hall. All those elections we propose to transfer to the Common Council. The general opinions expressed to us by competent witnesses respecting the Common Hall elections, and the special facts deposed on the same subject, have convinced us that they are liable to serious abuses, and afford no efficient security for a good choice of candidates. In fact, with respect to the most important officer whom they appoint, the Lord Mayor, their choice is so restricted as to indicate no confidence in their decision. In an election for the office of chamberlain which took place in May 1853, the poll was kept open for seven clear days, and the expenses of the two candidates amounted together to about 8,000*l*., as was admitted to us in evidence by Sir John Key and Mr. Scott, the two candidates in question. We may add that the Municipal Commissioners, in their Second Report, expressed an opinion against the propriety of entrusting any elective functions to the livery. (Abstract p. 65.)

We have received complaints with respect to abuses in the exercise of the compulsory powers connected with the choice of persons for the office of sheriff. It has been stated to us that those abuses have now been rectified; but we think that the election of the sheriffs by the Common Council, instead of in Common Hall, will afford an additional security for the proper use of those powers. The qualification for the sheriffs might with propriety be the same as that already proposed for aldermen and common councillors

At present the two sheriffs of London perform the duties of sheriff of Middlesex. We do not recommend any alteration in the present relations of these two shrievalties. No inconvenience was suggested to us as arising to the county from the existing arrangement, which is of very old standing. There are no assizes in Middlesex; the necessity therefore for an officer to attend upon the judges in the commission does not arise; there is a separate office in the metropolis for the business of the county, and we understand that there is no desire in the rest of the metropolis nor on the part of the county of Middlesex that a separate sheriff for the county should be appointed by the Crown.

It is hardly within the scope of our inquiry to recommend alterations in the practice and jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, except so far as the Corporation are directly concerned with it. It is certainly fit to be considered whether the creation of one central court for the disposal of the whole criminal business of the metropolitan district, sitting almost continuously and combining the services of the City judges and the Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions, would not be a most convenient and beneficial change. But at any rate we think that the Lord Mayor and aldermen should no longer form portions of the Central Criminal Court, their attendance being at present merely formal. In case the Corporation should desire to be relieved from all the expense attending the trial of any prisoners except those who come from within the limits of the City of London itself, they should be borne respectively by the metropolitan counties to which the prisoners tried belong.

Whatever may be the view entertained of the propriety of forming one criminal court for the disposal of all the criminal business of the metropolitan district we feel bound to recommend the consolidation of the Lord Mayor's Court and the Sheriff's Court into one Court, combining the jurisdiction which they now generally possess, to be held before the recorder, with a right of appeal to one of the superior courts of law at Westminster. To this court we think should be continued the power of enforcing the peculiar process of foreign attachment, amending that customary process in some particulars which appear to us to require amendment. Besides this court, the Small Debts Court would continue to exist, as now established. This recommendation is in accordance with the recent resolutions of the Court of Common Council.

The Court of Hustings is practically obsolete, and can be made available for no good purpose. We think it should be formally abolished.

An appeal lies from this court, and from the Lord Mayor's Court, to the court at St. Martin's-le-Grand, which is very seldom called into existence, and is a very cumbrous and inconvenient tribunal. We have already suggested that the appeal from the court which we propose to take the place of the Lord Mayor's Court and the Sheriff's Court should be to the courts at Westminster. We recommend, therefore, the formal abolition of the Court of Appeal at St. Martin's-le-Grand.

In concluding what we have to observe upon the subject of the City courts, it is only due to the Corporation to state that, with respect to the offices in them which in former times were the subject matters of sale from the Corporation to individuals, the Corporation has of late years entirely discontinued this practice; and, further, that in a great many cases where such offices have been sold, with power of alienation, the Corporation have at considerable expense, purchased back the offices themselves, and the right of alienation, and have filled them up, as a general rule, with persons competent to discharge the duties attached to them. The Corporation have of late years consistently pursued this policy with respect to all classes of officers.

The Corporation of London possesses and exercises several privileges affecting trade. Some of these confer an exclusive right of following certain employments; others are used merely as a source of revenue to the Corporation. The Municipal Reform Act has established the practical principle that, notwithstanding any custom or byelaw of a Corporation, "every person in any "borough may keep any shop for the sale of all lawful wares or merchandizes, "by wholesale or retail, and use every lawful trade, occupation, mystery, and "handicraft, for hire, gain, sale, or otherwise, within every borough." (s. 14.) We propose to extend this enactment, both in its letter and its spirit, to the Corporation of London. It appears to us that, if the legislature has thought fit to abolish the trade privileges and monopolies which were possessed by the country corporations, the same measure is applicable, on still stronger grounds, to the same class of privileges and monopolies in the City of London; inasmuch as the latter is the great centre of English commerce, and it is therefore peculiarly important that all the operations of trade should be freed from needless and vexatious restrictions within its limits.

We therefore recommend that all laws, acts of Common Council, or other regulations, prohibiting persons not free of the City from carrying on any trade, retail or otherwise, within the City, or from using any art, occupation, or handicraft within the City,* be repealed and abolished. In this recommendation the Common Council, by their recent resolutions, concur.

The Corporation likewise possesses, by immemorial usage, confirmed by a charter of 3 James I., the metage of all grain, fruit, wares, and merchandizes brought into the port of London. This right is not confined to articles landed within the limits of the City, but extends to all goods landed on both sides of the river, from Staines in Middlesex to Yantlet Creek in Kent. This right has been mainly regarded by the Corporation as a source of revenue: in the year 1852 its gross produce was 11,775*l.*, the expenses of its collection were 1,924*l.*, and its net produce was 9,851*l.* It was in this view that the suit against Messrs. Combe, Delafield & Co., already adverted to, was instituted, the object of this suit being to compel Messrs. Combe & Co. to allow certain grain to be measured by the City meters, and to pay the metage dues thereon, although Messrs. Combe & Co. alleged that the grain was their own, that they knew its quantity, and did not desire to have it measured for them by the City officers. We understand that this suit has recently been abandoned by the Corporation, and that they have forborne to enforce their claim for a compulsory metage on grain imported under these circumstances. We were likewise informed that a negotiation between the corn trade and the Corporation respecting the metage of corn has recently taken place, and that an arrangement for an amended system of metage, to be conducted by City officers, has been agreed to. We do not doubt that advantages have arisen from the existence of a body of meters, of ascertained skill and integrity, guaranteed by a responsible public authority, and that both private traders and the public revenue have derived security from it. Similar rights of metage have also existed in other boroughs, but on the whole we doubt the expediency of maintaining this system, even if amended, except in a voluntary form.

Connected with the right of metage, is the Fellowship of Porters, which exists as a separate body, created by an Act of Common Council. No person can be admitted as a Fellow of this body who is not free of the City; and the Fellowship have a monopoly of porterage for corn and other measureable articles within the entire Port of London.* The abolition of the exclusive rights of this Fellowship (from which the privileged porters themselves appear to derive little advantage), is involved in the application to the City of the 14th section of the Municipal Reform Act, already recommended. This Fellowship possesses a separate fund; and pecuniary relations of some complexity have grown up between the company and its cashier or banker, (called Shifter.) In winding up its affairs, these accounts would require adjustment; and certain interests have been acquired by purchase from the Corporation, which ought to be the subjects of compensation.

Statutory enactments likewise exist, which require that all persons acting as brokers within the City of London shall be admitted by the Court of Aldermen, under such regulations as they may think fit, and shall each pay an annual sum of 5*l.* to the Corporation. In the year 1852, the Corporation received from this source of revenue a sum of 5,206*l.*; but as the admission of brokers by the Court of Aldermen, and the inspection exercised by the court, appear to us not to be productive of any public benefit, we recommend that the statutory enactments in question be repealed.

The charters of Edward III. and Charles I., granted to the Corporation, contain a declaration that no market shall be granted by the Crown to be holden within seven miles all round about the City. Whatever may be the right which these grants may be held to convey for the prevention of new markets within seven miles of the City, it seems to us unsuited to the state of things which has grown up since the reign of Charles I.; and we think that any such restrictive privilege which the Corporation may now possess with respect to markets without the limits of the City should be repealed.

The Corporation is likewise entitled to a street-toll, which is levied on all carts, not the property of freemen, upon entering or leaving the liberties of the City. This toll, in the year 1852, produced a gross revenue of 6,935*l.* If the City of London were now, as it once was, the entire metropolis; and if carts were liable to a toll upon entering it from the neighbouring country, this toll would stand on the same footing as other tolls which are now levied at the entrance of boroughs. But, inasmuch as the City of London now forms only a small part of the entire town, and as its limits are arbitrary sections of continuous lines of streets, the toll in question has become a street-toll levied at certain spots in the middle of the metropolis. Its incidence is also partial; inasmuch as it is levied exclusively on carts, while carriages are exempt; and moreover is levied only on the carts of non-freemen. For these reasons, we recommend that the toll in question be abolished. There was recently a charge upon this branch of income for a public improvement, but that charge has been paid off; and Sergeant Merewether informed us that it was the wish of the Corporation, antecedently to the issue of our Commission, that this toll should be abandoned. The Common Council, in their recent resolutions, likewise recommend its abolition.

Upon the creation of the metropolitan police in the year 1829, by the Act of 10 George 4. c. 44., the City of London was alone excepted;* but in the year 1839, a separate police for the City was established by the Act of 2 & 3 Vict, c. 94. We refer to the evidence of Mr. Harvey, the Commissioner of the City police, (who appears to have discharged the duties of his office in a very efficient manner), as illustrating the operation of the system, and as showing the principal grounds upon which a separate police for this small portion of the metropolis is maintained.† We have carefully considered the reasons which have been adduced in favour of preserving the distinction in question, and have come to the conclusion that the reasons in favour of a combined system preponderate. The district of the metropolitan police now contains an area of 571 square miles; the area of the City is little more than one square mile, and it is surrounded on all sides by the metropolitan police district. We believe that the incorporation of the City with the larger district by which it is environed, is a measure recommended alike by considerations of efficiency and economy; and we do not doubt that the difficulty of communicating with the head office, to which Mr. Harvey adverts in his evidence, might, by proper arrangements, be overcome.

The annual expenses of the metropolitan police are divided between the parishes and the consolidated fund; the parishes paying three-fourths, and the consolidated fund paying one-fourth of the whole. In the City, a similar division is made between the ratepayers and the Corporation; the police rate bearing three-fourths, and the City chest contributing one-fourth of the annual expense. In the year 1852, the sum thus contributed by the Corporation towards the expenses of the City police was 10,524*l*. We recommend, in the event of the present distinction between the City police and the rest of the metropolitan police being abolished, that the Corporation be relieved from this contribution, and that the City receive the same assistance from the Consolidated Fund, towards the maintenance of its police, as the rest of the metropolis.

The existence of a separate Commission of Sewers for the City under a Local Act, and its exception from the commission whose powers extend over the rest of the metropolitan district, is an anomaly which has grown out of the peculiar relations of the City to the rest of the metropolis, described in a former part of our Report. The City commission of sewers likewise manages the lighting and paving of the City, and performs other sanitary functions.‡ Its various duties appear to be efficiently performed; and we are not prepared to recommend any alteration in them; though its superintendence of the main sewers will have to be considered in connexion with the scheme for a metropolitan board of works, to which we shall advert presently.

See 11 and 12 Vic., c. 112, s. 1.

We have already stated that the Corporation collect a metage duty upon all corn, fruit, or other measurable articles landed in the Port of London. They were formerly entitled to a similar duty on coal, which has been subsequently commuted into a duty on the ton, and has undergone other changes by successive Acts of Parliament. There are now three duties on coal imported either by land or water into a district extending twenty miles from the General Post Office. The first of these is a duty of 4*d.*, which lasts at this rate until 1862, when it reverts to a duty of 4*d.* per chaldron. It is payable to the Corporation, and is considered as forming a part of the City's estate. After deducting the drawback, the expenses of collection, and other charges, the net produce of the City coal tax in 1852 was 54,141*l.* It is now charged, for the Cannon Street improvement, with a principal sum of 580,000*l.*, besides a compensation allowance to sea coal meters, which amounted in 1852 to 7,336*l.* The sum assigned out of the produce of the 4*d.* coal tax, for the payment of interest upon the permanent charge in 1852, was 20,000*l.*; so that in that year the sum appropriated by the Corporation out of this tax to its ordinary expenses amounted to 26,805*l.* The second of the coal duties is a duty of 8*d.* per ton, the net produce of which in 1852 was 113,559*l.* This sum, together with an annual payment of 11,500*l.* from the City's estate, a small duty on wine, and some other petty sources of income, constitutes a fund denominated "The London Bridge Approaches Duties Fund." This fund is subject to certain annual charges for interest on loans, and for expenses of collection and management, which in 1852 amounted to 12,200*l.*; and the surplus being 113,373*l.* was payable to the Commissioners of Works, in liquidation of loans raised and charges made upon the fund. When the charges made by the Board of Works upon this fund have been satisfied, a charge of 88,000*l.* made by the Corporation for improvements at Clerkenwell succeeds; and it is calculated that the fund will suffice to extinguish all these charges before July 1862. In that year the 8*d.* coal duty, either wholly or in part, ceases. The third duty is a duty of 1*d.* per ton, the net produce of which in 1852, was 14,397*l.* and the whole of this sum, subject to a small charge for the costs of collection, was payable to the Commissioners of Works for metropolitan improvements. This duty expires in 1862. The net produce of the three branches of the coal duty in 1852, deducting the drawback and expenses of collection, was as follows:

Mr. Tyrrell's Paper, 6392. Scott, 4597-4633.

Duty of 4*d.* per ton - - -	£54,141
Duty of 8*d.* per ton - - - -	111,479
Total - - - - -	£179,857

This sum is levied not upon coal entering the City, but upon all coal brought either by land or by water into a district extending twenty miles in all directions from the General Post Office. The coal duty district exceeds in size the metropolis of the Registrar General, the district of the Commissioners of Metropolitan Police, the district of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, and the metropolitan district of the Postmaster General;* and its extent would be great even if the limits of the London Corporation were conterminous with those of the existing metropolis. The collection of all the three classes of coal duty is conducted by the Corporation; but, inasmuch as the Corporation directly represents only a small portion of the metropolis, Parliament has made it a mere trustee with respect to the produce of 9-13ths of the amount, and this portion is applied by it to specified purposes of general metropolitan utility. With respect to the remaining 4-13ths, there is an annual, though decreasing, charge for compensation to sea coal meters, fixed upon it by Act of Parliament; and the Corporation voluntarily apply 20,000*l.* of its produce

* The greatest length of the Metropolis, according to the Registrar General, from north to south is 11 miles, and from east to west is 15½ miles.

By the 11th and 12th Vict. c. 112. s. 1. the district of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, may extend to any place being not more than twelve miles distant, in a straight line, from St. Paul's Cathedral. The actual district is, however, less extensive.

The Act of 10 Geo. 4. c. 44. contains a list of the parishes and places constituting the metropolitan police district. By Act of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. s. 2. Her Majesty is empowered to extend the metropolitan police district to any place which is part of the Central Criminal Court district, except the City of London and liberties thereof; and also to any part of a parish which is not more than fifteen miles distant from Charing Cross in a straight line.

The metropolitan district for Post Office purposes is comprised within a circle of which the radius is twelve and one-third miles from the General Post Office. The old twopenny post delivery was within a circle of three miles from the General Post Office.

A statement of the different metropolitan districts successively included in the bills of mortality is given in the census returns of 1852, part 1, p. 42.

to the Cannon Street improvement, which may be justly considered as a work of general metropolitan importance. After these deductions had been made, there remained to the Corporation in 1852, out of the coal duties, a sum of 26,805*l.*, which it treated as ordinary revenue. Against this amount, however, is to be set the sum of 11,500*l.* per annum, which the Corporation contributes to the London Bridge Approaches Fund, under Act of Parliament, for general metropolitan improvements, until the year 1862. So that the City may be considered to have only applied to its own use a sum of 15,305*l.* out of the proceeds of the coal tax in 1852. For reasons similar to those which induced us to recommend the abolition of the metage dues, we think that the present arrangement, by which the Corporation levies a duty upon coal over a district extending twenty miles from the General Post Office, and applies a portion of its proceeds to the exclusive purposes of the small area included within the City proper, ought not to be continued permanently. We propose to state in a subsequent part of our Report the course with respect to these duties which seems to us expedient.

The Corporation of London likewise exercise another important right, which far exceeds the limits of the City, but which does not produce to them any net revenue; namely, that of conservancy of the Thames. The Mayor of London is, by ancient grants of the Crown and long-continued usage, conservator of the river Thames, from the bridge of Staines to the waters of Yantlet and Medway. The powers and duties of conservancy are divided into two branches; those above and those below London bridge. Both classes of powers are regulated by various Acts of Parliament; they are exercised by a committee of the Common Council, called the Thames Navigation committee, and by several officers appointed by the Corporation.*

The conservancy of the river has been already the subject of Parliamentary investigation, and many opinions respecting it were expressed by the witnesses whose evidence we received. It appears to us that the management of the navigation of the Thames from Staines to Yantlet Creek, including the regulation of the Port of London, is not in harmony with the ordinary municipal duties of a committee of the Common Council; and that it requires an access to more extensive interests and a greater command of technical knowledge than they possess. We therefore recommend that the principal control of the navigation of the Thames should be vested in a board composed of the Lord Mayor, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the President of the Board of Trade, the First Commissioner of Woods, and the Deputy Master of the Trinity House; and that they be empowered to employ persons having the requisite professional knowledge for performing the detailed administration. In order that these duties should be efficiently discharged, it would be necessary that the Thames Navigation Board should have an adequate fund at its disposal. The sum applicable to the Harbour and Port of London in 1852, from tonnage rates and interest on stock, was 19,476*l.* The tonnage rates now leviable on vessels in the Port of London are moderate; but the sum which they produce seems hardly sufficient for the due maintenance of the Port. A suit is now pending between the Crown and the Corporation respecting the ownership of the bed of the river between high and low water mark; but it appears that the Crown have agreed to grant its rights to the Corporation, on condition that the monies obtained by grants of land on the shores of the river be applied, wholly or in part, to the improvement of the navigation. In case the fund applicable to the maintenance of the port of London, notwithstanding the assistance derived from the rent of erections on the shores of the river, should be found insufficient, it might be desirable to increase the rates of the tonnage dues for this purpose.

Connected with the navigation of the river is an incorporated company, entitled the "Master, Wardens and Commonalty of Watermen and Lightermen of the River Thames." This company is regulated by Acts of Parliament, the earliest of which was passed in the time of Henry VIII.; and it is placed under the authority of the Corporation of London; but it is not one of the City companies; and freedom of the company does not confer a right to the freedom of the City, nor is it necessary to be free of the City in order to become free of the company. company, with respect to the navigation of the river, ought, we think, to be abolished. Some protection to the public against unskilful or unfit persons plying for hire on the river ought however to be provided, and the issue of licences for this purpose ought to be vested in some competent authority.

A statement of the revenue and expenditure of the Corporation is annually laid in a printed form before the Common Council; but it is divided into a variety of separate accounts, not brought under one head, which renders it difficult to state the receipts and disbursements of the City in aggregate amounts. We have abstracted from the accounts for the year 1852 the following statement, which gives a correct view of the revenue and expenditure for that period:—

In the preceding statement of the revenue and expenditure of the Corporation of London for 1852, the revenue amounts to 551,971*l.* and the expenditure only to 403,983*l.*, showing an excess of revenue over expenditure of 147,988*l.* This result, however, is mainly owing to the fact, that the sums of 113,373*l.* and 14,337*l.*, making together 127,710*l.*, though stated to be payable to the Board of Works, are not entered in the column of payments. We have already shown that, with respect to these portions of the coal duties, the City is a mere trustee, and that they properly form no part either of the income or expenditure of the Corporation.

In the year 1852, the following were the sums levied for rates under the management of the Corporation, deducting the costs of collection :—

Consolidated rate	£66,051
Sewers' rate	18,826
Police rate	26,100
Ward rate	4,039
Total	£115,016

The valuation of the property assessed to the Police rate is 1,118,226*l.*; so that the rates levied in that year were about 2*s.* in the pound. No rate in the nature of a county rate is made in the City. The poor-rates are made by the parishes upon a separate assessment, which differs from the assessment for the police rate, and is stated for the same year at only 953,110*l.*

Daw, 5085.

It appears to us that an unnecessary complexity in the keeping of the City accounts and in the administration of its affairs, is produced by the multiplication of departments and separate funds. We therefore recommend that the management of similar branches be, as much as possible, consolidated; and the entire revenue and expenditure brought into a single series. We see no reason why the Bridge House Estates should be placed under a distinct management, though the amount of their proceeds ought to be stated separately from that of the other City estates. The accounts relating to the river Thames, to the rates, and other subjects, may in like manner be simplified by proper consolidations.

We have received from the Corporation full returns of the salaries and other emoluments of their officers. We have not found it necessary to include these in our appendix; but we think that, if the alterations in the constitution and functions of the Corporation which we have recommended should be carried into effect, a revision of the establishments of the Corporation, with a view to a more economical arrangement, will be imperatively required. We are satisfied that, by a judicious readjustment of the duties, a reduction in the number of persons employed may be effected. We also recommend that each officer be, as far as possible, remunerated by a fixed salary, and that the present system of partial payment by fees, allowances, or gratuities for extra work, table money, and state and other uniforms, be abolished. In case such a revision should be accomplished, we do not doubt that due regard would be had to the interests of existing officers.*

The system of keeping the money in the Chamberlain's office, and of making a profit of the balances, is described in detail in Mr. Scott's evidence. We see no reason why the Corporation of London should continue to follow a system with respect to the custody of public money now generally abandoned; and we think that the money of the Corporation, and its securities, ought to be lodged in the Bank of England. 4536-95.

The present arrangements for the audit of the accounts of the Corporation seem to us defective. Instead of four auditors annually elected by the livery, we recommend that three auditors, with full powers of examination and disallowance, be appointed in the manner prescribed by the Municipal Corporations Act, s. 37. 93.

The Corporation of London at present enjoy an unlimited power of charging their income, so far as they can obtain advances of money upon credit. We recommend that the provision in the Municipal Corporations Act, with respect to mortgaging the borough property (s. 94) be extended to it,† as well as the subsequent provision requiring a return of the annual revenue and expenditure of boroughs to be made to the Secretary of State, (6 & 7 Wm. 4. c. 104. s. 10.)

Having now examined the constitution of the Corporation of London, and the different branches of its administration, we proceed to the consideration of the Irish Society; which cannot be omitted in a general view of the functions of this Corporation. The Irish Society, though a separate corporation created by charter, was intimately connected, in its origin, with the Corporation of London; its governor is an alderman, and its other members are Common Councillors; and it is in substance, though not in form, a committee of the Common Council appointed under peculiar regulations. In order to explain its origin, and to account for the singular powers which it exercises, it is necessary that we should ascend to a period more than two centuries before our own time, and to a state of things altogether different from the present.‡

During the latter part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and early part of the reign of King James I., the north of Ireland had been permanently in an unsettled and disaffected state; the acts of the English Government had been met with constant resistance; and at last the rebellion of the Earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnel had led to extensive forfeitures in Ulster. The condition of the northern province at this time is thus described by Leland, in his History of Ireland: "The repeated efforts of the native Irish to harass and distress that "government which they could have no rational expectations of subduing, "only served to confirm their subjection. By their conspiracies and rebellions "a vast tract of land escheated to the Crown, in six northern counties: "Tirconnel, now called Donegal, Tirone, Derry, Fermanagh, Cavan, and "Armagh, amounting to about five hundred thousand acres; a tract of country "covered with woods, where robbers and rebels found a secure shelter; "desolated by war and famine, and destined to lie waste, without the deliberate "and vigorous interposition of English Government. James, who affected to "derive his glory from the arts of peace, resolved to dispose of these lands in "such manner as might introduce all the happy consequences of peace and "cultivation. The experience of age bears the most honourable testimony to ‡ See Second Report, p. 191. Judgment of Lord Langdale, in the Skinners' Company v. the Irish Society, 19th Nov. 1838. Judgment of the House of Lords, in the same case, 8th August 1845.

" the design; and Ireland must gratefully acknowledge that here were the first " foundations laid of its affluence and security." (B. iv., c. 6.)

In order to carry into effect the King's design of reclaiming the north of Ireland from barbarism, of rebuilding and repeopling its ruined and depopulated towns, and of planting the country with English and Scottish Protestants, a negotiation was entered into between the Crown and the Corporation of London; and the Corporation undertook, in return for large grants of land and extensive power and privileges, to settle the plantation at their own expense. The sum of money required for the purpose was considerable; and the Corporation raised it by an assessment upon the citizens of London, belonging to the different London companies. It would be foreign to our purpose to state at length the complicated transactions which arose out of this undertaking, on the part of the Corporation. The plantation was made, and the Irish Society incorporated by James the First.* The Society afterwards set out in severalty large estates in the plantation to the several London companies, the members of which had contributed funds for the settlement; the size of the estates bearing in general some proportion to the amount of money contributed by the members of the respective companies. Before very long, the Society was involved in disputes with the Crown; its charter was forfeited, and its proceedings annulled in the time of Charles the First. Charles the First however had promised to restore the charter, and confirm the proceedings, when the civil wars broke out, and the promise was never fulfilled. Charles the Second re-granted the charter, and under this charter the Society still exists, and holds a considerable property in and near the towns of Londonderry and Coleraine. It consists of lands, fisheries, and other property which it was not easy or possible to set out in severalty to the different companies, as had been done with the great body of the estates in the plantation. This property has been administered since the time of Charles II. by a committee of the Corporation of London, no member of which, except the governor, can, by the charter, continue to be a member for more than two years consecutively; and practically no member is ever re-elected.

It appears from this brief statement that the Society was instituted for the purpose of planting and civilising a large tract of country in the north of Ireland, at the time of its institution in a barbarous state, partly from the want of civilisation among the native Irish, and partly from the ruin and devastation consequent upon the repeated rebellions against the English authority. It is obvious, and was fully admitted by the governor of the Irish Society, that the original objects for which it was created have long ago been satisfied. Its revenues are at present appropriated partly to the expenses of management, partly in grants for the municipal institutions of Londonderry, and partly in grants to various charitable and educational institutions connected with the districts around Londonderry and Coleraine. It has become, in substance, a large charitable endowment for the north of Ireland, managed by an absentee committee in London. Without discussing in detail the questions between the Irish Society and its Irish tenants and dependents, which have been raised before us, we think that enough has appeared from the evidence on both sides to show that their relations cannot be regarded as satisfactory.

Humphery, 8404-5. 8409.

* The original objects of this scheme are expressed in the following extract from the Translation of the charter of King James the First to the Irish Society. Dated the 29th March 1613.

" JAMES by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland King, Defender, &c., to all whom these present letters shall come, Greeting. Whereas there can be nothing more kingly than to establish the true religion of Christ among men hitherto depraved and almost lost in superstition, to strengthen, improve, and cultivate by art and industry, countries and lands uncultivated, and almost desert; and the same not only to plant with honest citizens and inhabitants, but also to renovate and strengthen them with good statutes and ordinances, whereby they might be more safely defended, not only from the corruption of their morals, but from their intestine and domestic plots and conspiracies, and also from foreign violence. And whereas the province of Ulster, in our realm of Ireland, for many years now past hath grossly erred from the true religion of Christ and Divine grace, and hath abounded with superstition, insomuch that for a long time it hath not only been harassed, torn, and wasted by private and domestic broils, but also by foreign arms: We, deeply and heartily commiserating the wretched state of the said province, have esteemed it to be a work worthy of a Christian Prince and of Our Royal functions to stir up and recal the same province from superstition, rebellion, calamity, and poverty, which heretofore have horribly raged therein, to religion, obedience, strength, and prosperity.

And whereas Our beloved and faithful subjects, the Mayor and Commonalty and Citizens of our City of London, burning with a flagrant zeal to promote such Our pious intention in this behalf, have laudably undertaken a considerable part of the said plantation in Ulster, below in these presents mentioned, and in other respects are making progress therein."

We feel bound to express our opinion that great abuses existed no long time since in the administration of this trust property, and that the expenses of management went far beyond the necessary costs attendant upon a distant executive. In an abstract of the expenditure of the Irish Society which has been laid before us, we find it stated that the total expenditure (deducting the permanent payments), and the costs of management, stood to one another in the following proportions, in the three periods of ten years from 1818 to 1847 :

Years, ending February.	Expenses of Management.	Total Expenditure, less permanent payments.
Total	£133,912	£219,898

From this statement it results that, in the thirty years from 1818 to 1847, the costs of management amounted to more than half the expenditure which was not of a permanent nature. The expenditure of a permanent nature is nearly 1,100*l.* a year ; so that, in order to obtain the total expenditure for the thirty years, it is necessary to add a sum of about 33,000*l.* The expenses of management, and the total expenditure, less the permanent payments, for the seven years from February 1847 to February 1853, stand as follows :

This comparison shows that, during the last seven years, the expenses of management have amounted to less than half the expenditure which was not of a permanent nature. During these seven years, the permanent expenditure has likewise been nearly 1,100*l.* a year. It should be observed that the law expenses, and the interest on loans which were contracted for the payment of law expenses, have, in this statement, been included under the head of expenses of management. During the thirty years from 1818 to 1847 these two sums together amounted to 25,094*l.* ; during the seven years from 1847 to 1853 the same two sums amounted to 3,769*l.* It is, however, right to remark that the expenses of litigation do not stand on the same footing as the ordinary expenses of management ; and the expenses of litigation, which of late years have been peculiarly heavy, were such as it was incumbent upon trustees to incur. The existing income of the Society is stated by Alderman Humphery, the governor, at about 10,000*l.* a year ; and he estimates the present costs of management, including an allowance of 600*l.* for legal expenses, at about 3,000*l.* a year. Ald. Humphery, 8373-8382.

Till of late years the Society was in the habit of considering all revenue beyond a certain sum expended in public and charitable objects as surplus revenue ; and it divided all such surplus amongst the companies which had contributed to the original plantation, and whose estates had afterwards been respectively set out to them in severalty. In the case of the Skinners' Company v. the Irish Society, decided a few years ago, it was contended against the Society by one of these companies that a larger share of the whole revenue ought to be divided. The claim of the company was successfully resisted by the Society, both Lord Langdale and the House of Lords on appeal having given judgment against the claim. It appears, from the arguments and judgments in this case, that the Corporation of London have not and have never claimed any beneficial interest whatever in the revenue of the Society. The Society itself also, from the charter and from its own present practice and avowed principle, are mere trustees for the purposes declared in the charter of incorporation ; and although neither Lord Langdale nor the House of Lords decided what the claim of the companies might be upon a supposed surplus, it results from both those decisions that the objects of the charter are so vast and various that they never could be entirely satisfied by any funds at the disposal of the Society, and that, in fact, if the Society did its duty, no surplus could ever arise in any reasonable probability. Practically, therefore, the companies have now no interest in the revenues of the Society, because they can only be entitled (if they are entitled at all) to a surplus which has not and cannot have any actual existence. It follows that there are no persons or bodies in this country beneficially interested Humphery, 8398.

in the receipt of its revenues. Its affairs are at present in a flourishing condition financially; the many expensive lawsuits in which it has been of late years engaged are now nearly at an end, and the heavy debt occasioned by them has been paid off.

Humphery, 8402. As the revenues of the Irish Society are now unincumbered by debt, and as neither the Corporation of London, the Society itself, nor the London companies are beneficially interested in its funds, the present is a favourable moment for considering the question of its management with a view to an amendment of the system.

When the Irish Society was created by King James I., the City of London and the north of Ireland stood to each other in a relation wholly different from that which subsists between them at present. The north of Ireland was in a state of barbarism, and of devastation from civil war. The island had recently been disturbed by foreign invasion; and it was an important object of public policy to rebuild the ruined towns, to reclaim the people from their wild and unsettled habits, and to hold the country with a strong hand. In this state of things, the assistance of the powerful and wealthy Corporation of London was of paramount importance; and it was calculated to aid in the promotion of a great national object.* But the original purposes with which this "plantation" or "colony" (as it was called) was established, have long since been satisfied; Ulster is now in a prosperous and peaceable state; the influence of the City of London in civilizing, in governing, and in protecting the north of Ireland is no longer felt, and the Irish Society has, through the change of circumstances, assumed the form of a charitable trust, charged with the annual distribution of a large endowment. The duties of the managing body would be simplified, and their proceedings facilitated, if the objects of the trust were clearly defined by Act of Parliament, with reference to the existing state of things. But the leading advantages which formerly accrued from the connection of the managing body with the Corporation of London have ceased; and their distance from the place where the estates are situated necessarily creates embarrassment in their administration, as well as much additional expense. For these reasons we recommend that the Irish Society be dissolved, and its charter repealed, by Act of Parliament; and that its property be vested in a new set of trustees, whose number and character should be defined in the Act. We recommend further that the trustees be appointed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and that he have power to fill up vacancies as they occur from time to time. A general scheme for the guidance of the trustees in the management of the property ought, as we have already stated, to be laid down in the Act. But as it may be difficult to define once for all every portion of a scheme of this kind, and as it may be desirable as circumstances alter to alter the provisions of the scheme to meet them, power should be given to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to modify or vary the provisions of the scheme within certain limits.

Sir R. Ferguson, 8156.

We stated in a former part of our Report that, if the entire system of the Municipal Corporations Act were applied to the Corporation of London, it would be necessary to advance its boundaries until they comprehended the entire metropolis. We attempted, at the same time, to show that such an extension of the City boundaries would entirely alter the character of the Corporation of London, and would create a municipal body of unmanageable dimensions; we therefore advised that this course should not be adopted, and we reserved the mode of dealing with this part of the subject for separate consideration.

With the single exception of London, the local government of every considerable town in the United Kingdom is vested in a municipal corporation. This government is not confined to a portion of the town, but, since the recent statutory reforms, comprehends its entire circuit. In London, however, as we have already seen, the municipal government extends over only a small portion of the entire town, whether measured by area or by population. If it were held that municipal institutions were not suited to a metropolitan city, no reason could be found, except its antiquity and existence, for maintaining the Corporation of London, even with its present limited area. It appears to us, however, that a metropolitan city requires, for its own local purposes, municipal institutions not less than other towns. We believe, indeed, that the utility of municipal institutions is greater, and their want more felt, in a large, populous, opulent, and crowded metropolis, than in a country town of less size, population, and wealth. Those functions of local government, moreover, which in other towns are performed by the municipal authorities, are, in the metropolis, actually discharged by parochial functionaries, or by boards created by local acts, though they may be discharged in a less uniform and efficient manner. In some cases, indeed, in the parishes on the outskirts of the metropolis, they may, from a want of powers in the general law, be left for a time altogether unprovided for, to the serious inconvenience of the inhabitants, and to the permanent injury of the owners of property within the district. We may refer to the evidence of a deputation of the vestry of St. Pancras, appended to our Report, as illustrating the evils which now arise in large parishes where new building is in progress on a large scale, from the absence of an efficient municipal organization, applicable to new portions of the town as they successively spring into existence. Cooper, 2849-67.

Although the City of London is the only part of the metropolis which possesses a municipal organization, there are at present within the metropolitan district seven Parliamentary boroughs, each of which, with the exception of Greenwich, contains a larger number of inhabited houses, and a larger population, than the City, as appears from the subjoined statement.

Houses and Population in 1851 in the Metropolitan Boroughs.

Boroughs.	Inhabited Houses.	Population.
Finsbury	37,427	323,772
Marylebone	40,513	370,957
Tower Hamlets	75,710	539,111
Westminster	24,755	241,611
Lambeth	39,154	251,345
Southwark	23,751	172,863
Greenwich	15,401	105,784

	Inhabited Houses.	Population.
City of London	14,693	129,128

Of those seven boroughs five received the right of returning members to Parliament under the Reform Act of 1832, and we concur in the opinion expressed by the Lord Mayor, in his evidence given before our Commission, that "as the legislature has already decided to enfranchise other portions of "the metropolis as Parliamentary boroughs, the legislature ought to complete "the work by enfranchising them for municipal purposes also" (Question 7,196). We think, indeed, that if an attempt were made to give a municipal organization to the entire metropolis, by a wider extension of the present boundaries of the City, the utility of the present Corporation, as an institution suited to its present limited area, would be destroyed; while, at the same time, a municipal administration of an excessive magnitude, and therefore ill adapted to the wants of the other parts of the metropolis, would be created. But we see no reason why the benefit of municipal institutions should not be extended to the rest of the metropolis, by its division into municipal districts, each possessing a municipal government of its own. What the form of this government should be, and what should be the number or extent of the districts, are questions not lying within the scope of our Commission, and upon which we are not competent to express any opinion. We recommend, at the same time, that the slight municipal connexion which now subsists between Southwark and the City of London be dissevered; and that some small spaces included within the external boundaries of the City, but not forming a part of it, be annexed to it.

We may be permitted here to remark that the power of petition to the Crown for the grant of a municipal corporation, given to Parliamentary boroughs by the Municipal Corporations Act, and by the Act of 1 Vict. c. 78, does not appear to us to be practically applicable to the metropolis. In order that a proper distribution of the metropolis into municipal districts should be effected, it would be necessary to take a connected view of its different parts, and to arrange the boundaries and size of each district with reference to the other districts. Without such mutual adjustments, a proper combination of districts would be impossible; and such adjustments could not be made, if charters were granted singly to Parliamentary boroughs. If a distribution of the metropolis into municipal districts is to be made, it ought, as it seems to us, to be made simultaneously, and with a due consideration of the manner in which the interests of each part are affected by the general plan.

In the event of a division of the entire metropolis, such as we have ventured to indicate, being hereafter made by the authority of Parliament, we suggest the creation of a Metropolitan Board of Works, to be composed of a very limited number of members deputed to it from the council of each metropolitan municipal body, including the Corporation of the City. We propose that the management of public works, in which the metropolis has a common interest, should be conducted by this body. At present works of this sort can only be undertaken either by the Corporation of London from its own peculiar funds, or under powers created for the purpose by special legislation, or by the executive government out of Parliamentary grants. The only fund arising from metropolitan taxation is the coal tax, a large part of which is, as we have already seen, devoted to metropolitan improvements, under the control either of the Commissioners of Works,* or the Corporation of London. We have already explained the origin and nature of that tax, and we pointed out the objections to which its present application is liable; but we reserved our recommendation respecting it for a subsequent part of our Report. We now recommend in the event of a metropolitan board of works being created, that the entire proceeds of the coal tax, including the 4*d.* tax now payable to the City, be transferred to its administration, at the earliest period which may be found practicable; and that they remain under that control after the year 1862, in case the coal tax should be prolonged. When that year has arrived, the London Bridge Approaches fund would be broken up; and we think that the fees on freedoms and apprentices payable to this fund ought to be abolished; and that the small duty on wine which now forms a portion of it, should if continued, be added to the fund for maintaining the port of London. We would add, that in the event of a transfer of the 4*d.* coal duty being made in the manner indicated, the compensation for the sea coal meters, and the loan for the Cannon Street improvement, ought to be a continuing charge upon that tax. It is however, we think, incumbent on the Corporation to provide a sinking fund for the annual discharge of a portion of the loan borrowed for that improvement.

We propose further that the metropolitan board of works should be empowered to levy a rate upon the entire metropolis, for any improvement of general utility, within a certain poundage, to be fixed by Act of Parliament. The present poor-rate assessment of the metropolis (according to the limits of the Registrar General), is nearly 10,000,000*l.*; and a penny rate upon this amount would produce 41,666*l.* Looking to the unequal incidence of the coal tax, and to the dissatisfaction which it creates in the district over which it is levied, we strongly incline to the opinion that, even if it should not be thought expedient to disturb the existing arrangement before 1862, yet that it will be held advisable to abolish it from that period, and to substitute for it a rate levied upon the whole metropolis, and payable either by the owner or the occupier, or by both in some fixed proportion. If it should not then be thought expedient to renew the coal tax, as we think probable, we assume that the 4*d.* duty now levied on behalf of the City would cease at the same time.

It is manifest that a power of executing public works of general metropolitan importance, such as the construction of bridges over the Thames, or the opening or widening of main lines of street, accompanied by a power of metropolitan taxation, would, though founded on a basis of popular election, require efficient safeguards for its prudent and useful exercise. We therefore think that the plans for the works to be executed should be submitted to a committee of the Privy Council, and its consent obtained before they are carried into effect. We may add that cases may arise where public works may be executed in the metropolis partly out of the metropolitan fund, and partly from Parliamentary grants, and that in these cases a control of the executive Government such as we have proposed would be indispensable.

Having now, to the best of our ability, executed the trust which has been confided to us, we will recapitulate the heads of our principal recommendations.

1. That a new charter be issued, containing all such provisions in existing charters of the Corporation of London, and all such customs of the City, as it may be deemed expedient to preserve.

2. That the Lord Mayor be elected by the Common Council, from the Common Councillors, or from persons qualified to be Common Councillors.

3. That the Aldermen be elected by the burgesses of the wards for six years, and be re-eligible; that they be justices of the peace during their term of office.

4. That the powers of the Municipal Corporations Act with respect to the appointment of stipendiary magistrates be extended to the Corporation of London.

5. That the Court of Aldermen be abolished, and that its functions be transferred to the Common Council.

6. That the number of wards be reduced to some number not less than twelve, nor greater than sixteen; and that their area and population be, as far as possible, made equal.

7. That each ward return one alderman and five common councilmen to the Common Council; and that their qualification be that prescribed by the Municipal Corporations Act for the larger class of boroughs; namely the possession of real or personal estate of £1000, or being rated on an annual value of at least £30.

8. That the voters in the wardmote elections be the occupiers of premises in the ward rated to the amount of 10*l.* per annum, without any additional qualification.

9. That the elections in Common Hall be abolished.

10. That the sheriffs be elected by the Common Council.

11. That the Lord Mayor's Court and the Sheriff's Court be consolidated, and that an appeal be given from such court to one of the superior courts at Westminster.

12. That the Court of Hustings be abolished.

13. That the Court at St. Martin's-le-Grand be abolished.

14. That all regulations prohibiting persons not free of the City from carrying on any trade, or using any handicraft within the City, be abolished.

15. That the metage of grain, fruit, and other measurable goods be no longer compulsory.

16. That the Fellowship of Porters be dissolved; and that other privileges of porters be abolished.

17. That the admission of brokers by the Court of Aldermen be abolished.

18. That the street toll on carts not the property of freemen be abolished.

19. That the City police be incorporated with the metropolitan police.

20. That the conservancy of the river Thames be transferred to a board consisting of the Lord Mayor, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the President of the Board of Trade, the Deputy Master of the Trinity House, and the First Commissioner of Woods.

21. That the exclusive privileges of the Company of Watermen and Lightermen on the river Thames be abolished

22. That the accounts of the revenue and expenditure of the Corporation be consolidated.

23. That the money and securities of the Corporation be lodged in the Bank of England.

24. That the election of auditors be amended.

25. That the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Acts, with respect to the mortgaging of lands, and the making of an annual return of revenue and expenditure to the Secretary of State, be extended to the Corporation of London.

26. That the Irish Society be dissolved; that its trusts be declared by Act of Parliament; and that new trustees be appointed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

27. That the external boundaries of the City remain unchanged; but that the municipal connexion between the Corporation of London and a part of the borough of Southwark be abolished.

28. That the rest of the metropolis be divided into districts for municipal purposes.

29. That in the event of such division being made, a Metropolitan Board of Works be created, composed of members deputed to it from the council of each metropolitan municipal body, including the Common Council of the City.

30. That the coal duties now collected by the Corporation of London, so long as they remain in force, be under the administration of this Board; and that in case the coal duties which expire in 1862 should not be renewed, the 4*d.* duty now levied on behalf of the City should cease at the same time.

31. That this Board be empowered to levy a rate, limited to a fixed poundage, for public works of general metropolitan utility, over the metropolitan district.

32. That no works be executed by this Board unless the plans have been approved by a Committee of the Privy Council.

We have thus endeavoured, in obedience to Your Majesty's commands, to express our opinion of the present state of the Corporation of London, and of the changes in the existing system which appear to be required by considerations of public advantage. We desire to state that, although we have found much which in our judgment calls for amendment, yet we have discovered nothing which can affect injuriously the honour and integrity of the officers to whom the affairs of this great Corporation have been confided.

Some of the alterations which we have recommended will reduce the income of the Corporation, but others will, at the same time, relieve its burdens and diminish its expenditure. Again, some of the reforms which we have suggested will curtail its powers and privileges; but they will at the same time remove mischievous restraints upon trade and industry, and will abolish other institutions unsuited to our modern legislation. We trust that the changes in the constitution of the Corporation which we have indicated, and which are founded upon the recognized policy of the country with respect to municipal boroughs, will place it on a more solid and enlarged basis; and that the Corporation will continue, under an amended system, to possess abundant means, not only for purposes of public usefulness, but also for the exercise of a decent hospitality and splendour. We may be permitted to add that, while we have abstained from recommending an extension of the boundaries of the City, by which it would include the entire metropolis, we have proposed such an arrangement as will enable the Corporation to form a part of a general metropolitan system.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE

THE COMMISSIONERS

APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE

STATE OF THE CORPORATION OF LONDON.

Tuesday, 1st November 1853.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE IN THE CHAIR.

JAMES ACLAND Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1. I believe you have directed your attention a good deal to the affairs of the corporation of the City of London?—I have.

2. Do you reside in the City of London?—I do.

3. Do you exercise any trade or profession there?—I am an electoral agent.

4. What are the functions of an electoral agent?—An electoral agent undertakes to promote the electoral views of the party retaining him, whether it be for a seat in Parliament or for any other appointment.

5. Have you been actively engaged in elections?—Yes, very frequently.

6. Do you allude to parliamentary elections, or to contests for civic offices?—To both.

7. You have been engaged in both?—I have.

8. You are connected with a society that has for its purpose the reform of the corporation of the city of London?—I am. I am an inchoate freeman of the City of London, and have been for half a century, my father having been free when I was born. I have never taken up my freedom, not having thought it worth my while. At the commencement of the present year I received a summons from the Chamberlain of the City of London, requiring me, in common with thousands of others who had not taken up their freedom, to take it up,—the commencement of a process in the city courts to compel you to take up your freedom. This induced me to endeavour to form an association of the thousands who had received similar notices, and the result was the establishment of the city of London Municipal Reform Association, of which I have the honour to be secretary.

9. When was that society established?—In the month of July this year.

10. Is it composed of persons who feel themselves aggrieved in the manner you have described, or does it include others who, upon general principles, desire an alteration in the present system of the corporation of the City of London?—It includes members of both descriptions. The far larger portion of its members, however, are small shopkeepers, who were really unable to pay the corporate demand of 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* for permission to continue their trade in the city. It also includes some hundreds of gentlemen connected with the warehouses in the Wood Street, Gutter Lane, and Bread Street districts,—the Manchester warehousemen,—and others again, who from feeling the necessity of corporate reform have joined our association.

11. What is the number of the members of the association?—The number is 1,200.

12. Is there any subscription required?—The subscription is merely a registration fee of one shilling; all other contributions are voluntary.

13. Do you mean that there are 1,200 householders in the city of London who are members of your association?—Certainly, or perhaps I should say rated 10*l.* occupiers, of whom I have a list. This is the book in which they are entered (producing the same), as they came individually to enrol themselves members.

14. Are the objects and principles of this society published in any authentic form?—Yes; they have been published. The objects were simply stated, and they were twofold. First, to secure to all rated occupiers of the City of London an equal right to a free and full participation in the privileges which are now monopolized by those who are called freemen; and, secondly, to defend the members of this association against any prosecution on the part of the corporate officials for what we called freedom's sake, that is, against prosecutions connected with the demand that we should take up our freedom. It is a defensive association in that respect and it is also an antagonistic association upon the corporation as now constituted as we contend that all occupiers contributing towards the municipal rates should possess the municipal franchise.

J. Aeland, Esq.

15. Do the objects of the members of this society extend beyond the simple points to which you have referred, on which they considered themselves personally aggrieved?—Yes; because at a meeting of the members of the association it was resolved that they should give all possible aid to this Commission in its endeavour to ascertain the grievances under which the citizens believe they are suffering, in order to remedy any abuses that may be discovered to exist.

16. But the society have never expressed in a formal manner an opinion as to what they think the proper constitution of the corporation of the City of London ought to be?—No; they have rather desired to expose the abuses that exist, and have not as yet considered what will be the best specific for the cure of the disease under which the city, the body politic, is suffering.

17. Have the society held any meetings?—Several; and they have appointed a committee, which of course has had several meetings in order to conduct its affairs.

18. Have the complaints of the society been against the system principally, or against the conduct of individual officers under the system?—Purely against the system. The society has from the first declared that it should not be made a personal matter; that it is a question to be fought on public grounds; that it is the existing system of which they complain. They are disposed to think that the functionaries and officers of the corporation are rather victims to the system, in common with all those who are claiming their rights.

19. Having explained what are the general views of this society with which you are connected, will you now state whether you have yourself considered and formed some opinion upon the defects which you believe to exist in the present system of the corporation of London, and, likewise, with reference to the remedies which it would be expedient to apply to those defects?—As a born freeman of London, of course I have always felt a considerable interest in the affairs of the City of London. As well known to have been a prominent advocate of Free Trade principles, it may readily be imagined that I am opposed to anything in the shape of monopoly, where the effects of that monopoly are evidently, as in this case, prejudicial to the general interests of the community, and I have therefore generally given the subject my consideration.

20. You are probably conversant with the Report which in the year 1837 the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales presented upon the City of London?—I have read it, and studied it.

21. In that Report they divided the subject under certain heads, and perhaps it will be convenient if you will have the goodness to go through those heads, and to state to the Commission your views with regard to them, in the order in which they stand in the Report. We will begin, if you please, with,—"Relation of the City to the Metropolis." Under that head are there any observations which you are desirous of addressing to the Commissioners?—There are. Will you allow me to observe, that "the Corporate Limits," which is made a separate head, appears to come under the same head of "Relation of the City to the Metropolis." The Commissioners of 1834 seem to have been impressed with the idea that the area of the City of London could advantageously be extended over a considerable portion if not the whole of the metropolis. We think that with regard to municipal privileges and municipal duties very much depends upon whether they be conceded to the constituency, or imposed upon the constituency. The parliamentary boroughs of the metropolis have always of late years had an opportunity of applying for a charter of incorporation, if they had been so minded; but I believe that in no one instance have they done so. The Commissioners state that, generally, where the suburbs of provincial towns have greatly increased, it has been held desirable, under the Municipal Reform Act, to take in those suburbs as part of the municipal town; so extending the original municipal area. But that was not the invariable rule; for instance, in the case of Salford and Manchester. Manchester was not so large, relatively to London at all events, but that Salford might have been added to it and yet separate incorporations were given to the two adjacent localities, Manchester and Salford. So that I think there is not much in the argument, that in some instances provincial towns, not a fifth or a sixth or a tithe of the size of the metropolis, had granted to them an increased area, including their respective suburbs, because that was not always the rule. And as regards London, the Parliamentary Reform Act gave to the parliamentary boroughs the power of applying to the Privy Council for municipal incorporation. I think, therefore, that there is not much in the argument, that because the City of London is surrounded by more than two millions of inhabitants, therefore the two millions and a quarter, or a half, should be thrown into the municipality.

22. The incorporations of Manchester and Salford were entirely new creations?—They were so. But if it was very desirable that all adjoining populations should be formed into one corporation (as seems to be contended in this Report), it would seem that it ought to have been done in that case. If it was not imperative in that case, where the population was, probably, not a fifth of that of the metropolis, there cannot well be founded upon that instance any argument that two millions and a half should be thrown into one municipality, when it was not thought desirable that a quarter of a million or half a million should be so treated.

23. Are you then of opinion that it would not be desirable to extend the limits of the City of London?—To extend the limits of the City of London does not precisely meet the idea with which I would follow up my argument. I am opposed on conviction to the addition of the metropolis to the City of London, because I think that the municipality of the City of London has a specialty which would be overlaid and destroyed by so vast and incongruous an addition, and that specialty is commerce. It is true that the municipal city is nothing in size to London; but it is not London. Whatever it is in greatness, it is as a City. It is the great commercial intrepôt of the world, the first port of the empire. And, although the commissioners state in their report that the City of London has less than a ninth of the population of the metropolis, and that it has not in it the Government Offices, I would ask what proportion does it bear to the commerce of the metropolis—the commerce properly so called—not the retail trade, but the commerce? What proportion does it bear with reference to the different monetary establishments which are there, if the Government offices be not there? You have the Custom House, which is a Government office. You have the Post Office, which is a Government office. You have the Bank of England, not a Government office perhaps. You have the Royal Exchange. You have the offices of all the Dock Companies, and you have the immense monetary establishments which rule the monetary world. The City of London may be decried, if the citizens of London say, "This is London," but it is not to be decried with reference to its specialty. I consider that the effect of the extension of the area of the municipalty of the City of London to the area of the metropolis would be to overlay the specialty of the city itself, and to destroy its commercial character and commercial utility. If the City of London is not what it might be, this commission is appointed to make it what it should be; and if I am right in my idea of its specialty, then my argument will apply less to the commercial municipality as it is,—the commercial municipality, which I believe it to be in your power to make it. Liverpool is now threatening a rivalry with the port of London. It would have little chance of rivalling the port of London, if London had fair play with Liverpool; but the one has a free trade municipality, and the other is under the thrall of a monopolist municipality. The commerce of London is burdened with all manner of onerous charges, and is surrounded with vast difficulties impeding, its full development, as I think we shall hereafter prove.

24. Are you speaking of the great export and import trade of London?—I am. I am speaking of it commercially, not as a mere trading emporium. But waving the further pursuit of the question of the metropolitan area as extended to the whole of the metropolis, thinking that it would not be desirable that you should impose a participation in the London municipality upon the parliamentary boroughs which have not yet shown any anxiety to have municipal institutions, then I come to the point that there is a very large population on the south side of the water—which is legally part and parcel of the City of London which is deprived of the franchise, which is to some extent burdened with the obligations connected with the municipality of the City of London, and which has long struggled, and will struggle before you, to assert its right to be considered part and parcel of the City of London. I allude to the borough of Southwark. They have petitioned over and over again the Common Council of the City of London, and those petitions have been invariably rejected. Therefore, if you will allow me, I will endeavour to put before you in this, I think its proper place, some reasons, legal and otherwise, why the borough of Southwark, the municipal ward of Bridge Without, should be restored to its rights, and why the addition of its population and houses to the present population and houses of the City of London would be a desirable addition by way of concession instead of by imposition.

24a. Are the limits of the ward of Bridge Without co-terminus with those of the parliamentary borough of Southwark?—No; the parliamentary borough of Southwark comprises eight parishes—the ward of Bridge Without comprising but five of those parishes which constitute the modern parliamentary borough.

25. Does that ward comprise all of what may be called the commercial part of the borough of Southwark, the part which adjoins the river?—It does; and I am prepared to give you, as I think, a complete view of what the borough of Southwark municipality is. It comprises three manors and five parishes. The manors are—first, the Guildable Manor. The northern boundary of the Guildable Manor is the river Thames. It extends on the west to St. Mary Overy's, in the parish of St. Saviour. On the east it stretches to Hay's Wharf, in the parish of St. Olave; and it runs southward to the immediate vicinity of St. Margaret's Hill. That Guildable Manor was the original village of Southwark, of the thirteenth century. The jurisdiction of the City of London over the ward of Bridge Without extends through the parishes of St. George, St. Saviour, St. John, St. Thomas, and St. Olave. In the year 1327, the first of Edward the Third, the City of London applied to the Crown, complaining that felons and malefactors were in the habit of escaping over London Bridge and resorting to the town of Southwark, in which town their officers had no jurisdiction. They therefore prayed for such jurisdiction, and a grant of the said town. Letters patent were granted in that year, 1327, with the assent of Parliament, conveying Southwark to the citizens of London for ever, upon payment of the accustomed yearly rent of 10*l*. In 1462, the second of Edward the Fourth, letters patent were granted, reciting, confirming, and extending the jurisdiction of the City in Southwark, specifying the grant of the town, with the appurtenances and all chattels called waif and estray, treasure found, goods of felons and outlaws, disclaimed goods, and all escheats and forfeitures, and assize of bread, wine, beer, ale, and other victuals; the office of clerk of the market, with the correction of all persons selling bread, &c., and all others inhabiting or exercising any arts whatsoever in the town, with all forfeitures, fines, and amerciaments thence arising; also a fair of three days yearly, a court of piepoudre, the arrest of felons, and the transferring such felons to the gaol of Newgate for safety. I hope the Commissioners will observe, that here we are arriving towards what may be called evidence that the borough of Southwark—or some portion, at all events, of the parliamentary borough of Southwark, namely, the ward of Bridge Without—appertains to the City of London. In the reign of Henry the Eighth the King's Manor, which is the second of the three manors, was purchased of Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury. The Great Liberty Manor, which is the third of the three manors, on the dissolution of the monasteries, was surrendered by Abbot Parfew, with the other estates of Bermondsey Abbey. Then the corporation of London petitioned King Henry the Eighth for a grant of those manors. They did not succeed; but in the subsequent reign, in the fourth of Edward the Sixth (April the 23d, 1550), in consideration of 647*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* paid by the corporation, letters patent were granted to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, conveying to them certain messuages and closes theretofore held by Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk; also the lordship or manor of Southwark, being the Great Liberty Manor; also the Manor and borough of Southwark, being the King's Manor; also quitrents to the amount of 4*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* It is observable that there is a distinction made between the Great Liberty Manor and the King's Manor; they were both Southwark, but one is called in the letters patent the lordship or manor; the other is called the manor and borough, while the guildable manor is described as the village of Southwark. Those three manors constitute, as we contend, the ward of Bridge Without; nor, indeed, is that a contested point. The limits of the ward are not disputed. Those three manors comprised five parishes, as I have stated; the Parliamentary borough includes those five parishes, adding to them three others. By the same charter of Edward the Sixth, for the further consideration of 500 marks, the King gave and granted to the corporation in and through all the borough and town of Southwark, and in and through the parishes of St. Saviour, St. Olive, and St. George, and in the parish late called St. Thomas's Hospital, and then called the King's Hospital, in Southwark, and in Kentish Street and Blackman Street (Kent Street and Blackman Street still exist), in the parish of Newington and elsewhere, in the said town and borough of Southwark; and all waifs, estrays, and treasure-trove; and the King further granted to the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens that they should thenceforth for ever hold all manner of contracts and demands whatever, arising within the town, borough, parishes and precincts aforesaid, before the mayor and aldermen and sheriffs of the said city, at the same days and times, and in like manner and form as such happening in the said city had, time out of mind, been held in the courts before the mayor and aldermen and sheriffs of the said city, or in any of them; and that the serjeants at mace of the City of London might thereafter execute any manner of process in the said borough, town, parishes and precincts, concerning such contract and demands arising and happening within the precincts aforesaid, as had been used in the City of London; and that the inhabitants of the town and borough, parishes and precincts aforesaid, as concerning the causes and matters thence arising, might be impleaded and plead in the same city in form aforesaid, and in the courts aforesaid; and that jurors impannelled and summoned on juries for trial of such issues, should be amerced by the said mayor or sheriffs for non-appearance. "And the King further granted that all persons from time to time inhabiting within the town, borough, parishes and places aforesaid, should from thenceforth be in the order, government, and correction of the mayor and officers of the City of London and their deputies, for the time being, as citizens and inhabitants of the said City of London, were and ought to be, by virtue of the charters before that time granted by any of the King's progenitors to the said Corporation of London," putting them on equal ground pari passu with the citizens on the northern side of the Thames. "And that the said mayor and commonalty and citizens of the said City of London and their successors, should and might from thenceforth have, hold, and enjoy so many, so great, the same such and the like rights, jurisdictions, liberties, franchises and privilegie whatsoever, in the town parishes and places aforesaid, and in every parcel thereof; and as fully freely and entirely as the said mayor and commonalty and citizens of the said City of London had enjoyed or used, or could and might have enjoyed and used, in the said City of London."

25a. Did the inhabitants of Southwark, at any time, actually enjoy all the privileges of the other citizens of London?—All the privileges that then existed; I am coming to that point.

26. In page 20, of the report of the former commission, you will see this paragraph:—"There can be little doubt that these charters were granted with the view of completely incorporating Southwark with the rest of the city of London, but this intention has been very imperfectly carried into effect. The grants concerning the trial of actions, and the subjecting of the inhabitants to the government of the City, have only been partially operative, and, in fact, the corporation take no charge of the borough, in many very important particulars." Does that agree with your view of the effect of those charters?—They do take charge of the borough in many important particulars, they take charge of the manors, and have always taken charge of them, and taken special care of them. They take charge also of other matters. There was an election of aldermen in the borough, or at all events there was a direction to the inhabitants that, for the appointment of an alderman in the City of London, the inhabitants should name four citizens, and should return them to the Court of Aldermen, and that the Court of Aldermen, out of these four citizens, should select one to fill the vacancy, whatever it might be. In the same year, that is in the year 1550, in which these letters patent were granted by Edward the Sixth, on the 20th of May, the Court of Aldermen chose and appointed Sir John Ayliff, knight, and barber-surgeon, "to use and occupy the room and office of alderman within the borough of Southwark." On the 28th of May they nominated, elected, and chose Sir John Ayliff alderman of Bridge Ward Without, and he was sworn and admitted. On the 31st of July, in the Common Council, an act was made, enacting that there should be a twenty-sixth aldermanry, and that four freemen, resident within the city and borough or liberties of the city, be nominated, elected, and appointed, by the inhabitants of the said borough, before the lord mayor of the said city, as the aldermen of the said city are elected and chosen; and that of those names so presented the lord mayor and alderman, at the next Court of Aldermen, shall elect and choose one; and they then confirmed two preceding election by the Court of Aldermen of Sir John Ayliff, barber-surgeon. On the 2d of September, the Court of Aldermen declared that, whereas the aldermen then served for two consecutive years, the aldermen of Farringdon Without and of Bridge Without should hold their aldermanries for two consecutive years. In 1553, which is three years afterwards, the First of Mary, November the 14th, there was a Court of Aldermen held, on the election and removal of Sir John Ayliff to the ward of Dowgate. Four citizens were nominated by Sir John Ayliff, as the out-going alderman, and William Harper was duly elected, from among those four citizens, by the Court of Aldermen, as the alderman of Bridge Without, vacant by the translation of the previous alderman to the ward of Dowgate. In 1556, November 12th, Harper removed to Dowgate, on the death of Sir John Ayliff, and Ralph Greenaway was selected from the four returned to the Court of Aldermen, and elected as alderman of Bridge Without. In 1557, June 16th, the Court of Common Council passed an ordinance declaring that, as the ancient custom of the inhabitants naming four citizens, from whom the aldermen should select one, had fallen into disuse, such four citizens were for the future to be named by the lord mayor and aldermen, and then, by scrutiny, one from the four to be selected. On the 21st of June, five days afterwards, the Court of Aldermen nominated four, on the death of Greenaway, and elected John Cooper. In Delawner's Angliæ Metropolis, there is a list given of the aldermen and the common council of Bridge Ward Without; we have no other evidence of common councilmen of Bridge Ward Without. In 1692, on October the 26th, an act for the nomination of aldermen and election of common councilmen in the respective wards of the City of London was passed; there is no exception of Bridge Ward in that ordinance of the Common Council of the City of London.

26a. Does it appear positively that common councilmen were elected for that ward? —No; it does not appear positively that any common councilmen were ever elected for the ward. It does appear positively that four of the resident citizens of that ward were named as the body from which the lord mayor and aldermen were to select the alderman for the ward; but it does not anywhere appear that there were common councilmen elected for the ward of Bridge Without. In those several ordinances the Court of Common Council deal generally with the wards of the City of London, not excepting the ward of Bridge Without. That it was a ward is beyond all question; that it was an aldermanry is beyond all question; and the general acts and ordinances dealing with the wards, without excepting any, must be taken as including the inhabitants of Bridge Without, and as conveying to them equal rights with the citizen inhabitants of any other aldermanry.

27. But still, there is no evidence that the inhabitants of this ward were upon the same footing as the other wards of London, in point of actual exercise of those privileges? —They had an alderman. It is only long subsequently to that time that the alderman of Bridge Without has been made the dernier resort of the members of the Court of Aldermen.

28. You have stated that four citizens were named by the ward, from which the lord mayor and Court of Aldermen selected one as alderman. Is there anything in those records to show by what authority or by what persons those four citizens were named? —It does not appear that the inhabitants of the borough ever did return those four citizens; but it does appear that such was the ancient practice, for the Court of Common Council in their ordinance proclaim the disuse of that ancient practice, and therefore order that those four shall thenceforward be selected by the Court of Aldermen themselves; and then, that one of the four should be, by scrutiny of the lord mayor and aldermen, chosen as the alderman of Bridge Without.

29. Will you refer to page 32 of the Report of the Commission which sat in 1834, where there is the following passage: "With respect to the ward of Bridge Without, it has already been mentioned that the charter of Edward VI. granted the borough of Southwark to the City, and shortly after an act of Common Council was passed by which this was made a new ward by the title of Bridge Without. The mayor and aldermen named the first alderman for the new ward, but the Act directed that the inhabitants of the ward should for the future elect the aldermen as was then done in the other wards. This act seems never to have been carried into effect." Now do you believe that to be a correct statement?—I believe it to be a correct statement, and I believe that because it had thus fallen into disuse the Court of Common Council directed that another course should be taken. Parenthetically, I may observe that everything here in the Report of the Commissioners is the evidence of the Corporation. But I find no fault with that statement I think it is quite true that that was the case; it is according to the evidence of the Corporation themselves.

30. The passage just read to you is part of the Report signed by the Commissioners. It is an abstract of the evidence drawn up by the Commissioners with great care?—It is so; it is a summary by the Commissioners of the evidence given by the corporate officers.

31. You have stated that a strong desire has been expressed by the inhabitants of the Southwark Ward to be assimilated in all respects with the City of London?—By some of them.

32. Can you state what proportion of the inhabitants have expressed that opinion?—I cannot; but I can state distinctly that they have repeatedly applied. In 1788 they petitioned the Common Council for equal rights with their fellow citizens.

33. Was that petition the result of a public meeting, or was it only the petition of a certain number of the inhabitants?—I should think that it was not from a public meeting, I am not aware that it was. In 1814 they petitioned the Common Council again, and that petition was in some respects attended to. For instance, the Court of Common Council consented that aldermen should preside as magistrates in the Town Hall of the Borough of Southwark; and in the year 1814, and for some years subsequently, an alderman did preside there; 800*l.* a year was allocated from the city funds for the duties of that office. It however fell into disrepute. There was a public office in the immediate neighbourhood, where justice was administered, and the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark seemed to have thought that justice was better administered there; the business of the alderman in the Town Hall fell off, and dwindled down to comparatively little, and when the alderman died no new alderman was appointed, and the business of the justice room in the Town Hall ceased. That was an instance of magisterial free trade in the administration of justice, and I am bound to suppose that justice triumphed. They have a Court of Record in the borough of Southwark; they have a steward. I think the recorder of the City of London was the steward, although Mr. Payne, the coroner, now acts as steward, whether as deputy of the recorder or not I do not know. He appears in the finance accounts of the corporation to be the steward. There is a prothonotary of the borough, and there was what last year was called the Borough Compter in, I think, Mill Lane, Tooley Street. Some day in this year, in February, the gaol was sold by Messrs. Pullen and son, auctioneers; but in the corporation accounts for 1852 there are various entries for the borough of Southwark and the gaol there.

34. Was the gaol the property of the Corporation of London?—I believe it was.

35. Do you know whether the proceeds of the sale were carried to their account?—The latest financial accounts of the corporation are for the year 1852. This gaol was sold only at the commencement of the present year, but in the financial accounts for 1852, Mr. Pritchard, as the high bailiff for Southwark, has 100 guineas a year; Mr. Payne, as the steward of the borough of Southwark, has 50*l.* a year; the prothonotary has 50*l.*; and there are the messenger and housekeeper at the Town Hall, and various other expenses. Then comes the Borough Compter. Mr. Newman, the keeper, has funds to enable him to pay the wages in the said compter,—217*l.*; and Dr. Russell, as chaplain, for twenty-nine weeks, 60*l.* 18*s.* I suppose those twenty-nine weeks were up to the termination of the occupancy of the then gaol, because it was sold at the commencement of this year; and I can see no other reason why twenty-nine weeks' salary should be given to the chaplain but that then his duties terminated. There are also entries for meat and potatoes, which show that in the year 1852 prisoners were in the Borough Compter, and those prisoners have now been removed to the new City Gaol at Holloway, where Mr. Newman, who was the keeper of the Borough Compter, is also on the establishment of the new gaol; so that there was a compter. There is a court of record; courts leet are regularly held. At those courts leet the inhabitants are summoned to take upon them the office of constable; and this peculiarity attaches to the courts leet, that when a man is chosen as constable, he is told, "Now you have nothing to do but to pay half-a-crown." "What is the half-crown for?" "That is for your being sworn in." "But I do not want to be sworn in; you tell me there is nothing to do." However, the half-crown is paid by the constable appointed, and then he has nothing to do. There are also quarter sessions.

36. How is the high bailiff of Southwark appointed?—By the Court of Common Council.

37. Does his authority extend over the whole of the parliamentary borough of Southwark?—Certainly not. Probably he may be appointed by some competent authority, returning officer of the parliamentary borough; but as the high bailiff of Southwark, an officer of the city of London, he can have no jurisdiction over the three parishes which have been added as a portion of the parliamentary borough. The quarter sessions are regularly held, that is, the form of holding them, is regularly gone through in the Town Hall of the borough of Southwark. The lord mayor, the recorder, and the aldermen, who have passed the chair, being the court. A grand jury are impannelled, and they are addressed to this effect: "Gentlemen,—By virtue of certain ancient charters, we have been obliged to call you together. I am happy to tell you that there is nothing for you to do." Then they say, "Why did you call us together?" The answer by the late recorder, Mr. Law, was, "Surely it is better to call you together and tell you, now you may go home, than to call you together and keep you two or three days.

38. Are we to understand your opinion to be, that it would be desirable to assimilate in all respects the ward which is on the other side of the bridge with the rest of the City of London?—No; that is not precisely my opinion. The inhabitants of the borough of Southwark are in this extraordinary predicament, that the City of London claims them as far as it answers its views, and yet it refuses them their rights as citizens. They are told, if they apply to the Privy Council for a charter of incorporation, that they cannot get it because they are part of the City of London; and they think it very hard that they can neither be free citizens of London nor free citizens of Southwark, having an independent municipal corporation. They are in that extraordinary position.

39. What is the course which you propose to pursue with reference to them?—The course which I propose to pursue with reference to them is, that you should hear them, and judge of what is best in the common interest. But I confess that I see some difficulties in making them citizens of London, which would make it impossible to put all the large districts of the metropolis on the south of London under such a municipal government as should conduce to the proper sewerage of that low-lying district. If the borough of Southwark were independent of the City of London, it could apply for a separate charter of incorporation; Lambeth could do the same; and you would thus have for the whole of the south of London, from Battersea to Greenwich, but two municipal bodies for consultation and co-operation upon all questions of sanitary progress and local and social advancement. This would certainly be for the general advantage and health of this vast community, especially in respect of the supply of water and the general sewerage of that important district; for I believe that that is the district which is generally supposed to be the source and origin of the malaria which so frequently and fatally afflicts the metropolis. I am no partisan here, but I think it is a case of peculiar hardship. I should contend that either the ratepayers of the borough—if the borough be a ward, and part of the City of London—should have equal privileges with those on the north side of the river, or that the borough of Southwark should be dissevered from the civic corporation, in order that it should be separately incorporated. And assuming Lambeth also to be municipally incorporated, then there should be arrangements between the two which would suffice, without the intervention of any other party, under a proper constitution, for the proper draining and supply of water in that vast district.

40. Are you able to state to the Commissioners which of those two alternatives you think would be preferable?—Decidedly; I think it preferable that Southwark should be separated from the City of London. I can have no question about it, when I recollect that part of the borough of Southwark is not a municipal ward, and that three of the parishes of the parliamentary borough cannot well ask for municipal incorporation as a mere sectional interest. What pecuniary interest the Corporation of London may have in the manors of Southwark, or in the municipal receipts within the borough of Southwark, whether from the metage of corn on the southern bank of the Thames, or from any other of those onerous charges upon the commerce of London, I know not; but I believe that the inhabitants of the borough hold for their part that if they were severed from the City of London it would be just that the corporation of London should be made to concede to them a fair proportion of the pecuniary advantages which that corporation has heretofore enjoyed or now derives, or may hereafter derive, from property connected with the locality of the Bridge Ward Without.

41. You stated that certain petitions were presented by the inhabitants of Southwark to the Court of Common Council, or to the Court of the Mayor and Aldermen. Do you know what the prayer of those petitions was?—Those petitions, whatever they were, referred to a committee of the Court of Common Council, and the answer of that committee to one of such petitions will I think give us its prayer, or the effect of its prayer. There was a petition of 1814, and another, I think, in 1836.

41a. Is that the latest?—No; there has been one within the last two years. I was present in the Court of Common Council when it was received and rejected. This report of the committee of Common Council gives answers to the arguments set forth in the petition, and gives reasons for rejecting those arguments. If I read those reasons probably it will show the view which the City of London took of this subject. The first objection they urge is this:—"The long usage of the privilege of the inhabitants, without reference to any corporate qualification, to return from their own choice, distinct from the City of London, two members to represent them in the Commons House of Parliament;" because this municipal ward of Bridge Without did certainly as the parliamentary borough of Southwark return two members independently of the City of London, and anterior to the grant of the manors to the city. One of the objections then to the petition on the part of the corporation is, that here would be an antagonistic interest in Parliament to that of the city, or at least a separate interest.

42. The petition was for a complete assimilation; not for severance?—Yes; for they could not ask the corporation for a severance. The second objection to the petition is: "The concurrent jurisdiction of the sheriff and magistrates of the county of Surrey, and the police establishment at Union Hall." But that was not regarded by them as a reason why the alderman should not sit at the Town Hall, when they established the Town Hall as a court of justice. This argument was not made available upon that occasion, when it answered their purpose to vote 800*l.* a year to one of the aldermen, in order that he should sit there as a magistrate. That was worse than a concurrent jurisdiction; it was rather the establishment of a conflicting jurisdiction in the instance of an opposition court of justice. The third reason is: "The powers exercised by the high steward and marshal of the King's House; the said town and borough being within the verge;" in other words, the powers exercised by the Palace Court. But the Palace Court no longer exists, therefore that can no longer be an objection. The next objection is: "The contribution to the county rates, of which Southwark forms a very considerable proportion." Of course if they paid municipal rates they would no longer pay county rates. It is a peculiarity of the borough of Southwark, that as a ward of the city it pays no municipal rates as other wards do, but it does pay county rates, as though it were within the county, and not within the city.

43. But it has never been made a part of the City of London, which is a county of itself, so as to take it out of the county of Surrey?—It appears so; yet the City of London can walk into this part of the county of Surrey, and administer justice there; and if it is not part of the city, how can they do that. The next reason is: "The erection of a new Gaol, or such an enlargement of the Borough Compter as may render it fit for the purpose of a separate and exclusive jurisdiction." That is a pecuniary jurisdiction simply. Since that they have the Holloway Gaol, which is quite large enough; therefore that would be no longer an objection. The next reasons are these: "The being subject to the militia laws, and to the billeting of soldiers; the commission of sewers of the county, and district commissions for the paving and lighting and watching of the borough, and other local authorities, created by Acts of Parliament; the establishment of the Metropolitan Police in the districts of the borough; the power of the several courts of the city and its officers, in respect to the attachments of property; foreign attachments, &c., although granted by the Charter of Edward the Sixth, and the compelling of persons to take up the freedom of the city, never having been exercised in the borough; and the trial of Nisi Prius causes at the assizes of the county, for which it would be necessary to make some provision or arrangement for their trial within the city, as is now done in London, at the London sittings of the several courts at the Guildhall, &c." These were the answers that were given to the petition, forming the grounds on which the petition was refused. Then the question is, how the corporation can claim to hold the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark in their civic thrall, without giving them those privileges and advantages that should in reason result from the connexion.

44. Would it be in their power to give them those privileges without applying to Parliament?—Yes; by an ordinance of the Court of Common Council.

45. What do you believe to be the general feeling and opinion of the inhabitants of Southwark? Would they wish to be dissevered in the manner you have sketched out, or would they prefer to be brought into more intimate connexion with the city?—Upon that subject I should be very anxious to test the opinion of the inhabitants of Southwark, and I endeavoured to do so last night, but circumstances prevented. I suggested that it would be desirable that we should elicit the feelings of the inhabitants by a public meeting. It is a matter delayed, not rejected. There are citizens of London, freemen of London, resident in Bridge Without. Their feelings would probably be for perfect union in privileges as in duties with the City of London. But there is a far larger and much more influential portion of the inhabitants of Southwark, who are non-freemen, and I believe it will be found that their opinion is that it is not desirable to become a part of the corporation of London as it is; but that it would be very desirable to become part of a corporation of the City of London such as it might be made, and such as it ought to be. I believe the feelings of the inhabitants non-freemen of Southwark is precisely that of the inhabitants of the City of London north of the Thames, non-freemen, and in every manner they could they have shown it.

46. Do you believe that there is on the part of the inhabitants any general desire that the borough of Southwark should be taken out of the county of Surrey and annexed to the City of London?—Not in express terms.

47. In point of fact, have the county of Surrey and the City of London concurrent jurisdiction in Southwark?—The City of London exercise it when they please; they exercise it when the alderman sits to administer justice, the county having at the same time a police court within 150 yards in Union Street.

48. What do you apprehend is the feeling of that portion of the public of the City of London whose opinions you now more particularly represent with regard to this question of assimilation on the one hand, or of the severance of Southwark from the City of London on the other hand?—I am not prepared to say; I think it is a question which has received so little attention from those not immediately connected with it. The party with whom I am connected is a party who are not corporators. The corporators north of the river, and the persons south of the river, may entertain these questions very naturally; but the non-corporators north of the Thames, who are very generally desirous not to be members of the corporation as it now is, of course take but little interest in these matters.

49. You have stated that the specialty which gives importance to the City of London is, that it represents very much the great commerce of the metropolis. If Southwark were completely separated from it, would it not, pro tanto, diminish the importance of the City of London in that respect?—But it is separated from it now. And I think it is rather a discredit to the corporation of the City of London, so far as the conservancy of the Thames goes, that though they have the control of the south bank of the river, extending for miles, and they take all the waifs and strays, and all the water bailage, and so on, along that mileage of the river side, yet they neglect what appears to be their municipal duties with reference to the rights of the citizens and inhabitants of that locality.

50. If, in order to annex Southwark effectually to the City of London, it should be necessary to separate it from the county of Surrey, could that be done by a mere ordinance of the Common Council without an Act of Parliament?—By an ordinance of the Court of Common Council representatives could be given to the ward of Bridge Without. That I have no doubt about. By an ordinance of the Court of Common Council, the privileges of a wardmote might be given to the resident freemen of that ward, so that they should elect their aldermen, and elect their common councilmen, as they are elected in the other wards of the City. Whether the question put may not involve some legal technicality or point with which I am unable to deal, and with which I would not presume to deal, I know not; but, so far as practical citizenship goes, so far as the enjoyment of the civic rights in the election of representatives is concerned, the corporation have always had the power to give to the citizens of Bridge Ward that which they have demanded; but they have always refused to do so.

51. We will assume that the boundaries of the City of London are confined to that portion of the city which lies north of the river; we will suppose that the parliamentary borough of Southwark is constituted a municipal borough under the general powers of the Municipal Act; and we will make the same assumption with regard to Lambeth. Then there would be but one municipal borough to the north of the Thames, and there would be two municipal boroughs to the south of the Thames. In that state of things would you leave the rest of the metropolis without any municipal constitution?—I would give a municipal constitution wherever it was desired. I would force it nowhere. I would concede it, but I would not impose it.

52. For example, do you think it would be desirable that there should be a municipal borough in the City of Westminster?—I think it very desirable that there should be; but I, as a citizen of London living in the City of London, will concede to the inhabitants of Westminster their right to form their own opinion upon that subject according to their better knowledge of their own local interests; but as it regards the general public interests, I have no question but that Westminster should be a municipality. I think the same with respect to every parliamentary borough. I think that a legislative union of the whole metropolis, by delegation from the several municipalities, would be very useful for general and common purposes, such as police, if you please, probably for water, and certainly for sewerage.

53. Then would you have municipal boroughs for Westminster, Marylebone, the Tower Hamlets, and Finsbury?—Yes; Southwark, Westminster, Finsbury, Marylebone, Lambeth, and the Tower Hamlets.

54. Would you think it desirable that there should be a municipal organization for each of those parliamentary boroughs?—I should.

55. You are aware of the means by which that power can now be obtained?—I am.

56. Is not it dependent upon the consent of the majority of the ratepayers in each borough?—The majority in number, and I think the majority in rated amount, and I believe also that there is a general feeling in favour of it. I know that it is so in one or two boroughs; but what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and therefore no one stirs in the matter, and they have not petitioned the Privy Council; but I believe that the general feeling is very strong in favour of such an application.

57. Do you contemplate that each one of those municipal boroughs should have a separate police, and a separate jurisdiction in the way of magistrates?—I think not a separate police; separate jurisdiction I think they should have.

58. If each of such boroughs were to have a separate police, it would be necessary to break up the system of the Metropolitan Police, would it not?—Certainly.

59. How would you proceed with respect to sewerage, there being now a Commission of Sewers for that portion of the metropolis which is north of the Thames, minus the City?—I cannot imagine that the sewerage of the metropolis can be sufficient and effectual under different administrations, or under different and separate jurisdictions.

50. Supposing there were a municipal borough of Marylebone, what powers would you contemplate that the town council would exercise? The police and sewerage being withdrawn, what would be their functions?—Their functions would be purely local and independent.

61. Do you know when the borough of Southwark first returned members to Parliament?—I do not.

62. It is of very ancient date, is it not?—It is.

63. Would not that very circumstance seem to show that they were not considered at the time as being an integral part of the City of London, because if they had been a ward of the the City of London they would have joined in electing members for the City?—Yes, it would seem so.

J. Acland, Esq.

64. Would you place the management of the paving and lighting of the streets under those municipalities?—I think that should rather go with the sewerage.

65. The supply of water is at present in the hands of the companies?—Yes; but I think that should not be.

66. Would you give them the supply of water?—I would not give to each separate municipality the supply of water. I would form, by delegation from each municipality, a Common Council, which should have the power of supplying water under but one jurisdiction, extending over the entire area of the metropolis, in order to its being an effectual and good supply.

67. What do you suppose that their functions would be in case there were a town council?—I think wardmote functions rather convey the idea which I entertain upon the subject.

68. We have stripped them of the police, the lighting and paving of the streets, of the water supply, and of the sewerage; what remains of a municipal nature?—The administration of justice.

69. That is to say the office of justice of the peace?—The office of justice of the peace, or paid magistracy.

70. Would you get rid of the police magistrates appointed and paid by the Crown, who now act for that portion of the metropolis which is not in the City?—If you had a properly elected municipality, you might entrust the appointment of the paid magistracy to that municipal body.

71. Do you think that the administration of justice by the aldermen is more satisfactory than that by the magistrates appointed by the Crown in the metropolis?—It is not satisfactory, because it is always open to suspicion, from the circumstance that the aldermen are appointed by a minority of the ratepayers in the respective wards, and only by a majority of that minority; whence it follows, looking at human nature as it is, that if one of those whose vote appointed the alderman and magistrate for life came before that alderman and magistrate the other party, having no such advantage or connexion, and being unknown to the alderman, a suspicion will arise, be it just or unjust, that partiality exists.

72. Would not that objection apply, in a certain degree, to any magistrates appointed by popular election, either directly or indirectly, as compared with magistrates appointed by the Crown to administer justice?—It would always, to a certain extent, but certainly to a much less extent if the electors were the whole of the ratepayers, than where the electors, as in the City of London, are but a small portion of them.

73. In short, you would assimilate the practice in the City of London very much to the practice which prevails in the large cities throughout the country?—Certainly, in that respect.

74. Do you know anything of the state of the towns in which there is a double municipality; for instance, Plymouth and Devonport, Manchester and Salford, where the town is divided into two boroughs? Do you know whether the system works harmoniously, or whether there is any want of concord between the two bodies?—I can only speak from personal knowledge of the latter instance, of Manchester and Salford; I believe there the system works harmoniously; I am not aware of there existing, or there ever having existed, anything like an antagonism or a conflict of interests or duties.

75. Have you anything more to say upon this part of the subject?—I would wish to be understood as not advocating, one way or the other, with reference to Southwark, but to put my views before the Commissioners, and to show you the very peculiar and awkward position of that ward of Bridge Without at the present moment, inasmuch as they cannot have the rights of citizens of London, and yet they cannot apply to the Queen for a charter of incorporation for Southwark.

76. Supposing the ward of Bridge Without was united to the City of London, would it be incovenient to do so without comprising in the union the whole parliamentary borough of Southwark at the same time?—I should think there would be a conflict of authority in the latter case if the whole were not united.

77. You think it would be necessary, if the one were done to do the other also?—I should think so.

78. Has it ever occurred to you to consider what would be the effect of enlarging the boundaries of the city, so as to include the whole of the metropolis? Is that a plan which seems to you either practicable or desirable?—That is the plan which I anticipated would overlay the commercial character of the City of London, and therefore, believing that it is desirable that the port and City of London should have a corporation of its own, and that it should be able, by the agency of its municipality, to pursue commercial objects in order to the advancement of the locality, as well as with reference to the commerce of the nation at large, I cannot but think, that if you had a common council, giving equal representation to all parts of the metropolis, to Clerkenwell on the one hand, and to Marylebone on the other, the effect would be to overlay the commercial relations of the City of London, and that it would lose its commercial character.

79. Does not it appear to you that London is too large for a single municipal government?—Indeed it does; if it were not so, according to the opinion of the Municipal Commissioners for England and Wales, we should have had Salford and Manchester united, I think.

80. We will pass now to the second head of inquiry; the corporate body. Will you submit to the Commissioners any observations you have to make with reference to the present constitution of the corporate body of the City of London?—The corporate body conveys, I think, to our minds, the aggregate governing body, taking the corporate body as a whole. The corporation, I take leave to state, is in bad odour among the inhabitants of the City of London. The freemen of the City of London, until the year 1835, were necessarily all members of a company of one of the many guilds, which by some are said to be part of the corporation, but which are said by others to be only connected with the corporation. It was in the year 1835, subsequently to the inquiry in 1834, that the Court of Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council decided by an ordinance that a person might acquire his freedom from their officers under the authority of that court without being primarily a member of any one of the guilds or liveries. The being a freeman of a muncipal corporation should be a privilege, and if it were a privilege it would be desired; but it appears that in the City of London this is not the case. Previously to 1835, the fines on the admission of freemen to the City of London were considerable; I think 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* was the fine down to the year 1834, and for the thirty-five years from 1800 to 1834 there were admitted annually, at the redemption fine of 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, 1,000. For the thirty-five years it gave an aggregate of 35,001*l.*, giving an annual average of 1,000 admissions. Then between the years 1835 and 1837 the redemption fine was reduced, first to 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* from 30*l.*, and then, by an arrangement which the corporation made, that certain fees should cease as certain receivers of those fees died, the 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* gradually became reduced to 10*l.* 10*s.*, 9*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, 8*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*, and finally 8*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* But with the redemption fine ranging from 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* to 8*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* for that period of thirteen years from 1835 to 1847, both inclusive, the number of freemen admitted was but 877 annually, as against 1,000 annually who had been admitted for thirty-five years, when the redemption fine was thrice and nearly four times the amount.

81. Was there no other way open of obtaining the freedom of the City at the same time?—No.

82. Do the numbers that you have stated include the whole of the admissions?—Yes. A person becoming free of the livery of any company takes the certificate of freedom to the chamberlain of the City of London, and on payment of the redemption fine is enrolled a freeman of the City.

83. Before the year 1835, no person could become a freeman of the City unless he was a member of a company?—It was so.

84. How did he become a member of a company?—By applying to the company, or by the application of the company to him to compel him to take up his freedom.

85. Could a person become a freeman by birth?—By birth or by apprenticeship.

86. How did birth constitute a person a member of the company?—I, for instance, was an inchoate member of a company, as being the son of a member of that company.

87. Then any son of a member of a company could become a complete member on the payment of a certain fee?—A complete member of a company; his father being free previously to the birth of the applicant.

88. Then in order to become a freeman of the City it was necessary that he should pay a second fee?—Yes.

89. Is residence necessary, in addition to the payment of the fee?—No; it is necessary for other purposes, as you will see presently. Then, to complete the view which I was taking, we had 1,000 people admitted per annum from 1800 to 1834, when the redemption fine was 30*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*. We had 877 admitted per annum for the next thirteen years, when the redemption fine may be taken at an average of 10*l.* Then we have a third series in the last five years, terminating with the close of 1852, during which term the redemption fee to the corporation was only 3*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* (there being a stamp of 3*l.* in addition), and with that enormous reduction from 30*l.* in the first series to 10*l.* in the second, and to 3*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* in the third, we nevertheless have a decrease from 1,000 annually in the first period to 877 in the second, and to 650 in the third.

90. To what cause do you attribute that decrease?—I attribute it to the bad odour in which the corporation stands in the City of London, to the non-desirableness of being a freeman of the City of London, and to the natural English feeling of resistance to anything that looks like compulsion against one's interests or one's wishes. For, in connexion with this view of the subject, I should state that the corporation seem to have been extremely anxious to increase the number of their freemen, and that since the freemen will not come to them voluntarily to enrol themselves and pay for the privilege, the corporation will go to the freemen and compel them to take of their freedom. Hence the bad feeling which has so long existed in the City of London between the corporation and the mere occupiers, not being freemen. Various resolutions have been passed at various times by the Court of Common Council with respect to the compelling of non-freemen to take up their freedom. They have now and again resolved to compel them, and then not to compel them. At one time the Court of Aldermen and Court of Common Council have pulled adverse ways, the Court of Alderman refusing to sanction the prosecutions, and in fact interfering to prevent the Court of Common Council from prosecuting. At another time the Court of Common Council has declared that they would not prosecute, and that their officers should be instructed not to prosecute. Then again they have resolved that their officers be instructed to proceed with those prosecutions against the mere occupiers. In the course of the last year the corporation went to Parliament for a bill, taking the most liberal view of this question, being desirous of terminating and putting an end to the question, once and for ever, as to whether the occupiers should be prosecuted, in order to compel them to become freemen. I have the bill before me, in which the preamble states that "A custom has prevailed, and byelaws have been made, that no person, not being free of the said City, shall keep any shop or place for putting to show or sale any or certain wares or merchandise by way of retail or otherwise, or use any or certain trades, occupations, mysteries or handicrafts for hire, gain, or sale, within the same: And whereas the Mayor, Alderman, and Commons of the city of London in Common Council assembled, considering that the said ancient custom and byelaws are injurious to occupiers within the said City, not being free of the said City, and are in restraint of trade, are desirous that the said custom and byelaws shall cease and be repealed."

1st Nov. 1853.

91. When was that bill brought in?—Last year; in the session of 1852.

92. It was introduced at the instance of the City of London?—At the instance of the corporation.

93. By whom was it brought into the House of Commons?—By Sir James Duke, I think.

94. The bill did not pass?—It did not. The preamble proceeds: "And whereas the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the City of London are seised of or entitled to tolls on carts and other carriages belonging to non-freemen, conveying goods into or out of the said City of London, and on carts and other carriages belonging to freemen conveying goods of non-freemen into or out of the said city, which are payable or are collected at the several bars of the said City of London, or at the places where such bars formerly stood: And whereas the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, are willing to give up the said tolls, and the profits and advantages thereof, and that the same shall be abolished: May it therefore please your Majesty." And the second section enacts: "That from and after the passing of this Act every freeman, and every male person of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, who shall have occupied within the said city or the liberties thereof for the period of a year and a day next previous to the 1st day of September in any year, either solely or jointly with any other person or persons, any house, warehouse, counting-house, office, chambers for business, or shop, and shall in the case of a sole occupation be rated in respect of such premises in his own name on or to an amount of not less than 10*l.* per annum, or in the case of a joint occupation be rated in the several names of the occupiers on or to an amount which, when divided by the number of occupiers, shall give a sum of not less than 10*l.* per annum for each and every such occupier to the police rate for the City of London, in respect of such premises, shall, while continuing to occupy the same, if on the list herein-after directed to be made, be entitled to vote in any election for alderman or common councilman, or ward officer, in the ward in which such premises shall be situate, and also at any election for mayor, sheriffs, chamberlain, bridgemaster, auditors of chamberlain's and bridgemaster's accounts, and for any and every other officer now chosen in and for the said city by the liverymen thereof; and it shall not be necessary for any freeman, or for any person entitled to vote as aforesaid, to take up his livery, or to be admitted a liveryman, in order to qualify himself to vote at any such election." Now that is a very large concession. That is a declaration by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, that an occupier, who is not a freeman, ought to be admitted to a free participation in the equal rights enjoyed by those who are freemen. This bill was resisted, and it did not pass; it was lost at the end of last year.

95. Why did it not pass? Was it because it was dropped by the City of London?—No; the preamble was not proved. It was opposed by the livery companies. By this bill, a man was declared to be a freeman without taking up his livery,—without becoming a member of a company,—and without purchasing his freedom of the City of London. The livery companies thought it interfered with their privileges. A meeting of the livery in Common Hall was convened, and the liverymen thought fit to reject the bill. The preamble was not proved, and the bill was lost.

96. On the part of the livery this bill was opposed before the Committee of the House of Commons, and successfully opposed?—Yes; and then followed this:—notwithstanding that section which I have read, which is to the effect of a resolution of the Court of Common Council that occupiers ought to be equally citizens with freemen and without purchase, nevertheless, in that very year, the Court of Common Council resolved that their officers shall forthwith prosecute occupiers, and compel them to purchase their freedom.

97. Do you know whether this bill was introduced with the unanimous consent of the Court of Aldermen?—I believe that the Court of Aldermen assented to that bill, the rather that it did not propose to reform their body. I believe that the Court of Common Council accepted that bill, because it went towards a reform such as they desired, and was good as far as it went, but still feeling that it ought to have embodied a reform of the Court of Aldermen.

98. Was the bill submitted to the Court of Common Council as well as to the Court of Aldermen?—Certainly. Then comes a resolution to prosecute the occupiers, although that very year the corporation went to Parliament to ask that occupiers should be recognised as equal with the freemen. In that very year, when by that bill they proposed no longer to ask the redemption fine from shopkeepers who were non-freemen, they actually proceeded to prosecute occupiers, by a vote of the Common Council, because they were carrying on trade, not being freemen; and at the end of 1852 the City officers prosecuted thirty-four tradesmen of the City of London, and succeeded in obtaining five judgments, against Henry Binfield, of Old Fish Street, Thomas Etheredge, of 167, Aldersgate Street, Henry Gentry, of 28, Bow Lane, Edward Hancock, of 124, Cheapside, and R. L. Parry, of 33, Leadenhall Street.

99. May not the authorities of the City of London have thought it right to enforce the law, as long as it was the law, though they may have considered it proper to seek for an alteration of the law itself?—The Court of Aldermen has hitherto constituted the resisting power to the will of the Court of Common Council that those men should be prosecuted. The Court of Common Council seem to have been generally for prosecution, and the Court of Aldermen to have resisted their will. I hold in my hand a corporate report, bearing date 21st of October 1852, which, I think, will throw some light upon that point.

100. Do you mean that no such prosecutions had taken place for some time previously to those which you have specified?—For some time previously, certainly; certainly for several months. During the whole period that this bill was before the corporation there were no prosecutions. It does not occur to me to state with certainty how recently anterior to the proposal of this bill prosecutions had been instituted, but probably at no very distant date; but they were few and far between.

101. As the law now stands, no person can exercise any retail trade in the City who is not free of a company?—Who is not free of the City; he may be of trade of which there is no company.

102. If he belongs to a trade of which there is a company, must he also belong to that company?—The question is, whether the company prosecute to compel him; it depends upon that.

103. Where a person exercises a retail trade of which there is a company, is it the general practice for the company to prosecute him if he does not belong to it?—It is the general practice of poorer companies; I think I may state that it is the general practice; but it is more especially the practice of the poor companies, who seek to add to their funds by such means. For instance, the merchant tailors, the goldsmiths, and the other wealthy companies are not so likely to look after a man for the plunder they can get from him by compelling him to take up his freedom as the cooks, the butchers, and the other smaller companies, who would be very glad of an addition to their funds.

104. How is it with respect to the corporation; do they generally allow a person to exercise a retail trade in the City without being a freeman of the City?—The general practice is for ward inquests to return lists of occupiers, not being freemen, carrying on business in the wards, and then the ordinary routine course (though not invariably adopted) would be, that the City officers should be directed by the chamberlain to summon those parties, in order to compel them to take up their freedom. Sometimes months will transpire without such case occurring; at other times they come in batches.

105. Then the general practice is to compel every retail trader to become free of the City?—It is certain that the corporation claims the right, but it is certain, also, that it does not always compel; and when it seeks to compel, it does not always succeed.

106. Were those prosecutions successful?—They were. I believe, in most instances, the parties took up their freedom; in some, where they did not, they went to judgment; in several cases, they sold up the goods of the party. In the case of one member of our association, they sold his goods, and his complaint is this, that when they took his goods out to auction, and sold them, they sent him back a sofa, as a part of what remained after they were satisfied, and never to this day have they returned him any account of the proceeds of the sale, or of their demand upon him.

105. Is there any doubt as to the law upon this point?—I think not.

106. Then if the facts are clearly proved before the court, would not there be a conviction as a matter of course?—They go before their own court, in which their own judges preside, and they are sure of a conviction,

107. What is the court to which they go?—The Lord Mayor's Court.

108. Assuming that the law itself is impolitic and ought to be repealed, yet as long as it exists it is enforced against any persons in trade; would it not seem to be just that it should be enforced equally against all engaged in trade?—It may be equality that injustice should be done to all rather than to a few, but that does not make it justice. If what is legal be universally felt to be an injustice, the attempt to enforce such equality has often been the commencement of a revolution, and such attempt has given birth to very angry feeling, which does exist among the masses in the City of London. I was about stating, that in October 1852, after that bill had been rejected, the freedom committee of the Court of Common Council made a report to the court, which report I think I need not trouble you with, because there is a short letter from the City solicitor attached to it, which, I think, explains the point. "To the Worshipful the Freedom Committee: "Gentlemen,—I have the honour to certify that, in obedience to your directions, I caused "letters, as approved by your committee, to be sent to the several persons named in your "lists; but, before the time specified therein had elapsed, the attention of the Court of

1st Nov. 1853.

"Aldermen was drawn by one of its members to several resolutions, passed by that court "at different times, in relation to this subject, from which it appeared that the order of "the 24th of June 1848, rescinding the resolution of the 21st of January 1845, which had "restrained the chamberlain from instituting actions against non-freemen, had been itself "suspended in its operation by a resolution of the 10th of October 1848; and it appearing "to me that the latter resolution had that effect, in concurrence with Mr. Chamberlain, I "have thought it my duty to report the facts to your committee before I proceeded to "act upon your former order, as it had been passed without your attention having been "called to the latter order." This letter arriving in the Court of Aldermen after the Court of Common Council had instructed their officers to proceed against non-freemen, the Court of Aldermen directed the chamberlain to take no further proceedings; and this was the state of things in which the two courts were at issue. Then that bill, which was brought into Parliament, seems to me to be a compromise. If the Court of Common Council will concede that occupiers shall not be compelled to take up their freedom, and if you will not interfere with the constitution of our body, we will consent to the passing of the bill. The bill was therefore proposed with the concurrence of the two branches of the corporate legislature, but it was rejected by the House of Commons.

109. The livery interfered and procured its rejection by the House of Commons?—Yes.

110. The bill does not seem to affect the constitution of the Court of Aldermen one way or the other?—It does not touch them. Then, at the end of 1852, those thirty-four actions were taken and settled, and at the commencement of 1853, the present year, in the months of March and April, 4,032 proceedings were instituted against as many occupiers to compel them to take up their freedom.

111. Can any one bring one of those actions against a non-freeman?—I think not.

112. Can any freeman?—I think not; I do not see what right a freeman has to compel a non-freeman to pay a redemption fine. A freeman may not, according to the City law, employ a non-freeman so long as another freeman is willing to be employed. If a butcher who is a freeman employs a butcher who is not free, another butcher who is not free can inform against him, and procure the infliction of a penalty of 5*l.* upon him.

113. Do you mean if he employs a man as a journeyman?—Yes; of which I have a case to submit to you. But first, as to those 4,032 occupiers. I am one of that unfortunate number. 4,032 summonses were issued at one fell swoop in the months of March and April of the present year. On the 27th of July, at the Court of Aldermen, one of their worships, not liking what had appeared in the newspapers, brought the subject before the court, and had the clerk of the chamber called before them, and although the clerk of the chamber did, in answer to questions, deny that what the aldermen said had been published was the fact, yet the aldermen said that had been published which had not been published, and Mr. Sewell, the clerk of the chamber, went on to give the particulars of those 4,030 actions.

114. Where do you read this from?—From the "Times." He said, in effect, in a few words, We did, in March and April, issue 4,032 summonses; 414 of those parties have taken up their freedom, which, at 3*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* each, will give 1,352*l.* 6*s.* addition to the funds of the corporation. 764," continued the clerk, "required time, pleading poverty, and time was given them." But the clerk does not state that for that accommodation he charged the poor creatures half a crown a piece, which is insurance money for those two weeks. Here is one of the declarations allowing two months in one case, and here is another in another case where the half crown was paid (producing the same). 764 half crowns brought 76*l.* 8*s.* in fees to the clerk of the chamber, because they were poor.

115. Is that the present fee?—I believe it is the present fee taken behind the back. Mr. Sewell states that 164 were privileged, which I believe means that they were occupiers in certain privileged parts of the City. There are certain parts of the City which are privileged; they are within the City, but the inhabitants of those places are free to keep a shop without being compelled to take up their freedom. The legal officers of the corporation ought certainly to have known that.

116. What are those places?—Blackfriars was one, which belonged to the Monastery of Blackfriars. St. Bartholomew the Great and St. Bartholomew the Less have, to this moment, gates at each avenue, which are closed every night. There is also the liberty of Glasshouse Yard, a part of the parish of which is within the city and yet is not part of the city. As I have said, there were 164 of those privileged persons who were, nevertheless, by the learned advisers of the corporation, summoned to take up their freedom; there were 1,998 either dead, removed, or contemptuous, of which latter class I was one; and 698 who claimed exemptions. I do not know on what ground those 698 claimed exemptions, but I am here to state that the corporation have summoned a number of actual freemen to take up their freedom. It is a charge which I prefer against the corporation, that it does not know who are its freemen; that it is ignorant of its commonalty; and, therefore, in summoning 4,032 persons, it appears to have summoned 698 who claimed exemption. I have a list of persons here who are freemen, on the burgess list of the wards, and recognized as freemen by the aldermen of their respective wards, but who are, nevertheless, by the corporation sued and called upon to take up their freedom. That is not the only evidence upon which I assert that the corporation has no sufficient register or roll of its commonalty. What could be more absurd in a joint stock company than that it did not know its partners? here you have a corporation, mayor, aldermen, common councilmen, and commonalty, and the authorities of that corporation appear not to know of whom the commonalty consists. It is requisite on this particular day, the 1st of November, that the aldermen of each ward should sign a list of the municipal electors; a municipal elector is a freeman, the occupier of a house or premises rated at 10*l.* who is on the parliamentary register. It is easy to know who is an occupier, but the first question is who is a freeman. The ward beadles have to supply the ward clerks with this information; the ward clerks have to put such list before the alderman for his signature, and when it is so signed it is issued as the municipal list of that ward for the year ensuing. In those wards, not knowing who are freemen, the beadles have for some weeks past been issuing circular letters calling on the occupiers to say if they are freemen. Their method of making out a list of freemen is, to issue, as in Broad Street Ward, that document (producing the same), signed by the beadle; and in Aldersgate Ward this, (producing it), signed by the ward clerk, calling upon the occupier to say whether he is a freeman, and if he is a freeman to inform the corporation of what company he is a freeman, in order that he may be put on the municipal list of his ward. One would suppose that the municipal corporation of the great commercial City of London would at least be men of business; but this assuredly does not look like the usual course of business that they are unable to indicate to the world who are the commonalty of the City of London and the constituents of the corporation itself. Then there is this other evidence of the same fact. In the ward of Tower, of which Alderman Finnis is alderman, who is a highly respectable gentleman, and who, being the alderman, happens to be a very conscientious gentleman,—I may say more, a gentleman of a very sensitive conscience,—he, on being required to sign the list, asked, "Are these the only freemen in the ward?" and on being told "We really do not know who are freemen," he said "Then I will not exclude any others by signing this limited list;" and Alderman Finnis has, upon principle, always signed as the list of the freemen of the ward of Tower the parliamentary list of electors of members of parliament. Instead of signing the limited list of, perhaps, 150, he signs the list of 600. He says, "If I am bound to act, if I must do wrong one way or the other, I will do wrong in this way, so that no one shall say I have robbed him of his freedom. I will put you all down and then let them strike you off if you have no right to be there." Is this the situation in which the corporation of the first city in the empire should be, that when they summon their commonalty to take up their freedom, one of their number should have to put 400 who are not freemen along with the 150 who are freemen, calling them all free rather than fall into the other extreme.

1st Nov. 1853.

117. This is the act of a particular individual, is not it; it is not the act of a corporation?—It is the act of a corporate officer.

118. Of a single corporate officer?—Not of a single one only, but of several single ones.

119. Is his example followed by any other parties?—Partially so. I am not exactly prepared to say to what extent it is followed, but it is partially followed by the lord mayor elect, Mr. Alderman Sidney. It is the common practice for the beadles so to make up their lists. It was not so till attention had been drawn to the question. So long as the corporation thought, nobody cares whether we know or not who are our freemen, they said we will take for granted this list is right; but since there has been a stir in the matter, they find they must make out some sort of list, and now that the Act of 1849 requires that they shall every year make out a list of their freemen, and publish it, their inquiry is, since we must make out a list somehow, how are we to do so? Send the beadle round the ward, and tell him to ask everybody if he is free or not. Alderman Finnis says, "This does not satisfy me, and therefore I will take an extreme view of the case, and put everybody down though they may not possibly all be free."

120. In what way does it become the duty of the alderman of the ward to take care that the list is made out correctly?—I am not impugning the conduct of the alderman of the ward. He is put into that false position by the negligence of the officials of Guildhall. They not having a legal and sufficient muster-roll of their commonalty Alderman Finnis could not help himself.

121. What steps should those officials have taken to obtain a more correct list, which you very properly say is exceedingly desirable?—They ought always to have registered a man who had become free; they ought to have registered him under a ward arrangement, and they ought to have transferred him to the list of the beadle of the ward in which he resided.

122. In short you complain that the method adopted was an unbusiness like way of proceeding. How, in your opinion, should the list have been prepared?—I do. There would be no more difficulty in securing a correct list than in posting articles from a day book into a ledger. The only difficulty I have in answering the question at the moment is, that I have not thought of it. Certainly there should have been a regular register of names. When a freeman died the beadle should have returned the death of that freeman to the chamber at Guildhall, and the clerk of the chamber should have erased the name from the list.

123. Are the beadles generally intelligent persons;—Yes; intelligent in their class.

124. Are they generally taken from an intelligent class of life?—They possess sufficient intelligence for their duties generally.

125. In the Report of the Municipal Commissioners they advert to the omission of which you complain, and say they have not been able to ascertain the precise number of freemen. Their words are, "No list exists by which the number of those who are free can be ascertained." Do any of the numerous statutes or charters affecting the City make any provision on the subject?—I think not. Here is a body having officials to whom they pay 100,000*l.* a year in salaries, and it seems extremely difficult to imagine that they could not if they would devise a sufficient arrangement for obtaining a correct muster-roll of their commonalty. Nothing can be more simple. Any sergeant of a regiment would know how to keep the muster-roll of a company.

1st Nov. 1852.

126. Do you know whether any steps are in course of being taken to remedy those defects of which you complain?—The step I have alluded to has been taken, of the beadle sending round those notices; nothing beyond that has been done, so far as I am aware.

127. The Commissioners understand that before March 1835 no person could be admitted to the freedom of the City without the intervention of one of the companies, but that in that month the Court of Common Council passed a resolution to the effect that persons might become freemen of the City without being members of a company. Is not that so?—Yes; on paying 5*l.* instead of 25*l.* as a redemption fine.

128. Do you know the ground on which that resolution was passed?—I assume it to have been consequent upon the municipal inquiry by your predecessors, who expressed a very strong feeling upon the subject.

129. The resolution must have been adopted previously to the report of the Commissioners?—Possibly; but the corporation of the City of London has great influence, even at the west end of the town, and when the Commissioners had made their inquiry their feelings must have found some expression. Corporate witnesses being the only witnesses, or nearly so, examined, the Commissioners could hardly have failed to have expressed their views at the time, or if not the general tenor of the evidence might easily have been ascertained.

130. Do you believe it was competent to the city by an ordinance of the Court of Common Council to make that alteration in their constitution?—I think it was. I should be very sorry to affect a knowledge of law which I have not, or express an opinion on legal points upon which any person might say my opinion was worth nothing; but I have always thought that if the livery companies profess that they are not part and parcel of the corporation, which they do, it should follow that the corporation has the power of making an ordinance to allow the admission of individuals to the freedom of the City of London without the intervention of the livery companies. If they are not part and parcel of the corporation, why should they intervene between the authorities of the corporation and those who wish to become members of the corporation?

131. The Municipal Commissioners make this remark upon the subject: they say, "The method by which persons become free appears to us highly objectionable. The corporation possesses a very slight, indeed hardly more than a nominal control over the companies; and these latter, whatever may be or may have been their importance or value as independent corporate bodies, possess no one feature from which we can discover any advantage in compelling freemen to belong to them. This part of the system is in fact no more than a troublesome and capricious method of taxing the inhabitants of London for the emolument of the companies." Does that appear to you to be a correct description?—It is, with one exception. As to the use of the companies, it will not be denied that in their origin they were very useful; that as taking the control of all the members of their trade in the City of London they might well exercise a beneficial authority over them. To prevent, for instance, dishonesty on the part of members of any such trade as towards the public with reference to the quality or quantity of the goods vended there may have been required some special authority with special knowledge of the subject; and as those livery companies were then really what they now only profess to be, trade companies, so the united members of those companies were specially qualified to exercise a judgment, and therefore to exercise a controlling power over every member of the trade having a shop in the City of London. But now that it is not so, except in a very few instances,—now that gentlemen at the west end of the town desire to be merchant tailors, because the merchant tailors dine well, and do everything very handsomely on all occasions,—the companies have lost their trade character. You have gentlemen who do not know, for instance, what the trade of a lorimer is. I dare say there are members of some of the other companies in the City of London who know very little of trade at all. The trade companies have thus ceased to be what they were originally intended to be, and have become merely joint stock companies, interested in certain private property, part of it held in trust for charitable purposes, and part of it absolutely, a large portion of which is spent in the gorgeous hospitality for which they are so renowned. Whether the companies might ever again become useful in the objects of their original conformation or not may be a question. I do not think they could be under the altered circumstances of the times. I think we need no trade companies. But they are guilds, as they say, independent corporations, and they do possess private property to an enormous amount, and they do hold in trust charities to the extent of 60,000*l.* or 70,000*l.* a year, and they are therefore independent bodies; whether members of the corporation or not is another question.

132. Do you see any advantage in maintaining any connexion between the municipal franchise and the companies, as regards the municipal government of the City?—The livery companies include, perhaps, about 10,000 members, of whom some 7,000 are on the parliamentary register as liverymen. Of those 7,000, about 2,000 are also on the parliamentary register as occupiers. Hence the inference that about 5,000 of those 7,000 live in the suburbs of London, and are not occupiers in the City. They are gentlemen who perhaps have realized an independence in the City, and who, not liking to live very far from London, the scene of their labours, retire to the suburban villas.

133. You do not apprehend that many of them, being liverymen, occupy houses of less than 10*l.* value in the city?—No; the occupancy of an office is enough. There is scarcely even a room in the City of less than 10*l.* value. An empty room at the top of a house is worth 4*s.* a week. Those 5,000 liverymen are not occupiers in the City of London, and yet under the Parliamentary Reform Act they are electors as liverymen. They may be reasonably supposed to be well conversant with the interests of the City of London. They are liverymen of the City of London, and they have most likely realized whatever property they possess in the City, and they live in the immediate neighbourhood of London, and it would seem to me rather a harsh proceeding that those liverymen should be excised from the parliamentary register.

134. Confining the question now simply to the municipal franchise, without going into the inquiry as connected with the parliamentary franchise, do you see any advantage in the existence of a connexion between the companies and the possession of that franchise?—I think there should be no occasion for a man to pass through the sieve of a company in order to become a freeman of the City of London.

135. In your opinion, is it desirable that the municipal franchise should be in any way dependent upon a connexion with a trading company?—Certainly not; inasmuch as the trading companies have lost their use, and there can be no longer any necessity for them as a voucher of the propriety of admitting any one into the citizenship of London. I take it that was the origin of the connexion. They guaranteed that such a man was a baker, and that he was a proper man to become a citizen of London, by their having admitted him a member of their incorporation. But since the companies have ceased to be really trade companies, there is no appropriateness in their intervention.

136. Would it not be objectionable that the franchise for the election of members of Parliament should be much more extensive than the franchise for elections for municipal purposes?—Yes; but the liverymen cannot live for ever; they must die off; and would it not be better to put up with that apparent inconsistency for a few years, than do an injustice to some thousands of individuals?

137. The fact appears to have been that before the year 1835 no person could be a freeman of the city who was not a member of a company. Since the year 1835, a freeman may be a member of a company, or he may not be so. You propose that the freedom of the City should be made altogether independent of the companies?—It is so. I can go to-morrow, and take up my freedom, without being a member of a company.

138. Still, being a member of a company, you may become a freeman?—I am not aware that there are any members of companies who are not freemen. I believe they are all freemen; at the same time I am aware that the clerks of the companies do not so readily answer the question.

139. At present the freemen are a mixed body?—They are. There are seven kinds of freemen.

140. Some of them are members of companies, and some are not members of companies. Is not that the case?—It is.

141. Do you propose that, in future, the franchise should exist altogether, without reference to whether a person is a member of a company or not?—I do, certainly. At the same time, I am not now putting before the Commissioners a scheme for the proper government of the City of London. I would rather that my views upon that question should come as a corollary, and as the result of a consideration of the various subjects into which the question has been divided. I will now recall your attention to the position of the Tower Ward. There are 604 municipal voters in the municipal list issued by the alderman, and the number of persons rated at 10*l.* in the ward is only 587; so that not only has Mr. Alderman Finnis put parliamentary electors who are not freemen on his municipal list, but he has also put on his municipal list those who are not 10*l.* occupiers, or people in another and adjacent ward, for you must be a 10*l.* occupier to be a parliamentary elector, and you must be a parliamentary elector in order to qualify you to be on the municipal list, and yet on the municipal list there are 604 qualified 10*l.* occupiers freemen, and who are entitled to be, and are, on the parliamentary register, while by the return of the corporation itself there are but 587 10*l.* occupiers in the ward; so that the whole system is an anomaly. I was stating just now, that there are seven classes of freemen. I think you will see that in their Report the Royal Commissioners of 1834 say there are two classes of freemen; but in fact there are seven classes. There are freemen of the corporation who are not rated at 10*l.*, and therefore not municipal electors. There are freemen of the corporation who are rated at 10*l.*, but not being on the parliamentary register are not municipal electors. There are freemen of the corporationwho are rated at 10*l.*, and on the municipal register, and are therefore municipal electors. By the term "corporation" I mean the corporation independently of the companies. Then you have freemen of the companies who are not rated at 10*l.*, and therefore are not on the parliamentary register, and not on the municipal register. You have freemen of the companies rated at 10*l.*, but not in the parliamentary register, and therefore not entitled to be on the municipal register. You have freemen of companies who are liverymen and parliamentary electors because liverymen, and you have freemen of companies who are liverymen, but who reside beyond seven miles, and are therefote not parliamentary electors.

142. But they are municipal electors?—They are municipal electors in Common Hall alone; they are not on the municipal list, because to be on the municipal list a man must be on the parliamentary register. Beyond the ward municipal list, there is the companies' livery list, which is the sole qualification of a liveryman in Common Hall. That, I believe, would make an eighth description, if it were necessary to give it. I have said enough however to show that there is great confusion and difficulty in the matter, and that it is most desirable that a ready solution of the difficulty should be found. The tendency of prosperous commerce, or rather the tendency of the City of London under a prosperous state of commerce, is to a decrease of the municipal constituency in the more commercial portions of the City of London. Land becomes more valuable. Warehouses become more necessary. The larger wards, that is the wards without, increase their population, because their inhabitants are drawn from the central wards, where the property is more valuable, in order to the construction of warehouses in the place of houses and shops, and thus as the wards without increase in their population the wards within decrease in their population. The inequality of the wards is a matter of notoriety, and this process tends yearly to increase that inequality, because the wards without, which are always so much larger than the central wards within, become larger every year, and the wards within become, numerically speaking as to population, smaller every year. The consequence is that the constituency of a central ward becomes smaller and smaller,—so small indeed as to appear ridiculous. If you look to the municipal voters in each ward in the third column of the analysis I beg to hand in, and if you look in the second column to the number of common councilmen representing those municipal voters, and then look to the fourth column, you will find that in the ward of Queenhithe, for instance, every twelve occupiers send a member to the Court of Common Council; in the ward of Vintry every thirteenth occupier is a member of the Court of Common Council; in the ward of Bread Street every thirteenth occupier is a member of the Common Council. Go to Farringdon Without, and you find every member of the Court of Common Council for that ward represents fifty-one individuals. In the case of Bishopgate, he represents thirty-four individuals, but it is a miserable constituency! What an anomaly it appears, that the ward of Queenhithe, for instance, with 350 persons, occupiers, and rated at 10*l.*, should be misrepresented by twelve of the 350, and that those twelve should send a member to the Court of Common Council, to sanction proceedings against the 337 if they do not take up their freedom. In the ward of Bread Street, which is one of those to which I have adverted, where each common councilman represents but thirteen constitutents, there was once a contest for the office of alderman. In that contest 6,000*l.* pounds was spent upon a scrutiny.

143. What was the date of that contest?—I think it was about twelve years back. It was a contest between Mr. Hughes Hughes and Alderman Lawrence. They reduced the number of voters till I think one had eleven votes and the other ten. The learned gentlemen on either side agreed that if they went on in that manner, certainly they could, at an enormous expense, reduce those votes five each, or perhaps six each; and the question was, who was to give in. It was settled, I believe, rather by chance than on the merits. But to talk of a representative system under such a state of things, to contend for one moment that a municipality of this description can be taken as a fair sample of the constitutional rights and principles of freemen, is an absurdity. It is clear that the system cannot last, and that it is decaying daily and naturally by the increase of our commerce, and the decrease of our constituencies. No corporation upon such a system could long last, however good of its kind it may be; but seeing its unpopularity,—seeing the bad feeling naturally existing between a majority of the occupiers who are not freemen, and the miserable minority of occupiers who are freemen,—it cannot but result in this,—that you will have to recommend a very extensive alteration indeed in order to the proper government of such a municipality as the City of London.

144. Do you think it would be desirable to diminish the number of the Court of Common Council?—It would be very desirable very greatly to diminish the number of our representative body, call it what you may.

145. Supposing the limits of the City to remain as they are, what do you think would be the proper number for the Court of Common Council to consist of?—I am not quite sure that there should be a Common Council in our present acceptation of that term. I would rather, however, reserve my view as to remedial measures till you have the whole case fully before you. We look upon the corporation as a body opposed to every liberal extension of commerce. If that be so, and if commerce is a specialty of the City of London, no wonder that commercial gentlemen of the City of London should be in a position of antagonism to the authorities of the corporation. The London Docks were opposed by the corporation at an enormous expense, because they held that the establishment of docks would interfere with their receipt of money from ships in the Pool.

146. Do you mean that the corporation is too much separated in point of feeling and interest from the leading merchants of the City of London?—My impression is this:—The corporators of London, common council men and aldermen, are of the shopkeeping class; and, entertaining the conviction, as I do, that counter transactions in small coins have no tendency to give a man an enlarged view, or habits of viewing in a large sense any interests which he may be delegated to promote, such men, I believe, have not the power of promoting them, and therefore they are not qualified for the offices they fill.

147. Can you suggest any mode of connecting more closely the corporation of the City of London with the great merchants of London?—I think I can, but I am not prepared to do so. I desire to put before the Commissioners a case on which you shall be warranted in the conclusion that the corporation as it is is so bad as to be utterly irremediable under the present system without a thorough change of system, and then, when you shall have arrived at that conclusion on the evidence before you, you will no doubt seek in the wisdom of gentlemen experienced in the matter their views of the best means of supplying a remedy for the abuse which exists in the corporation itself. The corporation is an anti-commercial body. They refuse to assist in the formation of docks when they are necessary for extending the commerce of the City of London. They opposed, at an expense of, I think it was, 7,000*l.*, the extension of the Blackwall Railway to the City. It was something dreadful in their eyes that people should be brought to their place of business. After they were beaten upon that point in 1835, in the year 1845 or 1846 when the Direct Manchester Company was formed for bringing a railway from Manchester direct to London, and when an application was made to the Court of Common Council for permission to bring that railway into the City, the corporation resisted it. I believe Mr. Ashurst was one of the solicitors of that company, and Mr. Ashurst was a member of the Court of Common Council. He specially retained in the same interest another solicitor, the present Mr. Alderman Wire, then also a member of the Court of Common Council. Both Mr. Ashurst and Mr. Wire were very prominent and very influential members of the Court of Common Council at that time on the Liberal side. The North-western Company became extremely fearful lest the Direct Manchester should obtain access to the City, and they should be excluded, and the North-western then exerted itself to establish an influence in the councils of the citizens of London, opposed as they had heretofore been to anything so useful as railways approaching the City walls. The North-western Company retained Mr. Lambert Jones, then a member of the Court of Common Council, I believe of the adverse political party. Those gentlemen, Messrs Ashurst and Wire on the part of the Direct Manchester, and Mr. Jones on the part of the North-western, united their influence, extended their forces, and eventually established a majority in the Court of Common Council. It was a money influence which was brought to bear upon the Court of Common Council, and the Court of Common Council was converted.

148. Is not the corporation in the habit of expending its corporate funds in conducting the opposition to private bills before Parliament?—I should prefer that you asked Mr. Recorder that question.

149. Do you know whether, in the cases you have mentioned, the opposition proceeded from the Court of Aldermen or from the Court of Common Council?—Certainly; the opposition could not have been exclusively from the Court of Aldermen. It must be recollected that the Court of Common Council has the aldermen among its components. It is composed of the lord mayor, aldermen, and Court of Common Council; a very anomalou sstate of things, by-the-bye; some of them being responsible, being annually elected; others being irresponsible, being elected for life.

150. Do you not think there may be a disadvantage in giving the command of large funds to a body which represents only a small portion of the metropolis, for the purpose of opposing bills before Parliament which affect the whole of the metropolis?—Indeed I do think so. Every man in the City of London sees it, who looks and thinks.

151. Is not it conceivable that in some instances the corporation may have represented the feelings of its own local constituency, and at the same time may have opposed measures which might have been beneficial to the entire metropolis?—That is what has often been the case; and then it has sometimes happened that public opinion has been brought to bear upon the selfish narrow-minded views of the corporation. I should be very sorry to be misunderstood in what I have said in reference to those railways to which I have alluded. I do not say that Mr. Wire and Mr. Ashurst and Mr. Jones could have turned the corporation round from exclusiveness to liberality, if the public feeling had not been at their back; but it does necessarily follow that public men should take the matter up, and in the City of London that they should have reasons for taking it up. Those gentlemen had good reasons for taking it up: two of them as the legal advisers of the company, and the other as the paid surveyor of the London and North-western Company, to the tune of several hundred pounds. They had their reasons for inconveniencing themselves to ventilate public opinion in the Court of Common Council, and they succeeded. When at the time of the panic the Direct Manchester wound up, and when the North-western had nothing to fear from the rivalry of the Direct Manchester, or from its possessing exclusive access to the City of London, the North-western cooled upon the question of the expediency of bringing a railway from Euston Square into Farringdon Street, and the matter dropped. The corporation, in the absence of similar inducement, and similar activity to keep them right, went back; and became once more antagonistic to anything like the admission of a railway within the city walls. As the Commissioners may recollect, in a recent instance, in reference to the Great Central Railway Company, they have over and over again declared that it ought not to come into the City of London. Public opinion, however, at last triumphed, and then the Common Council declared it to be very desirable it should, and there was a sum of between 200,000*l.* and 300,000*l.* voted to assist the railway company to realise its purpose, and bring the northern lines to a terminus within the City of London. In point of fact if you have a parliament of shopkeepers, and among them a fair sprinkling of men of mind, as various and opposite circumstances actuate those men of mind to motion you will find your parliament of shopkeepers blow east to day, west to-morrow, north the day afterwards, and south the day after that.

152. Is not it a peculiarity of the parliament of shopkeepers which you have been speaking of, that it represents only a small portion, either in population or area, of the metropolis?—It represents but a small portion of the area and a small portion of the population of the metropolis; and more, it represents but a minority of area of the population and of the rateability of the City of London itself.

153. Nevertheless that corporation is the only municipal body in the metropolis, and it wields considerable power, and possesses a very large income, which it can use for public purposes?—Non constat that it is a good one, because it is the only one or that it is powerful and wealthy. It is one of the complaints of the City of London, that the Government did us great injustice at the time of the Municipal Reform Bill. We have not yet been able to understand why, of all the municipalities of the empire, London alone should have been exempted from the wholesome influence of reform. I do not say that the Municipal Reform Bill is as applicable to London as to Birmingham, or Manchester, or Leeds, or Hull; but I say the citizens of London had reason to expect, after the lengthened investigation, and the very elaborate report, that the Legislature would have given them some and sufficient municipal reform. I will now draw your attention to the anti-commercial dues which are imposed upon British commerce by the corporation of London, and which are by them exacted from British commerce. The corn metage alone last year amounted to 9,596*l.* The City of London claims the right to measure everybody's corn by its own bushel, whether they want it measured or not; for that is the grievance. If the Corporation of London claimed the right to measure your corn when you wished it measured, provided they would measure it as accurately and as economically as anybody else it would be perfectly consistent with the free-trade notions of the present day; for if their measure were not as good as another person's, or their charges were more extravagant than another person's, you would not give them your patronage. But they claim the right to measure your corn whether you require it measured or not. If you send corn from your granary in Yorkshire to your store in London, they claim the right to measure that corn, though you do not want it measured. You may not want to know how much corn there is in the hold of your ship, or you may know it from your clerk in Yorkshire who transmits the invoice or account of the quantity of corn shipped.

154. Is corn measured without there being a sale of that corn?—Yes.

155. Merely upon its entering the City of London?—Yes; that is the very case of Combe, Delafield and Company, between whom and the corporation of London there has been now actions and legal processes pending for, I think, fourteen years, and I should think they are likely to continue for another fourteen years, unless you, by your report, shall induce the Government to put an end to such abuses. I believe the question raised in the case of Combe, Delafield and Company to be a simple one. They malt their barley out of London; they transmit it from their malthouse to their brewery in their own barges. The corporation interposes, and says, We insist upon measuring that barley, or that malt. They say, We do not want it measured; we can check our clerks at the malthouse; we do not want the assistance of the Corporation of London to help us to keep our own accounts straight between the malthouse and the brewery. The corporation, however, claim, I suppose under charter, the right to compel Messrs. Combe, Delafield and Company to submit to the metage of their barley, or their malt, whenever they bring it into the Port of London; and more than that, that it shall be portered by a company established by the corporation of London as privileged porters. The metage upon corn in London makes such a difference to the importer that instances have occurred, I believe, frequently of cargoes, in order to avoid metage, being sent from the Thames, without breaking bulk, round to Liverpool, to be there discharged. Only permit a sufficient amount of that grievance, and you cannot be surprised if Liverpool rises in the extent of its commerce, and the commerce of London declines in proportion. But assuredly the commerce of London cannot have fair play under such a system of oppression. Upon the river Lee I perceive there is a charge in the Finance Report for last year, in addition to the salaries of the officers there, for so much per barge upon 870 barges going up that river subject to metage by the corporation of the City of London. What then must be the magnitude of the metage, and what the amount of inconvenience to which the trade is subjected in the entire of the Port of London in the course of the year?

156. Is such metage actually performed, or is it merely a name under which a fee is demanded?—In the case of Combe, Delafield and Company it is a name for this description of service. In that case the men sat at a public house close by, and when the malt was measured by other persons they charged for porterage. I think the rulers of the Free Fellowship Porters Company are now suing Combe, Delafield and Company for 10,000*l.* for porterage never performed, except in this way: The porters were in the public house; they looked on, and kept a memorandum from day to day of how many barges were unloaded, and then taking an average of the barges they said, We are entitled to porterage upon so many thousand quarters of your barley, or your malt.

157. Has the house you speak of petitioned or complained to the Common Council or the Court of Aldermen of these proceedings?—I should think not; I should think it would be of little use. It is one corporation, composed of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; that corporation directs its officers to institute these proceedings, and that corporation pays year by year hundreds and hundreds of pounds to the city solicitor for the expenses of carrying on those legal proceedings against the house of Combe, Delafield and other houses similarly circumstanced.

158. You stated that the house of Combe, Delafield and Company dispute the legality of those charges?—Certainly. There are two proceedings against them, one by the corporation for metage, and the other by the Company of Fellowship Porters for porterage not performed.

159. Has neither of those questions been decided yet?—Not yet. I was about to illustrate the extent of this corn metage nuisance, by referring to the city tolls, the tolls on the carts of non-freemen, entering the City of London, or the carts of freemen having in them goods, the property of non-freemen; I believe the charge is 2*d.* It is a very small charge in itself, but it amounts in the year to several thousand pounds. I think the amount was 5,810*l.*, for 1852. That, however, is not the amount exacted from the public by those tolls; but that is the amount received by the corporation, as rent for the tolls, paid by people who contract at so much a year for the toll, at this part of the city, and so much a year for toll at another part of the city. It is not the amount, therefore, by which you are to measure the oppressiveness of the toll, as regards the public.

160. It is the same system, is it not, which exists with regard to turnpikes?—It is.

161. Are those tolls put up to auction, year by year?—Not to public auction that I know of. I dare say they are let by tender; most of the property in the City of London is so let.

162. Where are the tolls taken?—We all know they are taken at Temple Bar; they are also taken at Bishopsgate Street, and in fact wherever there is an entry into the city, so that no person shall evade the toll, by running half way round the city to get in at another gate. The corporation do much the same as turnpike trusts do, to prevent a by-road giving parties an opportunity of evading the toll. I think if 5,810*l.* is received by the corporation for those tolls, it is not extravagant to say that the public must pay twice the money in actual tolls.

163. The expense of collecting, you think, comes to as much as the amount given for the tolls?—I should think so, including the profit of the collectors. The sum of 5,810*l.*, to say nothing of the difference between the rent paid and the amount exacted, will give upwards of 2,000 collections every day of the year. Therefore you have 2,000 stoppages of carts in the streets of London, of which we hear so often the complaint that they are blocked up, in restraint of trade, and in prevention of that free course of traffic, which is so essential in a commercial city like London. The corporation of London stop 2,000 carts a day, to take 2*d.* each from them; and those 2,000 stoppages of carts are without reference to the question of how long they may be stopped, when the parties stopping them have to ascertain what goods are in the cart, or whether the cart, being the cart of a freeman, has not within it the goods of some person not a freeman. You have, I say, those thousands of stoppages; every stoppage in itself a nuisance; the cause of continual quarrels and frequent fights between the man in the cart, and the man who stops the cart by catching hold of the horse to exact his 2*d.* And if this is the case with respect to the tolls on carts, imagine what it is in reference to the amount and magnitude of the inconvenience in the port of London in the exaction of this large amount of nearly 10,000*l.* in the meteage of corn; seeing that the meteage on the corn itself is a very trifling amount, and must involve therefore a very large extent indeed of bulk in corn, and of inconvenience to parties connected with the corn trade of the city.

164. Has the practice of taking 2*d.* upon carts entering the City of London been altered in any respect within the last few years?—There was an attempt on the part of Mr. Alderman Sidney to modify it, but I am not aware that it has been at all improved. All he could do was to leave the man to his remedy, and tell the officer he had no right to do it. What I am referring to occurred in a police case, where the party was left without his remedy, through the intervention of the sitting magistrate, Mr. Alderman Sidney. It was thought at the time that that would stop the practice, but I believe it has not done so.

165. Do carts belonging to persons well known, which are in the habit of entering the city, pay at the time of passing, or do the owners compound for the toll?—I believe they pay at the time of passing. In point of good policy, would not it be rather befitting the municipal government of a city like London to encourage those people who brought things into the City of London, rather than punish them by the exaction of a toll? Is not it in restraint of trade when we in the City of London require to be supplied with the necessaries of life, and have the means of carrying on the trade and commerce of the city, that there should be impediments thrown in the way? It is, as it appears to me, a monstrous evil, and certainly, in the words of the Common Council themselves, in that bill which was rejected last session, it is clearly in restraint of trade. In the year 1835,

I perceive the Government purchased of the corporation all the duties on package, carriage, bailiage, and porterage. I think the corporation received 162,000*l.*

166. Were those port dues?—I suppose they were port dues; and yet I can hardly imagine that, because we have still, in the statement of last year's receipts, an item of so much for water bailiage. Now if the bailiage here spoken of be port dues, you would think that purchase would have put an end to the exaction of water bailiage, which, however, appears in the corporate return. The item is, "By groundage and water bailiage on corn, 1,731*l.*"

167. Have you any further observation to make with respect to the complaints of the tolls taken by the corporation?—No. Before I leave the question of the freemen, I should have stated to you, as the result of this tabular arrangement, that the average constituency of each common councilman is twenty-nine; in some of the wards it being as low as twelve; and the average rateable property that each common councilman represents is 1,943*l.*, in some of the wards it being as low as 700*l.* Now 700*l.* rateability is seven inferior houses in the City of London. That being the rateable property which each common councilman represents, or any common councilman represents, it is not a very liberal specimen of what the representation ought to be. Then we come to the third head of the Commissioners' inquiry, namely, the governing bodies. Those governing bodies are three; the Court of Aldermen, the Court of Common Councilmen, and the Court of Common Hall.

168. Will you begin with the Court of Aldermen, and state any observations which you have to make upon that subject to the Commission?—The Court of Aldermen are tradesmen. I hope that it will be believed I say nothing invidiously of any individual of the corporation. This is not a personal question. It would be to degrade the character of this inquiry if we were to lose sight of the fact that it is the system which is to be inquired into, and not the men. There are twenty-six aldermen. The trades and professions of the twenty-six aldermen are mentioned in the paper I have before me. There are two auctioneers, two wharfingers, two stock-brokers, two builders, one ironmaster, one retired saddler, a china manufacturer, a bookseller, a silk manufacturer, a dry salter, a stationer, a retired lottery office keeper, a corn factor, a wine merchant, a coal factor, an upholsterer, a tea dealer, a print seller, a grocer, a solicitor, a clockmaker, and a salesman and banker. You have twenty-six aldermen of those trades. They are magistrates by virtue of their office, and are elected for life. They decide the validity of corporate elections, and even of the elections of their own body. The aldermen are elected from the municipal lists which are issued by the aldermen of the wards. There is a money influence frequently brought to bear in the election of aldermen.

169. What do you mean by a money influence?—I mean that money is paid by or for a candidate who desires to be elected an alderman of the city of London.

170. Do you mean that bribery takes place at the elections of aldermen?—I mean that there is corruption at such elections, be it in bribery or in treating. A certain expense is incurred, in order to induce men to vote for an alderman, who otherwise would nor vote for him; and seven of the present body, whom I am not now prepared to name, but which fact I shall be prepared to establish before you by satisfactory evidence if necessary, have been elected by a direct money influence, exerted by themselves through other parties; I mean by a money payment by themselves to other parties who did exercise an amount of influence to obtain votes which would not otherwise have been given.

171. Do you mean to state that in your opinion there is what may be fairly called a corrupt expenditure of money in order to influence the elections of aldermen?—There is no question about it.

172. Do you understand that the payments have been made by the candidates or by the aldermen themselves from their private funds, or that the money has come from other quarters?—I believe it to have come invariably from their own private funds. I have no reason for any contrary belief.

173. You say seven out of the present Court of Aldermen owe their election to pecuniary inducements?—I say I believe more than seven have done so, but I have good reason to believe that seven at least did so.

174. Do you believe that to be a recent practice, or has it been the practice for many years?—I believe it to have been the practice for many years, but not very recently.

175. Do you believe that the recent elections for aldermen have been purer or less pure than they were formerly?—I think there have been fewer cases of corruption recently than there were formerly, but that may arise from a variety of circumstances. A party may be a candidate for the aldermanic gown to whom there is no opposition, and where, therefore, there is little occasion for the introduction of a money influence.

176. Do you believe the wards differ materially with regard to their comparative purity?—There is no question about it.

177. Do you believe such money influence is more exerted in the wards of which the constituency is small than those in which the constituency is large?—I believe it is more easily exerted where they are small.

178. Is it in point of fact more exerted in those cases?—I believe it is.

179. Are you satisfied of it?—I am.

180. You say you are not prepared to name the aldermen who are supposed to have exercised this influence?—I am not to-day.

181. Are you prepared to lay before the Commission any evidence which would support your statement, or to indicate any means by which your statement may be supported?—Yes; I shall be prepared to produce before you witnesses who can establish that statement.

182. Probably those witnesses would name the individuals?—I have no doubt about it. An alderman possesses very considerable influence and very considerable patronage in the City of London, and he is a magistrate for life. It becomes an office, therefore, I will not say of ambition, which I would have it, but of desire on the part of individuals who have pecuniary means, and who may consider it an object of ambition to fill that office. Hence it will not be surprising that a money power should be brought to bear in that case as in so many others which which we are all acquainted, where influence and power are sought by similar means.

183. When a contested election takes place for the office of alderman, is there any such treating as there is occasionally in the election of members of parliament? Are the public houses open, and provisions given away to the voters?—Publicans, I believe, are very prominently the agents on such occasions. The municipal electors of the City of London, the local politicians of the wards, are to a far greater extent frequenters of public houses, smoking rooms and bar parlours, than are the occupiers who are not municipal electors. They herd together and frequent public houses. The publican has more or less influence with this description of men who elect the aldermen and other officials of the municipality, and hence the publican seems to present himself very naturally as an agent for bribery or corruption on those occasions, whether as the primary or the secondary agent. And it is the fact that he is so employed.

184. Do you believe that political considerations enter much into the choice of the alderman?—They did so when the division between parties was more obvious than it is at present. We have lived to see the amalgamation of parties to a very considerable extent.

185. You do not think that now the elections of aldermen turn much upon political considerations?—Not so much as formerly. It may be remembered what toryism was; it is not practically known in the city what toryism is.

186. Can you give the Commission any practical suggestions for the improvement of the election of aldermen in those respects to which you have referred, and which would have a tendency to remove or diminish existing sources of corruption?—I would make their office in the municipality of the City of London worthy of the ambition of a higher class of men, and I would create such a constituency, with such checks upon the exercise of the franchise, as might, with such better class of men, act as a collateral guarantee against the probability if not the possibility of the recurrence of the practices complained of.

187. Do you think it would be possible to induce the higher class of merchants in the City of London to accept the office of alderman?—I do not. I think the office of alderman carries with it so bad a name, and is in such bad odour, that no high class merchant of the City of London would like to be one of that body, or to bear that name.

188. The question supposes any obloquy which now rests upon the City of London to be removed by judicious alterations. Do you think in that case there would be a disposition on the part of the higher class of traders in the City of London to accept municipal offices?—I believe there would be a disposition on the part of the higher class of commercial men in the City of London to accept municipal offices, if the circumstances of the municipal government in the City of London were so completely altered as that none of the ill odour which now attaches in their minds to the Corporation of London should attach to them, in the opinion of their fellow citizens.

189. You think that they might be induced in such a case to spare the time and give the attention which it would be necessary to bestow upon those offices.—I do.

190. Have you any other observations to make to the Commission under this head?—The Court of Aldermen is an irresponsible body; that is, being elected for life there is no direct responsibility to the constituency. It does appear to me unconstitutional that the Court of Aldermen, without the consent of the Common Council, should have the power of voting away large sums of money.

191. What term of years do you think would be the proper period for the duration of the tenure of the office of an alderman. I do not like the aldermen at all as members of the municipality; that is, I do not think the merchants of London would like to be aldermen.

192. You would do away with the office of alderman altogether?—Certainly.

193. Do you see any advantage in the existing division between the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council, as distinguished from the ordinary constitution of municipal boroughs which have a single town council?—None whatever. You have here a Court of Aldermen, an irresponsible body, voting last year 36,000*l.* of the corporate funds,—I do not say for bad purposes,—and yet they are members of the Court of Common Council. In theory, the Court of Common Council, being the representatives of the constituency, hold the purse-strings; in practice, the Court of Common Council, of which the Court of Aldermen are components, vote a certain portion of the expenditure of the corporation; and the Court of Aldermen, in their own court, they being irresponsible to the constituency, voted last year 36,000*l.* of such expenses.

1st Nov. 1853.

194. In short you would merge the aldermen in the Court of Common Council in London, as is the case with other municipal bodies?—No. If by that question I am to understand that I am asked to approve of the Court of Common Council, with the mere merging of the Court of Aldermen into it, I say no. If I am asked, is it better that there should be two bodies than one body, merging the Court of Aldermen in the Court of Common Council, I should say one body would be preferable to the two.

195. You would get rid of the aldermen as a separate body?—Certainly, as a separate legislative body.

196. At present the Court of Aldermen is considered to be rather an executive body, and the Court of Common Council is considered to have principally a legislative character; is not that the case?—It may be so principally, but so small is the preponderance of either function that I think they are each in turns, and nothing long. One, I think, is quite as much executive as the other, and one quite as much legislative as the other. The Court of Aldermen, in their expenditure, vote sums of money as annuities to the daughters of aldermen who break up,—who fail, and become poor. One great inducement to become an alderman is that if, as some may anticipate, poverty should overtake them, there is always the little situation of chamberlain to fall into, with a trifling salary of several thousand pounds. In the accounts of money voted by the Court of Aldermen last year, I see an annual amount of 50*l.* for the relief and support of Louisa and Caroline Swain, daughters of the late Samuel Swain, Esq., alderman; 28*l.* 12*s.* to P. Armstrong, for the board and care of the said Caroline Swain, she being of unsound mind. To Hairiet Bedwell, third daughter of Mr. Alderman Swain, fifty-two weeks' allowance, at 1*l.* per week, towards her relief and support.

197. Were those sums voted in one year?—No. They are all paid in one year; but these are annuities. To Beata Elizabeth Macauley, daughter of George M. Macauley, Esq., late alderman, towards her relief and support, 30*l.* To Elizabeth Winchester, widow of Henry Winchester, Esq., late alderman, for her relief and support, 200*l.* To Mary Eleanor Gibbs, twelve months' payment, for her sole and immediate benefit, 180*l.*

198. Are sums of this description voted by the Court of Alderman without any confirmation by the Court of Common Council?—Yes; that is the very objection which I am urging. Assuming that they voted all the rest for the legitimate purposes of municipal government, which I deny, this is a very exceptionable item, seeing that it is voted by the Court of Aldermen, an irresponsible body, in favour of their late colleagues, or their widows or children.

199. Can the Court of Common Council pass money votes without the consent of the Court of Aldermen?—Yes.

200. And the Court of Aldermen can pass votes without the consent of the Common Council?—Yes.

201. Each one, then, with respect to money grants, is independent of the other?—Yes

202. What is the rule adopted with respect to the division of their powers in making votes of money?—I must refer the Commission to corporate witnesses for an explanation of that rule.

203. Would you propose that the management of the corporation funds should be intrusted to a committee of the Court of Common Council, instead of the present system?—No.

204. Supposing the Court of Common Council to be a body inconveniently large for the management of the accounts and expenditure, how would you propose that they should be managed?—The question troubles me. There is as much corruption in the Court of Common Council as can possibly be suspected of the Court of Aldermen.

205. Supposing the Court of Common Council constituted as you would desire it, you then probably would make the executive body a committee of that Common Council, and responsible to them?—Whatever municipal body may have the government of the City of London, whether the Court of Common Council or not, by whatever name it may be known, and however differently constituted from the present Court of Common Council, it is clear that, as they will be responsible to their constituents, the expenditure of the funds cannot be intrusted to better hands than those who are so responsible. I would in that respect refer you to the House of Commons, and ask whether any committee of the House of Commons is intrusted to make the expenditure necessary for the purposes of the national Government, and if not, I am not prepared to contend that a committee of a properly constituted municipal body for the government of the City of London should have that power.

206. The question did not suppose that the Common Council would part with the full control over the funds of their constituents. It was only put with the idea that some smaller body might be required for the management of the detail of those funds; and its object was to ask you, supposing there were no Court of Aldermen, whether you thought that function could be properly performed by a committee of the Common Council responsible to the Common Council at large?—Such details must always be referred either to a small body in the shape of a committee or to officers duly qualified, and giving sufficient guarantees for the faithful discharge of their duties.

Adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Wednesday, 2d November 1853.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE IN THE CHAIR.

JOHN INGRAM TRAVERS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:— J. I. Travers, Esq.

2d Nov. 1853.

207. You are a merchant in the City of London?—I am a wholesale grocer.

208. How long have you lived in the City?—From my boyhood.

209. Have you directed your attention much to the municipal concerns of the City of London?—No, I have not.

210. You have never belonged to the corporation, nor taken any part in its affairs?—Never in the slightest degree; but I am connected with one of the City companies; the fishmonger's company. I am one of the court of that body.

211. What is your opinion of the present condition of the corporation of the City of London?—I believe, in common with most of my class, that the corporation of the City of London is in a very unsatisfactory condition; it is unsatisfactory in its management, and in my belief is more unsatisfactory in its system, which is obsolete, old, and I think worn out; quite unfit for the requirements of the present day.

212. You are of opinion then that no partial reforms would meet the circumstances of the case?—I believe the best way would be to sweep away the corporation and the local government of the City altogether; that is the conclusion to which I have come.

213. Do you mean that you would sweep away the existing system, and substitute nothing in its place?—I would substitute for it a chamber of commerce, or something of that description, which should give a voice and nucleus to the commercial classes.

214. I suppose you mean a body that would only express opinions on purely commercial subjects, and not upon municipal questions?—On purely commercial subjects.

215. Would you have no municipal body of any sort or kind in the City of London?—No, I would not.

216. Do you believe that to be the wish of the majority of the inhabitants of the City of London?—I must ask first what you mean by the inhabitants of the City of London. I do not reside there; the class of men that are in the eyes of the Government the City of London are not absolutely inhabitants of the City of London; the City of London is mainly deserted now by such inhabitants; it is chiefly taken up with large warehouses and counting-houses. It is inhabited now merely by the smaller shopkeepers, and by the employés of the different large City firms. I believe, therefore, if you were to ask the opinion of the higher class in the City, they would agree with my own conclusion, that municipalities are unfitted for the requirements of commerce in this country at the present time; that they are certainly of no use to commerce; that we have long passed the necessity for a corporate or municipal government. But if you were to ask the opinions of the smaller shopkeepers, many of whom belong to the common council, I think they are strongly in favour of local government. They have many reasons,—many solid reasons,—for endeavouring still to keep the government of the City and the control of its very large funds in their own hands. They are quite aware that the upper classes in the City are too much engaged and too much occupied ever, under the present system, to interfere with them.

217. Your opinion then of the inexpediency of municipal institutions, does not apply solely to the City of London, but applies generally to the whole of the United Kingdom?—Certainly; I consider that we have long passed the necessity for municipal institutions; and as a proof of it, I would ask, whether in cases of public or private grievance, we ever hear that municipal corporations are appealed to. In case of a public grievance of any kind, a public meeting is called, and an appeal is at once made to the Government through the House of Commons. Before rapid means of communication took place in the country, I can conceive that municipal and local corporations were useful and necessary, but I do not think they are so now. I think they are a nuisance.

218. But supposing it should not be considered expedient altogether to sweep away, as you propose, the municipal institutions of the City of London, but to endeavour to alter them in such a mode as to render them more in accordance with the wants and spirit of the present time; are there any alterations in those institutions which you think it would be worth while to make?—I do not see any hope of inducing the more highly educated classes, engaged in commerce, to undertake municipal or local government. They have got to much to do, and they are too highly educated to profess to undertake that which they do not absolutely understand. How can a merchant act satisfactorily to himself as a magistrate? If he is a man of good education and knowledge of the world, he must know that a magistrate's position demands as lengthened an education as that of a merchant or any other person. How can he act as a commissioner of sewers, or as an arranger of streets, or as manager of police? To neither one subject nor the other has he ever given the slightest attention. He must know, if he knows himself, that he is not fit for such a post. We subdivide in business. If you were to come in to my house you would find we have ten or twelve different departments, and men are brought up and educated on purpose for each department, and we never dream of mixing these departments; yet you would call the whole a grocer's business. But you see a grocer, or a merchant, or a large trader professing to act as the chief magistrate of the City of London, when in all probability he does not know even the rudiments of magisterial law. He must feel that he is in the hands of a clerk, or lawyer, or solicitor; and after a length of time that clerk, or that lawyer, whoever he is, is the real magistrate, and really manages the man who pretends to be so, and who sits upon the bench.

J. I. Travers, Esq.

2d Nov. 1853.

219. Your objection would apply in some degree, at least, would it not, to the whole system of unpaid magistracy in England?—Yes, certainly.

220. At present, I believe, it is notorious that the higher class of merchants in London keep aloof altogether almost from the corporation affairs?—Most entirely; the men of high class in the City of London. Take Mr. Thomas Baring, who by common consent is supposed to represent the commercial principles and character of the City of London. What would be Mr. Baring's feeling if anybody was to offer him an alderman's gown? I conceive he would feel insulted.

221. To what cause do you attribute the feeling you have described?—Doubtless at the present moment it is that the office has lost the character that it once possessed; but I believe that beyond that there is a feeling on the part of every educated man, that the office itself is what we term a humbug from beginning to end; and that to ask a man in Mr. Baring's position to take upon himself the office or to perform the functions of an alderman is asking him to lend himself to support a system which in his heart he disapproves of.

222. But it has been represented to us that persons sometimes make great pecuniary sacrifices to obtain the office of alderman. It would seem from that that some substantial advantages are supposed to be connected with it?—I suppose there may be substantial advantages connected with the office; but the higher class of persons, certainly, in the City of London, do not aspire to any corporation office.

223. Supposing it was no longer necessary for the lord mayor to be chosen from among the aldermen; but that anybody connected with the City of London, either by residence or business, might be chosen to the office of lord mayor; do you think that in that case a higher class of merchants in London might be disposed to take the office of lord mayor for a year, although they would not be willing to become aldermen, and go through all the duties which belong to that situation?—No; I do not think that anything would induce the higher class in the City of London to undertake an office that would be at all of the nature of the present office of lord mayor.

224. In other corporations, according to the Municipal Corporation Reform Act, any person who is entitled to be upon the burgess roll, and is eligible to be a town councillor, may be eligible also to be mayor; that is, all persons occupying premises in the borough and residing within seven miles. Now, supposing that the constitution of the corporation of London were assimilated to that, and brought directly within the Municipal Corporation Reform Act, would that make any difference in the inclination of the higher classes in the City to serve as lord mayor?—No, I do not think it would.

225. Is it not the case that at Liverpool, for instance, merchants of the greatest eminence have accepted the office of mayor of Liverpool for a year?—Because the office of mayor of Liverpool gives of itself great commercial and political weight. In London it gives none.

226. Would not that state of things be altered when men of the highest eminence were selected for the office of lord mayor, and the circumstances connected with the office were so changed that they would no longer have the same indisposition to accept it?—But I do not think that you would persuade merchants of high standing in the City of London to accept the office of lord mayor if they were hampered with the present corporation, or any remnants of it. I am sure you would not get any man of high character to undertake such an office; nor would it be possible, in my opinion, to give to that office any political or commercial weight, if it is hampered with any remnants of the present corporation.

227. But if it became the habit of the citizens of London to pay the compliment to a great merchant, of proposing to him to be lord mayor, would it not soon in all probability become a distinction, of which a great merchant would be proud?—No; I do not think it would. I think it might be offered at the present moment to a hundred and fifty men in the City of London, and be refused by them all. The office of sheriff was lately hawked about the city; and in point of fact it was a great favour at last to get anybody to undertake the office.

228. Do you think that the feeling you have described arises in any manner from the present limited area of the city?—I do not think that that has much to do with it.

229. Supposing the limits of the corporation were enlarged, would that produce any increased disposition to accept the office of lord mayor?—It would depend upon the manner and the extent to which it was done. If you were to rob London of its commercial character, and to make an immense municipality of fifteen or sixteen square miles round, and to have the office of the lord mayor in Parliament Street, and not in the City, you would then invest it with a Government character, and you might doubtless get men of high standing to accept it; but it would very soon become a Government situation of necessity, there would be so much to do. You would require a man so well trained and fitted for the office, that of necessity it must become a permanent situation.

230. At Manchester, is not the situation of chief magistrate held by merchants of great responsibility and eminence?—There is no comparison between Manchester or Liverpool and London, either in the character of the merchants or of the offices.

231. Would you contemplate making the lord mayor of London an officer appointed by the Crown, like the préfet of the Seine at Paris?—I do not myself see why London could not be included in the general management of the government. If the Commissioners of Police are sufficient to undertake fifteen miles round London, I think they might include the City of London without any great additional staff or expense.

232. You would abolish municipal institutions altogether throughout the United Kingdom, and govern the towns entirely through the Home Office?—I am not prepared to say that I would do that throughout England; but I would begin with London.

233. Would not the reasons which you have given for doing that in London apply with equal force to other great towns in England?—No, not quite. For example, Manchester. The leading men of Manchester have a great deal of time upon their hands. The very nature of a manufacturer's business gives him a great deal of leisure; he brings a great number of men within one small spot, between whom a great amount of communication is absolutely necessary. In London the case is very different. The time of a London merchant is a vast deal more occupied than that of any provincial or out-port merchant; especially more than that of a manufacturer. The senior partner in a large manufacturing firm is in fact the capitalist; he has very little to do with the management of the details of the business; he is an adviser to his junior partners, and he has a great deal of leisure time upon his hands. He has not the same inducements to enter into society, and there are not so many other occupations for him in his locality as there are in London. The consequence of which is that municipal and local government may be much more satisfactorily and better carried on at Manchester, or at Liverpool, or at any of the out-ports, than it could be in the metropolis.

234. What are the principal municipal functions which the corporation of London do actually perform? Supposing, for instance, that your view were acted on, and that the corporation were swept away, what functions of local government would then remain to be provided for?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of the government of the City to enter at once upon an account of the government of the City of London, but there is no portion of the government which might not be absorbed in the general government of the country in a week's time, I conceive. There is the police; there is the management of the sewers, which is very unsatisfactorily done, &c. &c.

235. The management of the sewers is under a separate commission?—It is; but it is a portion of the corporation.

236. You have mentioned the police. Have you reason to believe that there is any inconvenience found in the distinct organization, with reference to the police in the City of London, which divides it in that respect from the rest of the metropolis?—My own experience does not enable me to say that it is absolutely bad in its working, but I do not think it is equal to the metropolitan police.

237. You think it would be better if the police of the City of London were absorbed in the general system of metropolitan police?—Yes, I do.

238. What is the ordinary business transacted by the common council?—That I can not give a guess at. I do not know what they do.

239. Do the objections which you have heard urged against the corporation of London refer mainly to the system, or to the conduct of individuals under that system?—My own observation would lead me to the belief that the system is very much worse than the management. Within the last few years, under the dread of reform, and the influence of of public opinion, the management of the corporation in the City of London has been very much improved. The system, I think, is much more to blame than the management in itself.

240. You mean that more care has been taken of late years to select efficient and respectable persons for offices of trust and importance?—I think that there has been a great improvement in the last ten years.

241. Do you consider the salaries of the paid officers of the City reasonable in amount?—I think they are high, but I do not think they are at all too high. You cannot have men of talent, and men of education, and men of character and position, without paying them highly.

242. Are the duties that they perform of sufficient importance to require persons of much experience and education?—No. I think that half the City expenses might be dispensed with.

243. Take, for instance, the office of chamberlain; is that an office the duties of which are weighty and arduous?—I believe it is the next thing to a sinecure.

244. The salary is considerable, is it not?—I believe it is; the salary and emoluments.

245. Are there any other officers of the same sort, of which the pay is considerable and the duties light?—I conceive that that is the description of most of the offices under the corporation; but I am not sufficiently aware of the details of the corporation management to be able to say which are the worst. Some of the officers have considerable occupation and work.

J. I. Travers, Esq.
2d Nov. 1853.

246. You have not particularly attended to the management by the corporation of their finances?—I have not.

247. As a merchant, have you any complaints to make of the management of the corporation with regard to tolls or other matters of that kind affecting commerce?—Yes; they are a very great hindrance to commerce. For example, in the case of green fruit. I am not aware that in my own business it operates against us, except in cargoes of green fruit, in which we frequently have obstructions and a great deal of difficulty, from the meterage, the City dues, and so forth.

248. In what way does the system affect the cargoes of green fruit to which you have referred?—Those matters are generally arranged by the wharfinger who may receive the ship's cargo; but the green fruit trade is especially under the management of the City of London, and there are officers appointed to measure and to levy a small toll upon certain descriptions of fruit.

249. Do you mean fruit imported from abroad?—Yes; nuts, oranges, and things of that description. I am only aware of it myself in nuts. There is a large trade done in foreign nuts, with respect to which we occasionally have complaints; but the wharfingers would be the persons to whom to apply upon that subject. I only hear complaints from other people.

250. But in your own personal experience, have you any complaints of any importance that you would wish to mention?—No; I cannot say that I have.

251. Do you see any advantage in making a connexion between the freedom of the City and the trading companies?—I see no advantage in it at all.

252. Do you see any advantage in requiring that all persons exercising retail trades in the City should be free of the companies?—No; I consider it a simple act of oppression.

253. Is that regulation now practically enforced?—I believe it is only in the case of the small people, and that the large fish go free.

254. Do you yourself exercise a retail trade?—No, I do not.

255. Is it not held that wholesale traders are not within the regulation?—Practically speaking, many of the wholesale traders certainly are not connected with the City of London in any way.

256. Has any attempt ever been made to enforce the regulation against wholesale traders?—I believe there have been attempts, and that they have been abandoned.

257. Are there not privileges with respect to porters, brokers, and other classes of persons in the City?—Yes; and a very great nuisance it has become to the City of London, and a very great drawback to its trade. The fellowship porters, and people of that description, make a monopoly of landing certain cargoes, and that has diminished the value of wharves in the City very considerably, because the same goods can be landed at a very much cheaper rate on the Southwark side of the river than they can be upon the City side. But again, upon that subject, a wharfinger would be a better authority.

258. Are you aware of any valid reason in favour of retaining those privileges?—No, I am not.

259. If the corporation were to be swept away entirely, as you seem to recommend, there would be an end of all questions of freedom, and everything of that kind; they would be swept away with it?—A most desirable consummation, in my opinion.

260. Are there any other observations that you are desirous of addressing to the Commissioners?—None; except to express my willingness, and I believe the willingness of the class to which I belong, to afford every assistance in my power to the objects and purposes of this Commission. I believe that feeling is entertained very generally throughout the upper classes, and the better classes of tradesmen and merchants, in the City of London; and I believe that this Commission has only to desire the attendance of any person, or any body of persons, and they will be most cheerfully and willingly obeyed.

The witness withdrew.

J. Acland, Esq.

JAMES ACLAND Esquire was further examined as follows:—

261. Have you any observations to make to the Commissioners with reference to the evidence that you gave yesterday?—I will state, in addition, with reference to the Court of Aldermen, that all aldermen are governors of the royal hospitals, the hospitals of Christchurch, St. Bartholomew, Bridewell, Bethlehem, and St. Thomas's. They also license the publicans of the City of London. As governors of the hospitals and as licensing magistrates they possess a very considerable influence, and in some instances an advantageous influence. With respect to the licensing of publicans, there is this objection to the aldermen exercising that power, that they are the elect of a very limited portion of the householders in their wards, and that the exercise of that power lays them open to a suspicion of partiality and preference. The system is not satisfactory.

262. Has it ever been imputed to the aldermen who act in licensing publicans that they have any pecuniary connexion with the brewing interest?—It has been said, and it is believed, that they have, in the persons of aldermen who are wine merchants, exercised a direct influence for personal purposes. I am not aware of any alderman being a brewer; but there are cases which are matters of common talk in the City, without any specific charge being made for legal investigation. The general popular belief in the City is that, if you can obtain the support of a certain alderman for this reason, and a certain other alderman for another reason, those aldermen will induce their brethren to allow their nomination of a candidate for a licence.

263. You used the expression that aldermen exercices an advantageous influence in licensing publicans. Do you mean an influence which they turn to their own advantage? When I used the words "an advantageous influence," I used them rather with reference to the other point; namely, that they are governors of the royal hospitals.

264. Your meaning then is that their position as governors of the hospitals gives them a certain patronage and power of recommendation?—Yes; for example, in Christ's Hospital there are presentations which are very valuable. I allude to those two circumstances of licensing the publicans and being governors of the royal hospitals for the purpose of explaining how it is possible and probable that an individual may be willing to expend some hundreds or thousands of pounds to become an alderman, that question having been asked by the Commissioners.

265. Have they any Church patronage?—They have.

266. Of any consequence?—They appoint to some of the livings in the City. Many charges of nepotism have been brought against the aldermen and the common council of the City of London. The rectory of St. Peter's, Cornhill, is in the presentation of the corporation, and a son of an alderman holds it. Whilst I am upon this point I will dispose of the subject of nepotism shortly, by stating that the chamberlain is an alderman, or was an alderman at the time of his election; the clerk to the sitting justices was late an alderman; the rectory of St. Peter's, Cornhill, is held by the son of an alderman; the governor of the Debtors' Prison is the nephew of an alderman; the vicar of Christchurch is the nephew of an alderman; the clerk to the fellowship of free porters is the nephew and partner of an alderman; the surgeon to the police force is the brother to an alderman's partner; the City comptroller was a common councilman; the City solicitor was a common councilman; the high bailiff of Southwark was a common councilman; the Commissioner of Police was a common councilman; the sword bearer was a common councilman and deputy; the secretary to the Irish Society was a common councilman; the two bridge masters were both common councilmen; the keeper of the Green Yard was a common councilman; the housekeeper at the Sessions House was a common councilman; the keeper of the Monument was a common councilman; the upholsterer to the corporation was a common councilman; the clerk of the Court of Requests was a common councilman; the superintendent of mooring-chains was a common councilman; the common crier was a common councilman; the fruit meter was a common councilman; the beadle of the Coal Exchange is the son of a common councilman; the clerk sitter is the son of a common councilman; the clerk to the navigation was the son of a common councilman; the Gresham lecturer on astronomy is the son of a common councilman; the City carpenter is the son of a common councilman; one of the clerks to the Commissioners of Sewers is the son of a common councilman; the messenger to the Irish Society is the son of a common councilman; the principal clerk to the Commissioners of Sewers was the son of a deputy; the clerk to the corn meters in trust is the son of a deputy; the district surveyor is the son of a deputy; the collector of City wine dues is the brother of a common councilman; the governor of Newgate Prison is the brother of a common councilman; the printer to the corporation is the brother of a common councilman; the Gresham lecturer on music is the brother of a common councilman; the water bailiff is the nephew of a common councilman. These things may be very considerably extended.

267. In whom does that patronage for the most part reside?—A portion of it in the Court of Aldermen.

268. Are they appointed by the court?—Yes, certain of them; certain others by the Court of Common Council, and certain others by vote of committees of the Common Council.

269. Are any of those officers appointed by the freemen of the liverymen?—The only officers out of the list I have read who are so appointed are the chamberlain and the two bridge masters; they are appointed by the liverymen in common hall. I state deliberately that this list might be very considerably extended; it has been hastily compiled, and such as it is I submit that it is evidence of a spirit of selfishness and of advancement of personal purposes, not to say of corruption, which is sufficient to justify the bad odour in which the corporation stands in the City of London. I am free to admit that there are in both courts gentlemen who would disown connexion with any such system as is illustrated in this kind of patronage. Of course it must be matter of general conviction that although the majority have thus rendered themselves liable to that charge, yet there always must be an honourable minority endeavouring as far as they can to resist the perpetration of such evils. The common councilmen are 206; not 240, as they were at the time of the last commission. There have been two material changes since that Report was published. The one is a reduction of the Court of Common Council from 240 commoners to 206, leaving always the twenty-six aldermen in addition.

270. How was that reduction effected?—By an ordinance of the Court of Common Council. It was done under the pretence of making a fair distribution, and certainly they have a less unequal distribution of representatives of the wards than they had before.

2d Nov. 1853.

271. Then, as as far as that went, it diminished the inequality of the representation of the different wards?—To a very slight degree; not at all satisfactorily.

272. Can you state exactly how it was done?—I can state how it was done by referring to the numbers of the wards given in this Report. The wards were not altered, but the numbers returned by some of the wards were altered.

273. Do you mean that the numbers returned by the smaller wards were diminished?—Generally so; that would be the character of the alteration. Aldgate ward has been increased from six to eight; Aldersgate has not been altered. Aldersgate had eight, and has still eight; it has 173 municipal voters. Now Aldgate ward had but six members, and had 227 voters. Therefore the addition of two, from six to eight, for Aldgate ward, does not fully compensate for the difference in the number of votes; but the tendency of the alteration was such as has been suggested, namely, to approximate more nearly or less distantly to a fair representation. The ward of Billingsgate was reduced from ten to eight. The ward of Bread Street, a small ward with only 106 municipal voters, formerly had twelve members; it has now but eight. The ward of Bridge, which had fifteen, has but eight. I do not see why Bridge ward should have so many as that, unless there be a portion of them for Bridge Without. The number of electors is only 153, which number of electors, dividing the electors by the members of the common council, for the ward of Bridge Within, gives but nineteen for each.

274. In short the general character of the alteration was to increase the numbers that were returned by the large wards, and to decrease the numbers that were returned by the small wards, and thereby to render the representation more equal?—I do not see that it has increased any of them, except the one I have mentioned, Aldgate, and Coleman Street. Those are the only two which have been increased. In other instances they have been reduced. There has been no increase made to Farringdon Without, which, whether as regards rateable property, or as regards the municipal constituency, is most inadequately represented in the Court of Common Council. The municipal constituency of Farringdon Without are 815, and it has but sixteen members, which gives fifty-one constituents to each member, whilst several of the wards even now have but twelve or thirteen to each member. The entire municipal constituency of the City of London is not one third of the occupiers of the City of London rated at 10*l.* and upwards.

275. Will you proceed next to state your views with respect to the Court of Common Council?—The Court of Common Council is composed of 206 members, who are elected annually, and twenty-six aldermen, who are elected for life. The municipal ward lists serve for the election of the aldermen, and serve also for the election of common councilmen. The elections of common councilmen are generally pre-concerted. In several if not most of the wards there are precincts which constitute a sort of sub-committee. At the precinct meetings, which are rarely attended by more than from six to ten or twelve, and very often not attended by more than two or three, the list is agreed upon of common councillors to be recommended to the court of wardmote. At the court of wardmote this list is represented as the list of candidates recommended, and it most generally consists of the old candidates. At those precinct meetings it very often happens that cakes and wine and other refreshments are provided for the few who are congregated in order to prepare this nomination list, if I may so call it. Then if any person be proposed as a candidate, he is proposed as a candidate against this nomination list, and he is put at the bottom of that list at the wardmote, in order to the taking of the votes for the election of the common councillors. He is considered an intruder; he appears to be an intruder. The preliminary committee of the wardmote, the precinct meeting, or where there are no precincts a clique of publicans (for they exercise very considerable influences in the election of common councilmen), pre-arrange who shall be the preferable candidates, and those candidates are returned directly in the case of precincts, indirectly in the other case to the wardmotes as the parties who should be elected. I am not aware of any case of direct bribery in the election of common councilmen. There is at all events the semblance of popularity and purity in the election of common councilmen, as compared with the cases of aldermen where there has been a contest, and where there has been money power exercised. But considerable influence is exercised by the common councilmen in the distribution of the enormous patronage which appertains to that body. That influence is exercised very generally in committees. It is an object with many individuals to become members of particular committees. Allowances are made to the extent of 2,825*l.* a year, I think, by the Court of Common Council to those committees; to some committees 200*l.*, to others 300*l.*, and so on. I think there are about twenty committees, many of them exercising very great powers, that is powers over very extensive properties.

276. Do you mean that the committee men are paid for their attendance upon the committees?—They are paid in meal or malt, in money for attendances, or in dinners, or in junkettings, swan hoppings, trips on the Thames, and a variety of ways in which this money is applied.

277. Is it usual to pay them so much a day for their attendance upon those committees?—In some of the committees I believe the money is wholly or in part applied to the payment of the members of the committee who attend the meetings of the committee.

278. Is that left to the discretion of the committee themselves?—I believe it is, wholly.

279. You mean that a certain sum is apportioned for the expenses of each committee, and that it is left to them to decide in what way that money shall be distributed?—It is so. The total of the money so allowed to the committees being £2,825. This system operates singularly to the hindrance of business.

280. Has each of those committees a clerk or secretary to attend to it?—Those committees appoint such officers as they deem necessary. Some of them have clerks.

281. Are those officers paid out of the sum which you have mentioned, or are they paid besides?—If they have clerks they are paid besides. But the officers of the corporation are always to hold themselves at the call of any of those committees. For instance, the city solicitor, Mr. Pearson, the deputy of the chamberlain, Mr. Scott, the comptroller, and the other officers are to hold themselves ready to advise or inform any of those committees.

282. Are all those committees all standing committees or are they committees appointed for special purposes?—Most of them are standing committees; some are for special purposes. For instance, there is the Wellington committee, called for a special purpose; there is the orphan school committee; and there is the markets committee.

283. In the case of the Wellington committee, do you apprehend that the members of that committee were paid for attending it?—No; I do not say that they were, nor do I case say otherwise. I do not know whether the common council in that particular voted a sum of money for that particular committee. I should think it most probable that they did not; but when it is a standing committee they then vote so much per annum to that committee for their expenses.

284. But in the case of the Wellington committee, could it not be known by the published accounts of the corporation whether they did or did not vote money for that special purpose?—No question of it. In the accounts of 1852 I find no such allowance. It is for permanent committees that those permanent annual sums are voted. A committee of forty members that had no such allowance voted to it has great difficulty in getting a quorum of members to attend. Another committee which has £400 allowed to it pleases to have an excursion to Kew or elsewhere, and it spends its £120 or £150 on such an excursion in the summer, and then, when they find that their money is nearly exhausted, in the autumn, they have the same difficulty or nearly the same difficulty in getting a quorum of the members together that the committee has that had no allowance. There was a deputation sent to Ireland some time since, and a sum of 400*l.* was voted by the Common Council for their expenses. They went to Ireland, it is true, but they had to spend the 400*l.*, and so they made a tour of the lakes till the 400*l.* was all exhausted.

285. I suppose they went to Ireland upon business connected with the Irish Society?—No doubt about it. Sometimes an instance occurs when a pile requires to be driven, and an inspection must take place, say some seven or eight or nine miles up the river, and the committee having this 400*l.* to spend on its pleasure, takes two or three days on the business. It goes to Windsor; it goes to Reading; the gentlemen take their wives, and it is a very pleasant thing. I mention these circumstances to show that there are ten thousand of these and similar inducements for men of small minds to desire to be members of the Court of Common Council.

286. Is it not understood that those grants of money are to be appplied to the public business of the committees?—It is distinctly understood that it is eating and drinking and pleasuring money.

287. You are understood to state that it is at the option of the members of the committee, either to take this money, which is allowed to them in consideration of their attendance, and put it into their pockets, or to spend it for purposes of common amusements such as you have referred to?—In some cases purposes of business, in many cases for amusement, as in the case of an inspection of a pile to see whether a pile shall be allowed to be driven under the Thames conservancy, or anything of that kind of business. In such a case, the business of going to inspect the pile is extended into the pleasure of going to Windsor or to Reading.

288. Do you consider the allowances excessive, if they were exclusively devoted to remuneration for the time employed in the attendance?—If you are to buy the services of people, by paying them for attendance in order to discharge these duties, the money is certainly very small; if you are not to assume a desire to discharge the duty without being paid for it.

289. Jurymen are paid?—Yes; jurymen are compelled to be jurymen. These men seek to be common councilmen.

290. Is the whole common council divided into committees, and is every common councilman necessarily a member of a committee?—No, certainly not; many common councilmen are members of several different committees. The great fight is to become members of those committees that have the most money to spend and the most influence to exercise. This is the nature of the corruption of the Court of Common Council.

291. How are the members of committees chosen; by vote of the Common Council?—Yes; hence the existence of an infinite variety of cliques in the Court of Common Council for the promotion of those particular objects of particular individuals. I am quite sure that when the Commissioners shall have witnesses from the corporation on these points it will only require the direction of the attention of those witnesses to these questions to have the fact at once admitted, and the answer, I believe, will be, that it amounts to only so many pence a day per man for his attendances spread over the whole year, or something of that kind. In 1849, the consolidated committee of the Court of Common Council made a report to the court. I have a copy of that report. I regret I have been unable to find it this morning. It is a very singular one, and I should not wish to misrepresent it; but the purport of that report was that the newspapers had of late said a great deal about the corporation in no very flattering terms; that the officers of the corporation had occasion frequently to have communication with Her Majesty's Government, and that Her Majesty's Government was thus led to misunderstand the objects and motives of the corporation; and that it was extremely desirable that a sum of money should be voted to the consolidated committee to enable them to put themselves right with the public through the press. That was the purport, in general terms, of the report of the consolidated committee in 1849 to the Court of Common Council, the object of the report being to obtain a grant of money which it was requisite that the court should vote to the committee. I believe the court received that report, and voted that the sum of 1,000*l.* annually should be allotted to the consolidated committee for the attainment of those purposes as set forth in that report. I believe those 4,000*l.* in four years have been spent. I believe they have been spent by the ordering of hundreds of papers on occasions where a newspaper has reported as they thought satisfactorily their proceedings. I am quite sure that during these four years the "Times" has not received one farthing of that money. I am quite sure the effect of the expenditure of that money is directly or indirectly to induce a paper to suppress that which is not favourable to the corporation, if known, and to give as favourable an account of their proceedings as by its ingenuity it is able to do.

292. Are not the details of the expenditure of this sum of 1,000*l.* laid before the common council, and afterwards before the public?—Certainly not; there are very many details of accounts of money expended by the corporation which are not published.

293. Do you know who has the management of the details of this expenditure. Assuming that certain copies of newspapers are purchased, as you say, who is it who decides which newspaper shall be selected, and what number of copies shall be taken?—The members of the consolidated committee.

294. Do you believe that the question is brought formally before the committee, and that they come to a vote upon it?—No; I think the committee would have some confidential agent. I think certain members of that committee would be very leading men in that committee. Committee business generally falls into the hands of two or three active individuals. I believe they have confidence in some of their officers, high or low, and that an intimation that there is a satisfactory report in such a paper to-day is followed by an order being sent for 500 copies directly. I believe in some instances application is made to them, "Will not you take so many copies of such a paper; we have a capital article in it in favour of the corporation." That is the necessary tendency of the system which is adopted.

295. You do not know who the particular individuals may be who manage this part of the business?—No, I do not. I should think it must be sometimes one individual and sometimes another. There are always officials about the Guildhall who are accessible to members of the committee to take orders and to execute commissions. The consolidated committee includes fourteen aldermen and the lord mayor.

296. Is it a standing committee?—Yes.

297. A common councilman is elected for one year only?—That is so.

298. Does it often happen that the same person is re-elected?—Very often.

299. Is that the general practice?—I should say so.

300. So that a common councilman serves for a considerable number of years in general?—Yes, till, promoted to some office in the corporation, or with the prospect of it, he retires in many instances; at other times he dies; but generally speaking he continues a great many years. Independently of 2,825*l.* allowed to the committee, there is the sum of 500*l.* for a special purpose; that is for a very stately procession on the Thames in a sort of gilded barge, when there is great good cheer, and, of course, the company of ladies, and the lord mayor, and all the paraphernalia of a corporate office; 500*l.* is allowed for that, in addition to the 2,825*l.* Very much of that 2,825*l.* is spent in the dinners of the committee and officers at the hotels, the Albion, or the London Coffee House, or the London Tavern; good fellowship prevails, and offices are obtained very frequently by the instrumentality of eating a great many good dinners with great regularity. A case occurred where a gentleman was very anxious to be chairman of an important committee; that is, a committee with much patronage. He was a bad eater. He was told, unless you attend the dinners more regularly you will never be chairman of that committee. He could not eat dinners, and he was not chairman of that committee, though, certainly, in point of talent and station, he was well qualified to have filled the office.

301. In general are you prepared to state that incompetent persons are placed in offices of importance and responsibility by the City of London?—Certainly not.

302. You think, generally, that the patronage is not ill administered?—Generally speaking, the higher offices are filled by men eminently qualified to fill them.

303. Do you think there has been an improved feeling of late years in regard to the selection of men to fill important offices?—I have no doubt that that is so to some extent. I am not prepared to say that at any one period fools were thrust into office. It is not the interest of anybody to be served by incompetent men. I am quite sure that since the last Report was published,—since the period when Lord John Russell announced his intention to bring a bill into Parliament to reform the City of London,—an announcement, however, which was never carried out,—the public attention has been so constantly directed to the corporation, public censures have been so general, that the corporation cannot but have seen the absolute necessity of minding what it was about, and being careful and vigilant, or more careful and more vigilant than it had been before, and, so far as it could, of getting out of the bad system of which it is the worker.

304. What do you say as to the choice of persons for subordinate offices?—Of the subordinate officers one is not so well qualified to judge, inasmuch as they do not come prominently forward. They may appoint a clerk to a situation of 150*l.* a year, who, probably, is not worth 80*l.* Still his want of knowledge and competence to the office is covered by the sufficiency of his superior, who takes the responsibility, and sees that the work is done in some way.

305. You can probably form a judgment as to the motives which determine the choice of persons to fill such offices?—I leave the Commission to form a judgment upon the motives from the list of appointments which I have read to them of sons and nephews of common councillors, and sons and nephews of aldermen and late aldermen, who are appointed to the offices. The list I have read is not a list of offices of high importance, although including offices of high importance.

306. Will you have the goodness to make any observations you may wish to make in regard to the common hall?—The common hall is a very ancient court of the corporation, and is invariably held in the Guildhall of the City of London, a most inconvenient place, because it is so large and so lofty that any speaker can scarcely hope to be heard there. It is, however, peculiarly fitted nevertheless for the sort of business which is usually there transacted, and where arguments are not of necessity an ingredient in the proceedings. The common hall consists of the liverymen of the various guilds of the City of London, whether occupiers or not within the City, whether rated or not, whether living seven miles from the City or living in the City, whether living in Edinburgh, in Dublin, or in the East Indies, provided they can get there at the time the common hall is held. There may be some 10,000 of those liverymen not upon the Parliamentary register, but upon the rolls of the livery companies. The Parliamentary Reform Bill requires that they shall reside within seven miles of London; but at whatever distance they may reside they are good electors at the common hall, provided they are on the livery of a guild. Of those 10,000, 7,000 and some hundreds are on the Parliamentary register, and residing within seven miles of London; the rest are either non-occupiers in the City of London, men of very limited means, many of them supported by charities of the guilds, and a considerable number residing at some distance, in fact, in most of the towns of the United Kingdom. The attendance at the common hall is commonly very small. There are not above 400 of the liverymen who take any general interest in the proceedings of the common hall, and of those 400 perhaps the usual attendance may be half that number, or something less. I have within the last few years been present at many common halls, although not a liveryman. I have been an observer at many common halls where the attendance has not amounted to sixty or seventy individuals; so that the functions of that court are exercised commonly by a contemptible minority of the liverymen, I should say by from 50 to 100, of 10,000 liverymen.

307. What are those functions?—Those functions are: the election of the lord mayor, the sheriffs, the chamberlain, the bridge masters, the auditors, and officers I think they call aleconners.

308. Probably the attendance is large when the election is contested and excites interest, and is small when it is a mere matter of form and excites no interest?—The attendance is rarely very large. The attendance is larger when it is anticipated there is a real fight to come off than when it is anticipated that the arrangement is preconcerted, and all settled beforehand.

309. That is the case with all bodies of electors, is not it?—It may be so; but in the present instance the elections are almost all arranged beforehand. The livery understand it well. There are those 400 men, who are at the beck and call of two or three or four individuals, who may be called the managers of the common hall elections. The common hall elections are generally conducted under a system of undisguised bribery and corruption.

310. Do you apply that remark to the election of lord mayor?—Not generally.

311. To the election of sheriffs?—I say the remark does apply sometimes to the election of lord mayor, but not generally. To the election of sheriffs it applies almost invariably; to the election of chamberlain and bridge masters invariably, or with very few exceptions; and the election of aleconners the same.

312. In what manner is the corruption practised?—I believe the corruption upon the present system commenced in the year 1831, when there was an election for the office of mayor between Sir John Key and Sir Peter Laurie. I think it was the election for the second mayoralty of Sir John Key. At that time Alderman Lucas, who was a very extensive lighterman, took a very prominent part in the election, and being a lighterman he was well known along the shores of the Thames by the people connected with the navigation and business of the Thames, who, under the corporation, must of necessity be freemen in order to hold certain offices, or members of livery companies, because the occupations of those people are corporate; and they must of necessity be liverymen to be members of the watermen's company, or fellowship porters, or any of those trades connected with the commerce of the Thames in the hands of the corporation of London. Alderman Lucas brought those men in large bodies to vote for his friend. The election cost from 12,000*l.* to 15,000*l.* for the two candidates, a very large proportion of which went to those men who are now called 'long shore men, though now they are not 'long shore men in the same sense that they were before. The 400 liverymen to whom I previously alluded are still called 'long shore men. The origin of the term dates from 1831, when Alderman Lucas, by the 'long shore men, effected the successful return of his friend, Alderman Key.

J. Aeland, Esq.

313. What do you mean now by 'long shore men?—We mean now all those liverymen who are to be bought for tickets of 1*s.*, or tickets of 1*s.* 6*d.*, who recognize their leaders in the self-constituted managers of those elections, and who, by preconcert, go to the hall on every occasion of an election to hold up their hands. There it generally terminates. When it comes to a contest it is taken out of the hands of the 'long shore men, and, of course, the great body of the livery are appealed to, and in most cases respond to the appeal.

314. Do you mean that the 'long shore men consider that they have performed their part of the bargain when they have held up their hands, and that they are afterwards at liberty to vote for whom they please?—No; but generally the holding up the hands settles the business; for this reason, the constituency being large, and being distributed over the kingdom, a real contest, that is, a poll, is a very costly affair, and it does not often occur that there is an election which is worth so contesting at so considerable a sacrifice of money.

315. Do those 'long shore men consist of one compact body, or are they divided into several bodies voting different ways?—The managers generally work together. The 'long shore men are not divided specifically into bodies, but each of those three or four managers considers that he has a superior influence over this man and over the other man, and he calculates that there are a certain number of voters whom he can bring up.

316. Have party politics anything to do with this organization?—In electoral matters the proceedings of the manager very seldom have any reference to party feeling; it is the open hand. The man's politics are not asked. The question is, how much can I make by the transaction.

317. In the contest between Sir John Key and Sir Peter Laurie, in 1831, in which you describe a large sum to have been expended, was the chief part of the expenditure, or any large part of the expenditure, for defraying the travelling expenses of the voters?—Wherever there is an election carried on to that extent by the liverymen, a considerable portion of the money is spent in defraying expenses. When I say a considerable portion, I mean a considerable proportion of the lesser half.

318. When you say this sum of money was spent, do you state that from common report, or had you any personal means of becoming acquainted with the fact?—I had no personal means of becoming acquainted with the fact. It is now twenty-two years back; but what then took place is no secret in the City. It is from common report I state it. There has been no secret of it made in the City, and the agents connected with the election have themselves avowed it.

319. Do you conceive that the expenditure is an illegal one?—It is not so considered in the City of London. In the City of London it is held by lawyers, among others, that there is no law against bribery at common hall elections, at all events; possibly at municipal elections. It is convenient to believe that in the City of London.

320. The Acts of Parliament respecting the election of members of Parliament clearly do not apply to municipal elections; but is it believed in the City that a municipal election procured by corruption is a valid one, and would be sustained in a court of law?—It is believed that no personal consequences will ensue,—disadvantageous to the party taking the bribe or giving it.

321. Supposing the validity of the election were brought in question before a court of justice, is it believed that the election would be sustained and held valid if corruption were proved?—Nobody asks the question. Who is to indict when all are parties to the transaction, or to similar transactions? There was an election in 1846 which cost the sum of 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.*, between Sir George Carroll and Mr. Thomas Wood.

322. Are the expenses of a contested election for the office of lord mayor or of chamberlain similar to the expenses of a contested election for a member of parliament? Are there agents employed, refreshment tickets given, and travelling expenses paid?—At an election for members of Parliament, if you bribe you get the man into a room by himself, and then bribe him. At an election in the City of London there is no necessity for such concealment; it is a matter of notoriety. If you go to the committee room of a candidate you can there ascertain what the market price of your vote is, whether it be half a crown or whether it be 10*l.*, and you can get it and take it.

323. Do you believe that open bribery, such as you describe, is ever practised at municipal elections in the City of London?—Beyond all question. It is a matter of notoriety, and no less a matter of fact, that the elections at common hall are almost invariably venal.

324. What is the most recent instance which you can adduce of an election in common hall, which has been conducted in the manner which you describe?—Bribery may be practised and is practised in two ways at common hall. Men are bribed to hold up their hands against the election of a man to an office which he does not wish to fill, and they are bribed again to hold up their hands in favour of the election of a candidate to an office which he desires to fill.

325. You have stated that in the case of a contested election of importance at common hall it is the practice for the committees of the rival candidates, without the least concealment, to give money to the electors who vote for their respective candidates. Will you state to the Commission some recent instance in which that system has been carried out in the City of London?—I drew the distinction between the two modes, expressly in order to answer the former question satisfactorily and fully. I believe the most recent instance of bribery has been in the election of the lord mayor elect, Mr. Alderman Sidney. I believe it was only to the extent of 200*l.* or 300*l.*

326. There were but two candidates proposed, were there?—Others would have been proposed, but that a sum of money was given to a manager of those 'long shore men not to execute his threat to put in nomination two others. Mr. Alderman Sidney is generally supposed to be a corporate reformer. It was believed in the City that it was not desirable that he should be lord mayor, and it was declared by an agent that he should not be lord mayor, for that two other persons would be named and elected, so that either Alderman Sidney would have been under the necessity of going to the great expense of a poll to secure his succession to the office, or two names, that of Alderman Sidney not being one, would have been returned to the Court of Aldermen from which to select the chief magistrate. The party who made this threat received a bonus. Under the inducement of that bonus he did not carry his threat into execution, and Alderman Sidney was therefore elected to the office.

327. Reverting to the statement which you made that it was the ordinary practice in the City of London, when a contest took place for an important office, that the committees of the rival candidates should openly and undisguisedly tender payments of money to those who voted for their respective candidates, can you state to the Commission any recent instance in which bribery in that form and to that extent has taken place? Bribery in that form has taken place in the last election to the office of chamberlain.

328. When was that?—This year. The candidates were Sir John Key, the present chamberlain, and Mr. Scott, the chief clerk,—the deputy chamberlain,—the man who does the business in the office.

329. It was rather a closely contested election, was not it?—Very.

330. Are you prepared to state to the Commission that upon that occasion there were committee rooms open for the two candidates at which bribes were openly and undisguisedly tendered to those who voted for them?—Certainly I am; I was an agent for one of the candidates.

331. Were you on the committee of one of the candidates?—No; I was a retained agent of one of the candidates.

332. Are you able and willing to state to the Commission what took place in that respect with regard to the candidate of whom you were an agent?—Certainly; money was given to parties for their votes.

333. For whom did you act?—Mr. Benjamin Scott.

334. Is it within your personal knowledge that during that contest money was given to persons who voted for Mr. Scott, in consideration for their votes?—Certainly; but I would state, in addition, that Mr. Scott was certainly the popular candidate. Mr. Scott had no occasion to bribe until the wholesale bribery of the other party jeopardized the election of the man who really had the majority of legitimate votes. Mr. Scott was the advocate of purity of election. It was only in consequence of the large amount of bribery practised on the other side that Mr. Scott paid to a very limited number of persons money for their votes.

335. Were those payments made by his committee without his knowledge, or were they made with his knowledge?—I have no doubt with his knowledge, because in the City of London it is not considered at all disgraceful to bribe at an election. It was always a question merely of the convenience of bribing. Of the necessity of it first, and secondly of the convenience. There was no necessity to bribe if the legitimate liverymen polled in sufficient strength for Mr. Scott as they did for a considerable portion of the time of the poll; but when the numbers were turned, and it was known, as we knew, and it will be proved before you, that Alderman Key was bribing largely, a small and insufficient effort was made to counteract it, and money was paid to several voters in the interest of Mr. Scott, and would have been paid to more if Mr. Scott had adopted the sound advice which was given him, namely: "You may win the election; it is only a question of another thousand pounds. We know they are bribing at such a price. We can much more easily get a man than they can, even at a somewhat lower figure. Are you willing to spend that additional 1,000*l.*?" Mr. Scott's answer was, "No, I have no more spare cash of my own; and although my friends would back me to any extent, I will not spend 1,000*l.* of their money."

2d Nov. 1853.

336. Was that extensive and systematic bribery on the part of Sir John Key, of which you speak, within your knowledge, or do you mention it only from rumour?—It is within my knowledge, in individual cases. Of course I had no access to the committee room of Sir John Key. It is within my knowledge, in particular cases, that parties were solicited to vote for Mr. Scott, but had been offered higher terms for Sir John Key, and afterwards accepted those terms, and voted. It is also, in a secondary degree, within my knowledge, from the information which I have received from the parties who were agents in the payment of money for Sir John Key.

337. Did Mr. Scott's committee believe that there was extensive bribery practised on the other side?—Certainly.

338. Did they act upon that belief? Did they take any practical measures during the election, founded upon the belief that there was extensive bribery on the other side?—If the question were thus varied, whether the committee or their agents took any such course, I say yes. On the knowledge of that fact such a course was adopted. Circulars were written to liverymen living at Bristol, living at Manchester, living at a considerable distance, informing them that their expenses would be paid; and in the City of London, by liverymen, that is always understood to mean that something more than the expenses will be paid.

339. What would be the effect of disfranchising all liverymen who do not reside within seven miles of St. Paul's?—Not materially to affect the question, The majority of those who come up from the country come from right feelings; I should say from feelings of desire for corporate reform. It is somewhat singular that this was an election in which the aldermen of the City of London took one side, and the general feeling of the reputable livery and even the bribed portion of the livery was on the other.

340. On which side did the aldermen vote?—On the side of their brother alderman, Sir John Key. The aldermen imagine that the chamberlaincy is an heirloom to their court for the decayed aldermen. They felt that it would be to break through that rule, and prejudice the anticipations of some of them, if, on that occasion, Alderman Key were not elected to the office, and nineteen of them agreed to find 100*l.* apiece towards turning the scale. Whether they paid it is another question.

341. Is it considered a great object to obtain the office of chamberlain of the City?—It is a very high office, with a very good salary, and with very large advantages, but very little to do. The duties of the office are very complicated; so complicated that it requires a man of great clearness of intellect, and great assiduity, and great experience in the office to discharge its duties. Worn-out aldermen are not therefore the best qualified persons to discharge the duties; and those duties are almost all of them discharged by Mr. Scott, who, upon that occasion, and for that reason, as having been acting chamberlain, and efficient chamberlain for many years, sought the office of chamberlain.

342. The principal, in fact, does not give much attendance or perform many duties, but the work of the office is chiefly performed by the deputy?—Chiefly so. He need not give much attendance; he had better not give much, for the proper discharge of the duties of the office, inasmuch as he is not so competent to discharge them as his deputy is.

343. If the emoluments of the office of chamberlain are returned at 2,500*l.* a year at the highest, do you believe that to be the extreme amount of the receipts?—I do not, by a very considerable sum. If you ask me what is the amount of the emoluments of the chamberlain, I confess I am unable to give a satisfactory answer, nor can I imagine that anybody can give a satisfactory answer, unless it be Mr. Scott, perhaps. The chamberlain himself might be the most competent person to inform the Commission, but I am not sure of that. The chamberlain has a privilege in reference to the balance in hand which is not clearly understood; indeed I dare say it is very complicated. I understand there is a balance of 70,000*l.* lying in the chamber of London, as it is called, which is the treasury, of which I can only give the Commissioners a general idea, sufficient, however, to lead them to a better source for the particulars. There was a certain fund, applied, I think, by Act of Parliament, to the buying up and exhausting of certain offices. They have all been bought up and exhausted, and I think there is a balance of 70,000*l.* left, which may be called no-man's fund, and which cannot be disposed of satisfactorily without an Act of Parliament specially for the purpose.

344. Does that balance stand in the chamberlain's name? Has he the use of it?—I believe he has the use of it. I am sure he has, to this extent, that if ever there be an expenditure of corporate estate funds beyond the assets in hand he has always the power of taking from that 70,000*l.* for a temporary accommodation.

345. Does this 70,000*l.* lie dormant, producing no interest?—No account is rendered of any interest produced. It is difficult to imagine that it is in sovereigns deposited in a chest; and one would suppose that there should be an interest produceable from that amount. I am not aware of any return being made of any accumulations of that 70,000*l.*, and I am disposed to believe that it must produce an interest, and that if that interest be not returned as addition to principal, then the chamberlain must have the advantage of that accruing interest.

346. Is that a subject which has never been publicly investigated in the common council or by any of the public bodies of the City?—I am not aware that it has, and I have been tolerably observant of the proceedings of the legislature of the City. Further details and information upon the subject can hereafter be procured from those who are bound to know something about it.

347. It is stated in the Report of the Municipal Commissioners that the chamberlain is "entitled, and indeed compelled, to retain a very large balance in his hands, in order "that he may be able to answer the calls made upon him from time to time. There is no "precise limit fixed to this balance, but we were informed that the annual profit accruing "to the chamberlain upon this balance fluctuates between 1,000*l.* and 2,000*l.*" ?—The Commissioners were so informed, I have no doubt, by corporate officials. In all probability some corporate officer made that statement. There were no parties then taking the interest in this inquiry which there are now; no cross examination was likely to ensue on the part of the Commissioners, who did not know the details, there being no adverse party before the Commissioners.

348. Do you think that is put too low?—I think it is put considerably too low.

349. The Commissioners of the year 1834 consider the mode of remunerating this officer, "by making his emolument dependent upon his dealing with the balance intrusted "to his care, very objectionable in point of principle." Are you aware whether any alteration has taken place in that respect since that time?—I am not aware of any alteration having taken place in that respect. I believe if it were not an heirloom of the Court of Aldermen no such system would be allowed to exist.

350. Is it the amount of remuneration received by the chamberlain that you object to, or the mode in which that remuneration is given?—Both. It is an office approaching very nearly to a sinecure on the part of the chamberlain himself.

351. The former Commissioners describe the office as one of great labour and of the greatest responsibility. Do you believe that to be an incorrect description of the office?—Certainly, inasmuch as the duties are performed by deputy. If they had spoken of the office of chief clerk to the chamberlain, it would have been a very accurate description of the duties. That is one of the offices where certainly there is a large amount of duty to be set against the salary paid; but it is not a duty to be set against the salary of the chamberlain, but against the salary of the clerk, the chamberlain de facto.

352. There is no office of deputy chamberlain referred to in the Report?—He is not called the deputy chamberlain.

353. He is the servant of the chamberlain?—Certainly, he is the servant of the chamberlain. An overture was made to Mr. Scott during the contest, that his situation should be improved pecuniarily if he would resign, and a threat conveyed that if he persisted in the poll after a certain time he would lose the appointment, for that the new chamberlain would appoint some one else. Mr. Scott did not resign.

354. Has he been removed?—He has not been removed. In fact it would have been a dangerous thing to remove a man who knows how to discharge, and who does discharge, the heavy duties of that office. There is no other person of experience who could have taken it.

355. The duties there connected with the office are very laborious and responsible?—Laborious in one sense; laborious in clerkship and in accountancy, and they are also responsible, because there is a mental weight pressing upon the mind of an individual acting with reference to such large accounts for such a corporation as that of the City of London.

356. According to your account of the chamberlain's office, the unsuccessful candidate, who receives a small salary, discharges the important and responsible duties of the office for the successful candidate, who receives a large salary?—That is the case.

357. What is it then which induces Mr. Scott to perform the duties of his principal?—He did not succeed in obtaining the office of chamberlain; he is pleased to remain; it is not for me to say why he remains. Non constat, if Alderman Key were to die to-morrow Mr. Scott might not be elected the next chamberlain.

358. By whom are the clerks in the chamberlain's office appointed?—Mr. Scott, the principal clerk, is certainly appointed by the chamberlain. I think Mr. Scott, if he has not the actual appointment, at least has a considerable voice in the appointment of the subordinate clerks, who are several. I know his brother holds one of the offices; perhaps one in immediate connexion with himself.

359. You state, that Mr. Scott, if he had been elected chamberlain, would have been fully competent himself to discharge the duties of the office?—Beyond all question.

360. Do you think in that case the remuneration attached to the office would be excessive for the officer discharging those duties?—Certainly. I think the salary now given to the chamberlain would have been an excessive addition to Mr. Scott's present salary, and I think that the amount of the remuneration paid to the chamberlain would be an improper and excessive salary for the chamberlain.

361. Drawing a distinction between the nature of the salary and the amount of the salary, do you think the amount of the salary of the chamberlain would be excessive to any one really and efficiently discharging the duties of the office?—Yes, I think so. I think that might be tested thus: Take the salary of Mr. Scott, for argument's sake merely, at 1,000*l.*, and the salary of the chamberlain at 3,000*l.*; would Mr. Scott discharge the duties of his present office, and the nominal duties of the chamberlain, for less,—not than 4,000*l.*—but less than 3,000*l.*?—He would discharge them for 2,000*l.*, I have no question, and they would be discharged just as ably as they are now discharged for the supposed 3,000*l.* and 1,000*l.*

362. Is not the chamberlain in a position of personal responsibility which no clerk or deputy can be?—No, he is not.

363. Why so?—He gives sureties, which Mr. Scott would have to give just as Mr. Alderman Key does.

364. Mr. Scott gives securities to the chamberlain, does not he?—Yes.

365. Is Mr. Scott paid by the City or by the chamberlain?—By the City. If the Commissioners go into that portion of the evidence now, they will find much more light thrown upon the subject than was thrown upon it 1834, when there was no antagonistic party.

366. Is there any advantage in keeping up a distinction between the constituency of the common hall and the general constituency of freemen?—I cannot imagine any. The right and power exercised by the common hall seems to me to hinge very materially upon the right of the freemen. The body of freemen at large should have, and could exercise as well, the power of electing those officers now elected by the liverymen.

367. Is there any reason, for instance, why the lord mayor should not be elected by the freemen?—I can see none.

368. You spoke of a general and open system of bribery as prevailing at municipal elections in the City; are you to be understood to apply that to common hall elections only, or to elections by the common council?—To common hall elections only.

369. Passing now to the office of lord mayor, are there any observations which you wish to address to the Commission upon that subject?—I think not. I would simply remind the Commissioners that I have already adverted to the elections for lord mayor in the years 1831 and 1846, in which there were contests. The lord mayor is generally elected in rotation. The liverymen are told to elect two men from whom the aldermen shall select one, and with only occasional exceptions the next aldermen in turn is one of the two elected, and is the one selected. There are instances where an alderman is not popular with his brethren, and they will pass him over. There have been contests many years back; but the general rule is, that the next alderman in rotation is the alderman elected to fill the office of lord mayor.

370. Do you think it would be useful that there should be a power of electing the lord mayor directly, without reference to the Court of Aldermen; that it should not be necessary that the lord mayor should be an alderman?—Always assuming that the present system is to continue, and there is to be a lord mayor, most assuredly it is desirable that it should be a direct rather than an indirect election.

371. Do you think it would be advantageous that it should not be necessary for the lord mayor to be chosen from among the Court of Aldermen?—Assuming it to be decided that there should be a Court of Aldermen, then I should say it would be a great advantage that the lord mayor should be eligible from the general body of the citizens, rather than from that very small and unpopular body of the aldermen.

372. Do you think that there would be no danger of persons of respectability being deterred from becoming aldermen, when it was rendered less certain that they would one day fill the office of lord mayor?—I think the objection to being an alderman, wherever entertained, is not entertained with reference to the possibility of having hereafter to serve the office of lord mayor, because the person in the office of lord mayor has an ample fund provided for him, and it not unfrequently happens that the lord mayor, by economy, can save 1,000*l.* or 2,000*l.* out of that fund.

373. Is not it now an inducement to a person to obtain the office of alderman, that he is likely hereafter to become lord mayor—I think it is with those to whose ambition such an office ministers.

374. If you were to diminish the prospect of obtaining that prize, might not it deter many persons from seeking to obtain the office of alderman?—Yes; the present class of aldermen.

375. The situation of lord mayor is a fair object of ambition to the citizens of London, is it not—It would be, and it should be, under such a corporation as the City of London should have.

376. Do you coincide with the opinion expressed by a witness who has been this morning examined, that it would be desirable to sweep away altogether the municipal institutions of the City of London, and substitute nothing for them?—Certainly not.

377. You think it desirable that there should be municipal institutions, only they should be of an improved character?—It would be, I fear, a rude answer to ask for a definition of the word "municipal," in the sense in which it is used.

378. The question refers to such functions as the corporation of London now exercise; such as are defined in the Municipal Act for England and Wales, and exercised by town councils in boroughs generally. Is it desirable, in your opinion, that there should be some corporation in London exercising those functions?—I think that there should be some such body, because there is this difference between the municipality of London and most municipalities in the provinces, that the corporation of London are trustees of an immense amount of property. I do not speak now of charity trusts, but of municipal property; property to be applied municipally for the benefit and good government of the locality. That is not the case in our new boroughs, and it is not the case to any very considerable extent in many of the old boroughs. In the City of London it is especially the case; for it must be taken, I believe, that all the City estates are held by the corporation only as municipal trustees, and that they are bound properly to administer to those estates, and I cannot imagine that any person can seriously argue that those estates are to go by the board, or that they would fall exactly within the business of a chamber of commerce.

379. Do you think the citizens and inhabitants of London would be satisfied to be entirely without municipal institutions, while there were municipal institutions at Liverpool, Manchester, and the other great towns of the country?—I cannot believe so; I cannot believe that the inhabitants at large would be satisfied.

380. Do you think it desirable that the lord mayor should be annually elected?—Speaking without reference to the present system, I think it would be preferable that the head of the municipality of the City of London should hold the tenure of office for a longer period than a year.

381. Probably you are acquainted with the provisions of the Municipal Reform Act?—I am.

382. By which the mode of election and the time for which aldermen should hold their offices are regulated?—Yes.

383. Are you to be understood to be of opinion that it would be advantageous to put the corporation of London under the same terms, and to bring them within the operation of the Municipal Corporation Reform Act?—No.

384. Why not?—That would recognize the continuance of the Court of Aldermen. There would be a certain number of aldermen who would go out of office triennially.

385. Under the Municipal Act are not the aldermen a portion of the town council?—Yes.

386. There is no distinct Court of Alderman under the Municipal Act?—I believe not.

387. If the constitution of the City of London were assimilated to that under the Municipal Act, the aldermen and the common council would be merged in one body. The aldermen would be annually elected, like the members of the common council?—A certain portion of them, those who have served three years, retire, and others come in for another three years, so that every year a third of them are elected.

388. They are re-eligible?—They are. I do not think, in the case of the City of London, that would meet what are the views of the most thinking men in the City, namely, that the corporation should be of such a character as that the higher classes of the commercial population of London should be induced to join it. For many years our merchants and bankers have held aloof from the corporation, when they have had every opportunity of joining it, had they pleased. I have arrived at a conclusion (rather adverse to my original feeling, which was that they ought to join, and make it right,) that nothing but the thorough reformation of the municipality of the City of London will offer a sufficient inducement to those gentlemen to lend their aid to the proper government of the City.

389. You state that in your opinion the inhabitants of the City of London would not be satisfied if they were deprived altogether of municipal institutions; supposing the corporation were reformed in such a manner as you would recommend, what advantages would the inhabitants of the City possess over the inhabitants of the rest of the metropolis who have no municipal institutions?—They would possess this advantage, that the municipal funds held in trust by the corporation would be administered under the responsibility of popular election.

390. Is not that the case at present in the parishes which administer their own funds? take, for instance, the parish of Marylebone; is not the vestry of Marylebone appointed by a popular election?—I spoke of funds held in trust, and I intended to convey by those words the funds which have descended to the present corporate trustees from times past, which are of a large amount. In the case of Marylebone, I take it the funds held in trust are funds collected from year to year by a rate, which involves the whole difference.

391. In fact, the great advantage which you consider the inhabitants of the City derive from municipal institutions, is, that they provide the means of administering the proceeds of the City property?—Which is the case now, but with a limited constituency, and therefore scarcely coming within the term popular election. By popular election I mean such an extension of the franchise as that every person contributing towards the municipal rates should possess the municipal franchise.

392. According to your view, the problem to be solved in reforming the corporation of the City of London is to provide a good machinery for administering the City property?—Chiefly so; excising the magisterial duties from the mere municipal functions.

393. Is there any other function of importance besides the management of the City funds, and the magisterial duties?—I think there are several; for instance, a power is vested in the corporation to impose tolls, and restraints and annoyances, upon the trade and commerce of the port of London.

394. Is that a beneficial function?—Certainly not. It is a function which ought to cease, and therefore the popular election of men to municipal offices, who under legal advice are told that that is the law, and who would maintain such incongruities, is not desirable; to prevent which, therefore, there should be an excision of those nuisances.

2d Nov. 1853.

395. Are there any considerations, in your opinion, connected with old historical recollections and associations, which would render the citizens of London unwilling to see themselves deprived of municipal institutions, and placed in the same situation with the parish of Marylebone or the parish of Lambeth?—I have no doubt there are feelings of that kind, which we all have. We are all what education has made us. I recollect as a boy I was a great admirer of the lord mayor's show. At present I have an utter contempt for it. I think it is a wasteful and foolish specimen of men playing the part of puppets to please the mob of the day. It certainly is not necessary to the proper administration of the affairs of the City of London.

396. If whatever was unsuitable to the ideas of the present day in the pageantry connected with the City of London were done away with, would not there still be a feeling of desire to support the proper dignity and even the hospitality of a corporation representing the greatest commercial city in the world?—But the ideas of different people vary very materially as to what constitutes dignity and true hospitality. They are not incompatible with common sense, and the proper conduct, in a commercial point of view, of the affairs of a municipality.

397. What do you think of the propriety of the public entertainments given by the corporation?—I think those entertainments have very often a political purpose; in some cases a political convenience. We are told in the City that it is very convenient for the minister of the day, dining at the Mansion House, to put affairs straight in the interest of his party with popular feeling, to ventilate the intentions of the Government with reference to public questions, and so on; but for the life of me I cannot understand why there should not be a better way of doing that than over a glass of wine after a public dinner. Good fellowship and good feeling is very often induced by conviviality; but, speaking as a man of business in the matter, I should say, let business be done before dinner, and if we have dinner let it be with no reference whatever to our business; and the honestest way is to pay for that dinner, and eat it, not charging it to the funds of the community.

398. Is not there a large grant made annually to the lord mayor expressly for the purpose of public entertainments?—There is.

399. Do you recollect the amount of it?—I believe it will be found that the allowances to the lord mayor will approximate to about 10,000*l.*

400. Is that always sufficient to cover the expenses of the lord mayor?—No; I think in the next mayoralty it will not be sufficient. I think in the present it may have been. In some it has left a surplus.

401. Do you consider that a justifiable expenditure, looking to the large revenues of the corporation, and the public purposes which it has to satisfy out of them?—I think it quite right that the chief magistrate of such a municipality should not have thrown upon his purse the heavy burden of maintaining the customary hospitality of the City of London. I am quite sure that very many might reasonably object, that they cannot afford it. I believe if the merchants and bankers were members of our municipality many of them would be much better able to afford it, and would prefer paying it from their own means to receiving it from the funds of the corporation.

402. The lord mayor's office is on the whole an expensive office, is not it?—Yes.

403. Is that the reason why it is an annual office, that the person holding it should not be called on to incur such expenses for more than a single year?—It is an expensive office in the abstract; but if more money be allowed than will pay the expenses, then, as regards the lord mayor it is not an expensive office.

404. Is not the office of lord mayor a cause of expense to the individual who discharges it, beyond and in addition to the allowance which he receives?—That depends upon the liberality of the lord mayor. Susposing the lord mayor, for example, were to say, I will have no lord mayor's show. Of course, if he were to say so before he were lord mayor, if I may use an Irishism, he would never be lord mayor. The aldermen would not elect any man to the office of lord mayor who would not do as they have done who have passed the chair, and as they mean to make those do who have yet to come to the chair, if they can; but if the lord mayor were to say, I will have no lord mayor's show, there would be a saving of 1,500*l.*, assuming that to be the amount, which I believe it is. He could then afford either to be more hospitable or more charitable, or he could afford to leave that 1,500*l.* in the chest of the chamber for the municipal purposes of the commonality.

405. Practically, does not the lord mayor generally find, at the end of his year of office, that he is a loser, and not a gainer?—I do not think so. I am quite sure no lord mayor who has saved money would tell you accurately what he had saved. To save money is not thought creditable in a lord mayor by his brethren of the aldermanic bench.

406. Would you wish to see the state and hospitality of the lord mayor altogether done away, or would you wish to see it reduced within narrower limits, and placed upon a different footing?—I would wish to see more of the state which appertains to the high character of the occupant of the office, and to the faithful discharge of his duties, rather than to the gewgaw and glitter which now hide defects, and scarcely embellish qualifications.

407. You are referring now to the pageantry which is incidental to the office?—I am referring to the general system of the mayoralty.

408. You would not object to decent hospitality, and even liberal hospitality?—Of course not; but wasteful profusion of trust funds every honest man should object to.

409. You were understood to say that you believed the lord mayor saved money sometimes. In the Report of the Commission is this passage: "The state of the office "is generally maintained on a very sumptuous scale; it very rarely happens that the "emoluments meet the expenditure; in the greater number of instances they fall short "of it by a very great sum. To what extent this takes place depends, of course, in a "great degree upon the individual holding the office; but we have reason to believe "that much unpopularity is incurred by attempts to contract the expenditure. The "excess of the outgoings above the income were represented to us as averaging 4,000*l*." —It were a delicate question to put to a corporate official, whether he thought the lord mayor exceeded his income, or saved money out of it, because it is considered in the corporation to be discreditable to the lord mayor to be supposed to have saved money out of the allowance. Nevertheless, it is believed pretty generally that not unfrequently the lord mayor does so economise as to save some money out of the large amount which is allowed him.

410. If the averages in excess be 4,000*l*., there must be some prodigiously extravagant lord mayors?—Or there must be extravagance in making that estimate.

411. Do the lord mayors differ very much in their expenditure?—Yes, very much.

412. Some are much more profuse than others?—Much more so.

413. Do you think it desirable that the office of lord mayor should be put in such a situation that it would be difficult for a man of moderate fortune to accept it?—It should not, certainly.

414. Whatever is the fair and legitimate expense of the mayoralty ought, therefore, to be defrayed by the public, and not by himself?—The fair and legitimate expense.

415. The sheriffs are annual officers, are not they?—They are elected at the common hall.

416. Are they put to any expense in the discharge of their offices?—The expenses of the shrievalty always exceed the allowance made by the corporation, and hence in the common hall elections more money is paid to the 400 'long shore men to vote against the election than to vote in favour of the election; and if there are three candidates, and two of them pay not to be elected, the third falls between the two stools to the ground.

417. In the Report of the Municipal Commissioners the Commissioners state that they have been told that on the average each sheriff has to expend 2,000*l*. beyond his receipts? —It is said to be so; it may or it may not be so; but certainly the expense of the office of sheriff greatly exceeds the amount allowed. There is, however, this set off, that the sheriff has the power of appointing the under-sheriff. The office of under-sheriff is a lucrative one; less so now, I believe, than it was formerly, but still lucrative, and still an object of desire among legal men; and this is the source of the immorality and corruption of the common hall elections for the office of sheriff. I hold in my hand a statement of the professions, trades, and occupations of the 206 members of the Court of Common Council. There are 21 lawyers; 14 stationers and papermakers; 13 spice, glass, lead, quill, spruce, cork, fruit, and other merchants; 10 woollen drapers; 8 carpenters, builders, and architects; 8 butchers and provision dealers; 7 bakers and pastrycooks; 7 oilmen and candlemakers; 7 auctioneers; 6 publicans; 6 grocers; 6 ironmongers and stovemakers; 6 printers and booksellers; 5 wharfingers and coalfactors; 5 tailors; 5 corn and flour factors; 4 jewellers; 4 wine merchants; 4 warehousemen; 3 undertakers; 3 lightermen; 3 surgeons; 3 chemists; 2 packers; 2 pawnbrokers; 2 engravers; 2 plumbers; 2 carvers; 2 brushmakers; 2 sailcloth factors; 2 accountants; 2 Berlin wool dealers; —and one of each of the following trades: horse dealer, saddler, toy seller, pianoforte maker, clothworker, carman, brassfinisher, poulterer, starchmaker, goldsmith, wireworker, perfumer, American agent, distiller, hat manufacturer, leather dresser, pin and needle maker, silk dyer, shipbroker, printseller, plate manufacturer, cloakmaker, importer of foreign goods, commission agent, silversmith, bootmaker, shirtmaker, umbrella maker, insurance clerk, and one of no trade or profession. The first item is the 21 lawyers, There are more lawyers than men of any other description in the Court of Common Council, for there are more legal offices to be filled which are in the gift of the corporation of London. Hence, in the list of the cases of nepotism which I mentioned just now, the Commissioners will see several cases of law officers who have been common councilmen and members of other branches of the corporation. The office of under-sheriff being lucrative, and it being requisite that it should be filled by a professional gentleman, the members of the corporation who are included in this number of twenty-one have been extremely active in endeavouring to procure such persons to be elected sheriffs as would appoint them to the profitable office of under-sheriff. From that circumstance has arisen the corruption practised in the election of sheriff in common hall. The originators of the system were lawyers; those who still pursue it are lawyers. It can be proved before this Commission that in many instances one professional member of the court has procured the appointment of many sheriffs, and has been their under-sheriff; and then, again, they are very often the agents to procure a rejection of the sheriffs who have been named; and in either case, and in all those cases, the business is done under those managers of common hall elections to whom I have before referred, who have, under the existing system, the control over those 400 reduced liverymen, who are the operative liverymen, and who are always ready, for some small consideration, to hold up their hands, whether for or against the election of the sheriff, and who, when a poll comes, are always purchasable at the market price, which may be as high as 10*l.*, as it was on the occasion of the election of the late chamberlain, where the price varied from 1*l.* to 2*l.*, or 5*l.*, and at last to 10*l.*, or it may be, where there is no such poll, the ordinary 1*s.* or 2*s.* 6*d.* ticket, which is an order to go to the public house and spend money to that extent.

418. What are the expenses of the sheriff in the City of London?—It is generally supposed that a sheriff who does what the Court of Aldermen expect a sheriff should do must spend 3,000*l.* over and above the money he receives.

419. To what purposes is this expenditure applied?—The case which occurs prominently to me is the case of the dinner at the Guildhall. Each sheriff is expected, the next 9th of November, to pay 700*l.* towards the expense of that dinner.

420. The expense is divided between the lord mayor and the two sheriffs?—Yes.

421. What are the other expenses?—The state and dignity of the office involve considerable expense;—the giving of dinners regularly expected;—the dinner to the judges at the Sessions House, at which dinner the aldermen claim to have a right to go and eat.

422. Is the principal expense of the sheriff confined to giving dinners? He has none of the ordinary expenses of a sheriff in the country, such as providing javelin men and a carriage for the judges, has he?—I am not aware of the specific expenses of the sheriff. I believe the duties of the shrievalty may be reasonably discharged with reasonable hospitality at half the amount which is now invariably lavished upon the office. But then, to discharge the duties of the shrievalty economically, though with reasonable hospitality, would require the person holding the office to place himself in direct antagonism to the anticipations and the demands of the Court of Aldermen of the City of London.

423. Is the office of an alderman an expensive one?—I should say not. I know of no expense properly coming within the meaning of that term contingent upon the holding of the office of alderman.

424. Do you think it possible that the office of lord mayor and the office of sheriff have been made annual because they are expensive; whereas the office of alderman has been extended to the life of the holder, because it is inexpensive?—I should not think so, because the office of lord mayor is not in my opinion expensive to the holder of that office. The office of alderman is not, I should think, conferred for life because it is non-expensive, but rather because it abounds in patronage of various descriptions. An alderman for life is a magistrate for life.

425. Is not the lord mayor a magistrate, and has not he also considerable patronage?—He has; and he has from 8,000*l.* to 12,000*l.* a year paid to him out of the City funds to discharge the duties of that office; he must go through the office of lord mayor when he is elected to it, and it wholly absorbs his time; that is another reason. It is not so with the office of alderman.

426. There may, probably, be another reason, that the office of lord mayor is considered too great a prize to allow the holder to retain it for more than one year?—I should think that is more likely to be the reason than the other. The corporation in the present year were unable to procure a sheriff. Several were chosen and elected, and refused to serve, and they had no sheriff except the first, Mr. Alderman Wire. Mr. Sheriff Wallis was elected, as I understand, without bribery; but Mr. Sheriff Wallis has been for many years perfectly conversant with the affairs of the common hall, although not generally engaged in the election of sheriffs. Mr. Sheriff Wallis is at issue with the corporation at the present moment on that very question of dinners at the Sessions House, where the judges for the first time for very many years have not dined this last session, for the reason that the invitation has not come to them from the lord mayor and sheriffs, but has come to them only through the lord mayor, as from the lord mayor and one of the sheriffs. The two sheriffs undertake to provide the dinners in alternate quarters. Mr. Sheriff Wallis was to find the dinner for the first quarter, and Mr. Sheriff Wire for the second. Mr. Sheriff Wallis thought that those dinners should be arranged upon a different footing from that which had been heretofore pursued, and he limited the invitation to dinner to all parties concerned in the business of the sessions. The aldermen, of whom Mr. Sheriff Wire is one, thought that whether they were there on business, or whether they came to eat the dinner, they had a right to eat the sheriffs' dinner, and they succeeded in inducing Mr. Sheriff Wire to set up an opposition table, and thus, when they went into the dining room, they were told: this is Mr. Sheriff Wire's table; that is Mr. Sheriff Wallis's table. The judges invariably take their lunch at Mr. Sheriff Wallis's table, they holding that the lord mayor and one sheriff ought to have been joined, as was customary, by the other sheriff, and that no such difference as between extravagance and legitimate economy ought to have prevented the usual form being carried out. But no judges, neither the judges of the land nor the City judges, have yet dined at the sheriffs' table, because Mr. Sheriff Wallis has told the aldermen that they have no right to eat his dinners, except upon his invitation, and he shall not invite any alderman to his dinners at the Sessions House unless that alderman has business at the sessions. Of course it follows that if the aldermen are not themselves invited to dinner they cannot invite John, Thomas, and William, as has been the custom, and so make a very indulgent affair of the dining after the business of the sessions. Mr. Sheriff Wallis is the pattern sheriff of economy, and the corporation do not much like the intervention of economical principles between the dinner table and their dignity.

417. Are there any other corporate officers to whose situation you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—The office of bridge master is not an office of very high salary, nor involving any heavy duties. There are two bridge masters; their salaries may vary from 200*l.* to 400*l.* a year,—perhaps more,—with perquisites; but it is, I believe, invariably an office which leads to a contest which results in a poll;—the result is governed by bribery. It is a very customary thing for a man to pay several years' purchase of his office by bribery, insuring his life with a portion of his salary, being content with the remainder. The only other offices in connexion with the common hall are those of auditors. The auditors have but a trifling salary. The business is done for them by Mr. Scott. It is a mere formal affair, requiring only that they should attach their names to certain documents. I think they may receive about 37*l.* apiece for their year's service, and they pay regularly 10*l.* in bribery for their appointment. It is so trifling an appointment that the livery at large are not interested in it; but the 400 men, who are always on the look-out for the waifs and strays, the shillings and half-crowns, receive from the four annually 10*l.* in such tickets. With respect to these four, although they are annually elected auditors, they are taken from a clique of men who in turn are auditors for the year, receive their 25*l.* a year in so many years, and in two or three years they come in again. I think they cannot serve more than two years or three years in succession, whichever it may be. The same parties come in in regular succession. They are men of no standing in the world or in the City, but they stand well with the 400 shilling and half-crown men, who decide all questions at common hall which are not of sufficient importance to be taken to a poll.

428. Are those the persons who audit the accounts of the City?—Nominally.

429. Do you mean to say that that duty is not efficiently and satisfactorily performed?—I believe so.

430. Has any instance occurred which you are able to quote which goes to prove that this audit has not been properly performed?—No, because the accounts themselves are not called in question, and therefore it is not likely that the manner in which they have been audited should be called in question.

431. Is the audit simply an audit of account, or does it go beyond that?—I should think it is an audit to ascertain whether the accounts on the face of them are correct.

432. Are those auditors independent persons who could venture to overhaul the accounts of the City?—Neither from station nor from mental qualification, I should think, are they qualified to investigate effectually the accounts.

433. Are they generally professional accountants?—No; they are of the class of clerks.

434. They are auditors of the chamberlain's accounts, are not they?—Yes.

435. Is there any expenditure of the corporation which does not pass through the hands of the chamberlain?—I should say not; that is the treasury of the corporation; all money must first be drawn from the chamberlain.

436. If this audit is inefficient, practically, there is no audit of the City accounts?—I have this reason also for saying either that the audit is insufficient, or that the character of the audit is not what it ought to be, that if you take this return of the accounts of the corporation for the last year, it is extremely difficult to say that each item is not honest as to what it represents, but it would require a very skilful accountant indeed, and the devotion of very much time, to be able to put before a common-sense man a view of the funds and property of the corporation from this account.

437. It is stated in the Report of the Municipal Commissioners, "the auditors, a few "years back, required the chamberlain to grant them the means of investigating the ultimate "application of all the sums which had passed through his hands, and desired to inspect "the leases of the City property, for the purpose of examining whether it was injudiciously "let. The chamberlain having declined, and indeed being in many instances unable, to "furnish the bills of particulars, except as to a part of the sums (though the leases, which "are in the comptroller's custody, were produced), the auditors complained to the common "hall, and that body passed a resolution ordering the chamberlain to pay no money "without being furnished with a bill of the particulars of its application. But the common "council having supported the chamberlain, the matter stopped, after some adverse reso-"lutions had been passed by each body." Do you happen to know whether since that time any attempt has been made to subject the accounts of the chamberlain to a closer investigation, or to support the auditors in this demand?—I do not. I surmise that the date of that application of the auditor will be the date of Mr. Henry Hunt's appointment as the auditor; he being a man of some celebrity in politics. He made an appeal to the livery, and got appointed an auditor, but did not, satisfactorily to himself, I believe, or to the public, investigate the accounts, or attain his object. I can easily imagine that that is perfectly true; and without being prepared to state that they have not since that time done something towards remedying the grievance, I am quite prepared to state that the account is very complicated. Each account may be very accurately stated, and yet there is such a running of account into account, and such an antagonism of entries, that it requires a great power of accountancy to make out what the corporation is worth, or what property it holds in trust.

438. Does not the passage which has been read to you describe an attempt to convert a merely formal audit into a substantial audit?—Yes; and it also describes a successful resistance to such attempt, and not a creditable resistance to it. It describes, if I understand it right, that the common council interposed to protect the chamberlain; while it seems to be admitted by the statement that the chamberlain was unable to render the reasonable account which was asked.

2d Nov. 1853.

439. Do you believe, when the accounts of the chamberlain are audited, he produces vouchers of his expenditure, or does he only lay before the auditors a balance sheet of his receipts and expenses?—I should think, in some instances, vouchers would be produced. There ought to be vouchers produced in order to justify payments. The payments are made generally, I believe, by what are called warrants from certain officers, or a certain committee of the corporation, having the effect of checks upon the treasurer, the chamberlain. Those vouchers ought to be produced in any audit of accounts. Whether they are so or not I am not prepared to state. The sheriffs' fines involve a question in connexion with the proceedings of common hall. A person elected to serve as sheriff who refuses to serve has to pay 400*l.* I believe, when any person is named by the Lord Mayor for sheriff, he remains upon that list for three years. If he be not elected for those three years he goes off the list, which is very desirable to the man who is not anxious to serve the office of sheriff, and still less anxious, perhaps, to pay 400*l.* for not serving, after being elected. Hence it becomes an object with an individual to stave off the election for the three years, that his name may go off the list; and I know of cases in point where certain terms have been made with the parties managing those 'long shore men, to this effect:—provided in none of those three years I be elected you shall have so many hundred pounds. When the sheriff refuses to compromise the matter, by hiring those men to hold up their hands against him, through his agent and their employer, he is most likely elected sheriff, and instead of paying his 100*l.* or 150*l.* for not being elected that year, he has to pay either 3,000*l.*, the expenses of the office, or 400*l.* for not serving. Therefore the arrangement is a premium to the man who practises corruption as a trade, and it is a premium to the 400 'long shore men, in the shape of the eating and drinking they get for their 1*s.* and 2*s.* 6*d.* tickets.

JAMES ACLAND Esq. was further examined as follows:

440. Have you any addition to make to your statements with regard to the points referred to when you were last before the Commissioners?—With reference to my previous evidence, and with reference to a document which I handed in to the Commissioners, I have to state that I have received a letter from a gentleman whom I know very well, Mr. George Borlase Childs, requesting me that I would, at my next examination, correct the evidence involved in the statement, that he, the surgeon of the police force of the City of London, is the brother to a partner of an alderman. I am happy to make the correction. I take it that it is so. I would therefore withdraw his name from the list of persons holding under the corporation who are related to members of the governing body of the coporation. As Mr. Childs has requested, I take the earliest opportunity of correcting my statement. If in anything I go wrong, I hope I shall be privileged to put myself right, and I shall be glad to do so at the earliest moment. I would now resume, if you will kindly permit me, the points involved in the charge, that the corporation have allocated a certain sum of money for the purpose of inducing a better representation by the press of their proceedings. On reading the report of my evidence I believe that I was somewhat incorrect in my statement, and I wish to make a statement now in correction, if it so be. I believe the fact to be this, that in 1849 the corporation having been for years in a spirit of opposition, not to say antagonism, to the wishes of the Government, a report was made by the consolidated committee to the Court of Common Council, of which report I hold a copy in my hand a lithographed copy issued by the common council. It is dated "Common Council, Thursday, 8th March 1849. Report of Consolidated Committee. To the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London in Common Council assembled. We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, of your consolidated committee, to whom, on the 22d day of May 1846, it was referred to confer with Her Majesty's Government and others upon such of the matters specially referred to the several committees as we may deem expedient, and to report thereon from time to time, do certify, that, pending the progress of the negotiations had on the references to us with various departments of the Government, and also in the proceedings in Parliament during the last two sessions, it has appeared to your committee that the motives and objects of the corporation have frequently been much misunderstood, to the great hindrance of your committee, and the embarrasment of the concerns intrusted to them; impeding materially the arrangements they were proposing with the Government and the Crown; and that these inconveniences have in a great degree, arisen from the imperfect publication of the reports of the proceedings of the corporation, by which means want of confidence was engendered and misconception encouraged. That the proceedings of most other corporate bodies, of public meetings, and public transactions, are more fully reported and published than those of this corporation. Your Committee therefore feel it incumbent upon them to report to this court these practical evils, which their experience as committeemen and chairmen of the several committees has enabled them to point out, and to suggest, as the most efficient remedy for such evils, that provision should be made for more certain reports of the proceedings of the corporation and its courts, and a more systematic and periodical publication of them. Your committee recommend that it should be referred to them to make temporary arrangements for these purposes, and to report to this honourable court the provisions, if any, which they may think fit to suggest for permanent adoption. All which we submit to the judgment of this honourable court. Dated this 23d day of February 1849." Then follow the names of twenty-one of the members of the consolidated committee as signing that report. At the foot comes this:—"A motion being made and question put, that this court doth agree with the committee in their said report, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and it is referred back to the committee to carry the same into execution." I believe my statement went further, to this effect: that the Court of Common Council sanctioned the allocation of 1,000*l.* to that purpose in 1849, and that it has continued so doing in each year to this time, making a sum of 4,000*l.* which they have had the power of spending. Then I will correct that statement thus far. No such vote appears on the minutes of the proceedings of the Court of Common Council; perhaps I should say no such vote was come to as a formal vote; but I assert deliberately, and what I assert I shall be prepared to prove, that it was well understood by the consolidated committee that the court sanctioned them to expend not more than 1,000*l.* a year for that purpose.

441. What do you mean by the statement that it was well understood that they were to expend a sum not exceeding that amount, unless some formal vote was come to empowering them to do so?—I mean that the proceedings of the corporation of the City of London are,—I think the only word I can use is,—tricksy; that there is very much of that understanding as regards the appropriation of funds for what some may call politic, but which I shall call sinister purposes; purposes not to be recognized in public courts where the press are, but purposes which are believed to be desirable to be attained somehow or other by other means.

442. Your statement was to the effect that 1,000*l.* a year had been spent in the last four years in sums to be paid to various newspapers in this town. What proof have you to give us of such payments having taken place?—I have endeavoured to correct my statement as to the positive sum of 1,000*l.* being spent. That they were warranted in going to an expense not exceeding 1,000*l.* for those purposes I reassert. Whether they have spent the whole sum or not I am unable to say. I am justified in assuming that they have. They have never published an account showing how much of it they have spent, yet they yearly publish accounts purporting to be accounts of the receipts and expenditure.

443. Was any sum whatever mentioned in the vote which authorized any expenditure of this description?—No; it was remitted to the consolidated committee, in the words at the foot of that report, to make such temporary arrangements as they should think fit, and to report what measures they would recommend for permanent adoption.

444. You are understood to say that there is no trace of any formal report or any actual vote putting at their disposal any given sum of money for that purpose?—There is not; but the consolidated committee have a sub-committee of three of its members; that sub-committee have dealt all along with this vote as though it were a vote of 1,000*l.* a year; they have so treated it, in figures, in consultations, and in calculations, as a sum entirely at their disposal for such purpose.

445. How do you know that?—I do know it. I only hesitate, on that question, to consider how far, without breach of confidence, I can now say how I know it; but I say they have purchased newspapers 300 at a time, according to their own admission, and that continually. They have in their financial report an entry of 1,000*l.* under this heading: "To Mr. Hallkeeper." He is avowedly the person who has dealt with the transaction of the newspapers. "To Mr. Hallkeeper" (that is Mr. Temple), "on account of disbursements of his office, consisting of expenses of assistants, watchmen, gazettes, newspapers, advertisements, candles, firewood, and various other petty expenses, with relation to Guildhall and courts and offices connected therewith, 1,000*l.* in the year 1852." That is at page 43 of their financial report. At page 10 of the same report there is an entry of 100*l.* to the same individual. "To Mr. Hallkeeper, on account of advertising the letting of property, 100*l.*" "Advertising" is one of the items in the 1,000*l.* entry. There is at page 56 of the same report this entry: "To Joshua Temple, hallkeeper, on account of sundry disbursements and expenses connected with his office, 150*l.*" There is no separate entry for candles, unless it be under "Sundry disbursements," in the 150*l.* There is no separate entry for firewood. In the year 1851 there is the same entry of 1,000*l.* under the same conglomerated statement of items, including the candles. In the year 1850 there is the same entry. In the year 1849 there is the same entry. I believe in the year 1850 it is 1,200*l.* Now that the papers were purchased is admitted; but there is no account here of the purchase of those papers, except by that item of 1,000*l.*; there is no account in any of those four years of any expenditure of 150*l.* a year, or 1,500*l.*, or any other sum, for newspapers, excepting the simple entry of 1,000*l.* to the hallkeeper in a lump.

446. In the public papers of this morning there is a report of a statement of Mr. Wood upon this subject, in which he says that the money spent in buying copies of those papers which most fully reported the proceedings of the common council has not exceeded 150*l.* a year. Have you any reason to doubt the accuracy of that statement?—None; but I have every reason to doubt its accuracy in another sense,— indirectly. It is not denied that any other sum was paid with reference to the dealings with the press. The amount which may have been give for purchased newspapers I cannot know until they please to publish an account; but they render no such account, except this lump of 1,000*l.*, without explanation or detail.

447. Are you prepared to state that you can prove or believe that payments have been made to newspapers out of this 1,000*l.* besides this 150*l.* a year, which it is avowed was spent in purchasing copies of newspapers which had reported fully the proceedings of the common council?—No; I am not prepared to state it, in those large terms. What I am prepared to state is, that they have always dealt with this vote of the common council as though they were at liberty to spend not exceeding 1,000*l.* a year, and they had it seriously under the consideration of a sub-committee of the consolidated committee to publish a newspaper of their own, with the balance which they had not spent of the 1,000*l.*, and the 1,000*l.* accruing for the year ensuing, and the 900*l.* which they pay for the publication of the shorthand writer's report of the Old Bailey proceedings. It was contemplated by the consolidated committee to deal with that 900*l.* by throwing the Old Bailey reports into a newspaper of their own which they proposed to publish, and to apply the accruing balance, whatever it might be, of the 1,000*l.* a year, which they had the power of spending, for that purpose.

448. But confining yourself to what has actually been done, are you prepared to say that you believe that more was done with regard to the press than that which has been avowed by the officer of the City of London connected with this expenditure, namely, that the sum of 150*l.* a year has been spent for the last four years in purchasing copies of those newspapers which most fully reported the proceedings of the common council?—It is difficult to get to know what a secret committee does, but it is not difficult, in due time, to prove how they have treated a transaction which they have not had the manliness to put on the face of the proceedings,—which they have thought fit not to record. They have admitted that they have spent 150*l.* a year in the purchase of those newspapers. Has it appeared in the published accounts that they have done so?

449. Your charge now is, that they have not published, as you think they ought to have done, a detailed account of the expenditure of this 1,000*l.*?—Or of any part of it that they have spent. I do not say that they have spent the 1,000*l.*, but I say that they have the power to spend it; they have a sanction to spend it; and they must be open to the fair assumption that they may have spent the whole of the 1,000*l.*

450. But this is surely a different thing from the statement which you made on the former occasion, that you believed that the whole of this 1,000*l.* per annum had been spent upon the newspapers?—I concluded so; it was voted for that purpose.

451. Does it appear from that minute of the common council which you read that this sum of 1,000*l.* was voted as a subsidy to the press?—No; nor the 150*l.* a year.

452. Is there anything in those proceedings of the common council to show that the sum of 1,000*l.*, or any other sum, was voted as a subsidy to the press?—Not as a specific sum; but it was referred back to the consolidated committee to carry out their recommendation. The recommendation is a loose one, not distintly stated, but evidently referring to some dealings with the press in order to secure, as they say, fuller and better reports.

453. Then you regard it as a vote by implication of a sum of money for that purpose?—Of the money, however much may have been spent, there is no return in the accounts, unless I may take the lump sum of 1,000*l.*, in which "newspapers" is included, to be such a statement. That very committee did, to my knowledge, spend a very considerable sum of money in endeavours to establish a newspaper of their own, at about that period, which was called the Citizen.

454. Are not the Old Bailey reports, of which you spoke, published at a loss to the City. Is not the circulation very small?—They are entirely given away, I believe. I think they are given to every member of the corporation.

455. They are on sale, are not they?—I am informed that they are sold in Cheapside; but I was not aware of it before.

456. Passing to the consideration of the courts of the City, beginning with the civil courts, have you any observations which you desire to address to the Commissioners upon that subject?—The Court of Hustings I believe to be an obsolete court. The form is gone through of opening the court, but no person attends, and no business is done, as I have frequently witnessed. I believe it is an ancient court, which is now obsolete; superseded, in fact, almost entirely, if not quite so, by modern courts, and by the alteration of the system of law in the City. Then the Lord Mayor's Court is the second. That is a court against which there are many complaints with reference to foreign attachments; attachments of goods in the hands of foreigners. By "foreigners" those who are not citizens and freemen are meant. Generally speaking, it is a court to decide between citizens, or between freemen and foreigners not freemen; and foreigners who are not freemen complain that it is a tyrannical and oppressive procedure. But of the details of the court, beyond its general character, and the general feeling upon it, I am not prepared to speak.

457. Have you anything to say with respect to the Sheriffs' Court?—It is still called the Sheriffs' Court, but it is very different from the court which it once was, when it might have been more properly called the Sheriffs' Court. It still keeps the old name, but it is a new court. In point of fact it is a County Court. When the Government introduced the County Courts' Act into the Legislature, the City of London opposed the extension of that Act within its jurisdiction, and they successfully opposed it, although the City of London is a place where there are more commercial and trading transactions, and where there are more debts of small amount, than in any other portion of the empire, and it was thought to be peculiarly calculated to derive advantage from the operation of such an Act. But the corporation thought proper to oppose it. The corporate officers were interested in the maintenance of the old court, and it was successfully opposed. But when it was seen how successfully the County Court Act had been introduced into other portions of the empire, the public opinion was brought strongly to bear upon the corporation, and the corporation at last were compelled, by public opinion, to apply to Parliament for a specific Act, extending the operation of the County Courts' Act to the City of London. The operation of this Act in the City of London has been very beneficial. The business of the court has enormously increased, and the profits of the court (for there are profits beyond the expenses) are considerable. They are applicable to the reduction of the court charges on process; and the accumulation of those profits has been such as to justify the committee of the Court of Common Council in reducing those fees very considerably,—in many instances one half,—within the last few months. The committee which deals with this question of the Sheriffs' Court is the officers' and clerks' committee. They find that they have a surplus, I think, of considerably more than 1,000*l.* a year, and they propose to the court: "That the fee of one shilling in the pound now payable under the "head of general fund fees be lessened by sixpence in the pound; that the fee for "every summons issued, under the 38th section of the Act of Parliament, of sevenpence in "the pound, usually receivable with the fee of one penny in the pound to the high bailiff "under the head of plaint fees, be lessened by fourpence in the pound on all debts and "demands under twenty pounds; that the fee for every judgment by consent be "lessened from twenty-six pence in the pound to thirteenpence in the pound; that the "fee for every judgment summons be lessened by threepence in the pound; that the fee "of twopence in the pound payable on paying in, and the like fee of twopence in the "pound payable on receiving out monies, be discontinued." It is believed that even with such an immense reduction of the fees of that court the profits of the business will so increase as to justify a further diminution in the amount; an evidence that the corporation, in seeking exclusive legislation, and in opposing the general legislation by Parliament, were in this instance at least most unwise, and possessed very little foresight. The Sheriffs' Court is presided over by a judge, who is appointed by the Court of Common Council. Whether the Commissioners may think that system a good system I know not, but the impression it makes upon my mind is this:—You have the Court of Common Council appointing the judge of a court in the City, where the common councilmen themselves are mostly traders, and where of necessity those common councilmen are very often plaintiffs in the court, and where solicitors, being members of the Court of Common Council, often appear before the judge as representing parties to suits before him, and the necessary degree of intimacy existing between the officer of the court and the members of the court who appointed him does at all events seem opposed to that system of legislation which seeks to avoid anything like a justification of suspicion of improper motives. No improper motives, that I am aware of, are urged against the judge of the court; but his position with reference to those who appoint him, and with reference to those who are parties to the cases before him, seems to me to be anomalous, and open to objection. The question of costs is always a question in that court of considerable importance, and it has been said,—how truly I am not prepared to state,—but it has been thought, and it has been said, that when legal gentlemen who are members of the Court of Common Council, and who very frequently appear as representatives of parties in that court, ask for costs, they get them more readily and much more frequently than when costs are asked for by parties to causes who do not possess a similar advantage and similar personal influence.

458. How would you propose that the appointment should be made?—I think the appointment of judges should always be in the Crown.

459. In the Lord Mayor's Court and the Sheriffs' Court, so far as they are civil courts, are not the proceedings all by jury? Is not a jury summoned; and have not the jury to determine all questions of fact, just the same as at Nisi Prius in other courts?—If I recollect rightly, it is optional with the parties whether they will have a jury or not.

J. Acland, Esq.

4th Nov. 1853.

460. That may be so under the modern Act of Parliament, the County Courts Act; but the question refers to the old practice, before that Act of Parliament was passed. Have not the trials in the Sheriffs' Court and in the Lord Mayor's Court, in actions between parties, always been conducted with a jury, in the same way as in other courts?—It was not uniformly the case in the Small Debts' Court, to my knowledge.

461. Are you prepared to say that in any of those civil courts the judge of the court determines questions of fact?—I think it is optional with the parties to the suit to say whether they will empanel a jury or not.

462. But the question has reference to the old practice of the Sheriffs' Court and the Lord Mayor's Court?—I am not sure, even if it were so, that the objection vanishes, because, even if there is a jury, still the judge charges the jury; and the point I dwelt most upon was the awarding of costs, in which the jury could not interfere.

463. Now, will you proceed to the criminal courts?—In speaking of the criminal courts you will, perhaps, excuse me for again adverting to the magisterial courts as a branch of the criminal courts. It is objected that the aldermen are not generally learned in the law; indeed one may be justified in saying that they are generally altogether unlearned in the law; their habits of life in trade have not fitted them peculiarly for study, and they are dependent wholly upon the assistance and advice which they receive from their clerks or legal officers. This appears to be an indirect way of attaining a desirable object. The desirable object is, that those who administer justice shall well understand the law; and here they have the law at second-hand, and it not unfrequently happens that the magistrate appears in the very invidious position of being a mere puppet upon the bench, when, from his consciousness that he does not understand the law, he allows the magistrate's clerk to deal as a magistrate with the transactions which come before him; a course of procedure not calculated to elevate the dignity of the bench, nor to vindicate the dignity of the law. That is peculiarly the case in the City of London. Instances are constantly occurring of magistrates making themselves appear very ridiculous when they are on the seat as magistrates. Singular as it may seem, an instance occurred some time back, of a magistrate telling a drunken man that he would let him off the fine for drunkenness if he would allow him to have his hair cut, because the man had very long hair. The man consented, and the magistrate sent for a barber, and the man's hair was cut in the justice room, and then he was let off the fine for being drunk. By instances of that kind, where magistrates please to be jocose, and where they make the office of magistrate a mere medium of ventilating their jocosity and their humour, the dignity of the magisterial bench is seriously impaired, and the respect for the law on the part of the public is considerably interfered with.

464. Would you recommend that barristers of a certain amount of experience and length of practice should be appointed to act as magistrates in the City as well as in the rest of the metropolis?—Most assuredly they should be barristers of sufficient standing.

465. Would it be desirable that they should be appointed by the Common Council of the corporation, or by the Crown?—I have so high an opinion of the importance of the laws being administered in the City, as elsewhere, so that not a breath of suspicion shall sully the purity of our law courts, that I think we cannot contend reasonably that a magistrate should be elected by those between whom he has to adjudicate. I think all magistrates should be appointed under the serious responsibility of the Government of the country.

466. Do you contemplate that they would receive a salary, like the police magistrates of the rest of the metropolis?—Say rather, like Liverpool; for, looking to the high commercial character of the City, I know no better comparison than that of Liverpool, where gentlemen of the highest attainments in commercial law are required as magistrates.

467. In that case would you propose that the salary of the magistrates should be paid out of the funds of the corporation; or should they be voted by Parliament?—So long as you have a municipality in the City, I think the expense of the administration of the law should be supplied from the municipal funds.

468. Then your view is, that the judicial and magisterial officers of the corporation should be appointed by the Crown, and should be paid out of the funds of the corporation?—Certainly.

469. The recorder of London is appointed by the corporation?—By the Court of Aldermen.

470. Are you prepared to say that you think that the public has suffered in consequence of improper appointments to the office of recorder?—Not of recorder. In the present instance I think it is highly honourable to the Court of Aldermen that they unsolicitedly selected a gentleman of the high character and talent of the present recorder, whose politics were certainly opposed to the general politics of the body that called him to the office. I think it is highly to their credit.

471. There was no canvass or interest of any kind that led to the appointment of the present recorder?—There may have been, and I believe that there was, influence exercised in favour of some one or two others,—momentarily, probably,—until the present recorder was mentioned; but assuredly there was nothing like a serious opposition to the recorder; he was called upon to take the office by the unanimous vote of the Court of Aldermen.

472. In that instance you give credit to the Court of Aldermen for having selected for so important an office the individual whom they believed to be best qualified to discharge the duties of it?—I give credit to the Court of Aldermen in that instance, as a section of the corporation.

473. Would you propose that in future the recorder should be appointed by the Crown?—I should, because I would propose that there should be an end to the Court of Aldermen, and so I should if that were not the case.

474. You would recommend that the recorder should be appointed by the Crown?—I think it should be so.

475. That is the case now in all other corporations by the late Act?—I believe it is. I am strongly opposed to the City of London being made an exception to the general government of the country. It seems unjust to make use of its possession of old charters as a ground for its being made an exception to the general principles of the legislature and of the Government in their dealing with other portions of the empire. That of itself is most objectionable, because, if the corporation thereby get better terms, other portions of the empire will be dissatisfied that they have not equal terms with the corporation of London. If, on the other hand, the corporation of London have a worse bargain, then they will have a right to complain that they have not equal justice.

476. In attempting to reform the corporation of the City of London, would you take generally the Municipal Reform Act, and apply its provisions to the corporation of London, so far as they may appear to be applicable?—I entertain a very strong opinion, in common with another witness who has been examined before you, that the more commercial portion of the community of the City of London will not participate in any municipal arrangement which involves the continuance of anything like the existing system. The municipal institutions of other towns, under the Municipal Reform Act, secure aldermen as well as common councilmen; and the aldermen of the City of London have generally rendered themselves so unpopular with the higher classes of the community (I do not think that is an improper term, it is not used invidiously,—but they are in fact so),—with the superior classes of the civic community,—that I doubt very much whether you could induce that class to become a portion of the reformed corporation if it so nearly resembles the present corporation in its form and functionaries as the municipal institutions of the provinces do resemble it.

477. Do you think that would be a sufficient reason for giving a different form to the municipal institutions of London from those which are found to answer in the other great towns of the country; for instance, with respect to the designation of alderman, which you say is disliked by the citizens of London, but which is regarded without displeasure by the inhabitants of Liverpool, do you think it would be unwise to continue it in London?—It would always be a name in the City of London involving ridicule.

478. Do you think it would be desirable to abolish the mayor and sheriffs, upon the same ground?—No; the sheriff is rather a legal term that one does not quarrel with.

479. It is only the aldermen you object to?—I do not object to an alderman of Manchester. I do not object to the name. I object to that which the name here implies. The term alderman of London conveys a different idea from what the mere word alderman would convey in any other part of the empire.

480. But my question proceeds on the supposition that the functions and situation of alderman were materially altered in London; would there in that case be an objection to retaining the title?—I think there would. Those living in the City of London can very well understand the feeling which I state to exist there, and which is known to exist there. Perhaps it is difficult for those who do not live in the City of London to enter into it; but it is so. Nothing is more common in a well got up farce than to have the part of an alderman with a big belly, who cares for nothing but eating and drinking. Whether that has anything to do with it I cannot say. It is not sufficient, I should think, to account for the distaste existing towards the name. But so it is; and I hold that it is most desirable that the higher class of the community should be induced to co-operate in the municipal government of the City of London.

481. Have you any observation to make upon any one of the criminal courts of the City of London?—With respect to the Old Bailey, it is boasted by the corporation, perhaps truly, that the returns of the number of convictions in proportion to the number of commitments by the magistrates of the City of London compare triumphantly with a similar return of the proportion of convictions to the same number of commitments in the county of Middlesex or in any other county. I am not prepared to say whether this is so or not; but I think if it were not so it would not be so stated. But then I think that may be accounted for otherwise than it is accounted for by the advocates of the corporation, for it is assumed that that is a proof that justice is better administered by aldermen of London sitting as magistrates than it is by paid magistrates sitting in the county of Middlesex. Non constat, I think the aldermen of London elected by the ward electors of their respective districts are personally known to a very great number of those who come before them; and I think there is a bonhommie, a good humour, and a legal laxity in their method of dealing with the cases that come before them, that accounts very much for the non-commitment of many; who if committed would have been acquitted. So far as to commitments. Now, as to convictions, we come to the Old Bailey. There sits the officer appointed by the aldermen; there sit the officers appointed by the Court of Common Council; there sit the corporate functionaries, the lord mayor and the aldermen.

4th Nov. 1853.

Legally the presence of a certain number of those committing magistrates is necessary to the formation of the Court for the trial of the very men whom they have committed. Now it appears to me that that is opposed to one's general ideas of constitutional propriety, that the magistrate who commits shall be the magistrate to try. And then, when it is borne in mind that those magistrates and those judges are in the habit of daily convivial and friendly intercourse,—seeing what humanity is,—each knowing his own nature,—is it not natural that the committing magistrates should have on occasions an influence over the presiding judge, their appointee, and that thus there should be more convictions, as a justification of the legal acumen of the committing magistrate, as in the other case there were fewer commitments of the parties brought before him because of the bonhommie and good nature of the magistrate.

482. Would not the objection which you have stated apply in a great measure to the system of the county magistracy in England?—Certainly, at the sessions.

483. Do not the committing magistrates sit on the bench at quarter sessions in counties?—Yes; but I am taking the objection first in principle to the system as applied to the City of London. If my objection be worth anything, it is not worth less because it applies beyond the City of London.

484. The lord mayor and aldermen of London are the magistrates before whom any person accused of any offence is brought, to see whether he should be committed for trial or not. Then when the person comes to be tried, supposing him to be committed, he must be tried before the court of Quarter Sessions in London or at the Old Bailey; those are the only two criminal courts in the City of London, are they not?—It is all of the nature of quarter sessions. Practically in the City of London the trials are always at the Old Bailey; there are no quarter sessions.

485. At the Courts of Quarter Sessions in London, which is a very different court from the Court of Session of the Old Bailey, does not the recorder act as judge?—I know no other criminal court than that at the Old Bailey. We have a monthly delivery at the Old Bailey.

486. If you look at the Act of Parliament which constituted the criminal court of the Old Bailey, which is held once a month, you will see that it is provided there that there shall be two commissioners; and the aldermen always attend there in order to make up a court; but the person who tries the prisoners, in effect, is the judge; either the recorder, or the common sergeant, or the judge of the Sheriffs' Court. Do you mean to say that when the recorder, or the common sergeant, or the judge of the Sheriffs' Court sits as judge, the aldermen take part in the proceedings on the trials at the Old Bailey?—My impression is that they do. I do not say that they do when the judges of the land are presiding. I am not sure how that may be; but the three courts are sitting at the same time, and the aldermen are necessary to the constitution of the other courts, whether or not they may be necessary to the constitution of the court where the judges of the land are presiding. Within the last fortnight I was present in one of those courts. The seat of honour was occupied by an alderman, and a judge of the court was sitting in an inferior position,—not the central seat.

487. Which court do you mean?—One of the three Old Bailey courts; it was not the principal court.

488. In the principal court the lord mayor sits in the middle of the court, and the judges who attend sit on the right or the left, and do not occupy the centre, because the lord mayor is considered at the head of the commission; therefore he sits there, but he takes no part in the proceedings?—In the one case the alderman sits in the seat of honour, as the lord mayor does in the other.

489. In the Report of the Municipal Corporation Commissioners, in page 135, section 283, there is a description of the sessions of the peace for the City of London:—"The sessions of the peace for the City of London are holden eight times in the year. They commence on the day before the sessions at the Old Bailey. The judges are the lord mayor, aldermen, and recorder, any four of whom form a quorum; but the recorder is the acting judge, who charges the jury, and delivers the judgments of the court. The jurisdiction of the court, taken strictly, extends, like that of other sessions of the peace, to all kinds of felonies; but the trial of appeals and misdemeanors constitutes its only business, felonies, and misdemeanors partaking of the nature of felony, being always tried at the Old Bailey. It is nothing more than a sessions of the peace, and is the only tribunal in London for the decision of appeals under the Poor Laws, and appeals against rates and summary convictions." That is a Court of Sessions quite distinct from the Central Criminal Court; and that was the court alluded to in the preceding questions?—I really do not know. There is so little business done there that I do not know it. The Old Bailey absorbs all the attention.

490. It is the only court in London in which appeals under the Poor Law and matters of that sort can be tried?—There is less sessional business in the shape of trials in the City of London than elsewhere; partly arising from this circumstance, that the alderman is generally prayed to deal summarily with the case.

491. When he has the power?—Which is much more extensive than it was; and which prayer is much more likely to be presented to him as between the alderman and his constituents than as between a barrister sitting as a paid magistrate and the public.

492. Is the principal alteration which you would suggest in the superior criminal courts of the City, that the aldermen should take no part in them, whether that office should continue or not?—That the magistrate should take no part in them, whether he be an alderman or not. I would next mention a practice at the Old Bailey which is most objectionable,—most irregular,—but which is sanctioned by the corporate authorities; and I feel bound to call the attention of the Commissioners to it. I mean the circumstance of their reducing the court of criminal jurisdiction to the character of a theatre, by their setting apart the best places in the court in the shape of a gallery, and to their sanctioning the charge of money for admission, which leads to exhibitions of a most unseemly character. It is notorious that on occasions of the trial of great criminals as much as a guinea apiece is charged for admission into that gallery, and in common sessional cases they are very glad to take one shilling; for the price of admission is on a sliding scale; the greater the criminal the greater the tax upon the prurient curiosity of the public; and the seat of justice is desecrated by a course of procedure which seems to be resorted to only for the purpose of producing a sum of money for certain officials and functionaries of the corporation.

493. What officers of the corporation get this money?—I am not prepared to tell the precise proportions which the different officers may get; but I am prepared to give the Commissioners just so much evidence upon that point as will enable them in due time to ascertain all that they may require.

494. The money is actually taken by the doorkeeper?—It is so. The doorkeeper is the tenant contracting with the under-sheriffs. The under-sheriffs let it per annum, or per sessions; per annum I believe it is. The doorkeeper receives the money, and I understand that a portion of the money received by the under-sheriff from the doorkeeper goes to the lord mayor, another portion to the macebearer, and a third portion to enhance the profits of the sub-shrievalty.

495. Do you mean that the entrance fees so taken by the doorkeeper go to increase the value of the doorkeeper's place, which he purchases from the under-sheriff?—It is a speculation by the doorkeeper, who is generally one of the footmen or servants of one of the sheriffs.

496. Do you mean that he gets his place by purchase?—He gets his receipts by purchase.

497. Does he get his place by purchase?—If he be a footman of a sheriff, that would be his place; the other is his pecuniary amusement. In order to further emolument, he pays a sum of money under contract to the sheriff, chancing for his part what the receipts may be, whether he makes a profit or a loss. And of course these contractors watch very vigilantly the proceedings in all the police courts within the jurisdiction of the Old Bailey criminal court.

498. Are the payments which you imagine to be made by the doorkeeper to the under-sheriff avowed?—Yes; there is no doubt about it; it is notorious.

499. Do you state it merely from general notoriety, or from any published accounts which you have seen?—I state it from the fact of my friends having been made to pay money when they wanted to go in.

500. The question does not refer to the receipt of money paid at the door, but to the fact which you have stated, that the doorkeeper in some way gives money to the under-sheriff for his place?—It is not sometimes very convenient to be obliged to give up one's authority for a fact of this description, but I have no hesitation in stating that I have the information from one of the present sheriffs, and that it is also a very notorious practice; that I have remonstrated against it with him, and that he had declared that he would endeavour to put it down. When Alderman Sir Matthew Wood was sheriff, he did put an end to it. I know the opinion of the present recorder to be most decided upon the question, and steps will certainly immediately be taken to bring that opinion to a desirable result. Still it exists, to the dishonour of the City of London. It ought to be put an end to, if not voluntarily, compulsorily. But how any functionaries of a City boasting such ancient charters and so high a position as the City of London can stoop to increase their receipts of their functionaries by any portion of the sums thus exacted from the public I am at a loss to imagine.

501. You state that the fee exacted by the doorkeeper varies in proportion to the interest which the public take in the trial; that it is increased according to the number of persons who wish to gain admittance?—Most certainly; upon the same principle that rooms at an execution let for more money when they are in a good situation, or when the malefactor has done some very desperate deed. It is a prurient curiosity which ministers, it seems, to the funds of these corporate functionaries. Whilst I am upon the subject of the civil and criminal courts, I will take leave to mention that the corporation, by its officers, makes out the jury panels; that the moment a person is elected a common councillor his name is removed from the common jury panel, and put upon the special jury. There are members of the Court of Common Council who get these occasional guineas for sitting on special juries at Guildhall, and also upon juries to award compensation, of which there are so many in the City of London, who are invariably in attendance on those courts, in order that they may take their place in the box as special jurors. There are, of course, many high-minded men who never avail themselves of that peculiar privilege of the situation, and who do not attend upon those occasions; but there are those who could be named, but that it would be invidious, whose circumstances are not the most flourishing in the world, and who do pick up many occasional guineas in the course of the year in this way, as a regular business.

4th Nov. 1853.

502. You are probably aware that the same thing used to occur at the trials as Nisi Prius at Guildhall, in London, where the special juries at one time were almost invariably composed of persons who were in the habit of attending, and who made very good special jurymen?—Some of them, doubtless.

503. Do you know anything respecting the Courts of Conservancy of the Thames?—No; in common with all other non-officials, I know very little of the Courts of Conservancy of the Thames. It is generally supposed in the City of London, that those courts are a mere excuse for pleasure parties by the lord mayor and aldermen and their friends. The aldermen, I know, receive a sum of 13*s.* 4*d.* for each court in what are called the out-counties; I think, Kent and Essex; and a sum of 10*s.* for attending each court in what are called the home counties; Middlesex and Surrey. I believe there is very little business done there; it is quite a corporate court; it is held out of the City of London. It is always made an occasion for a pleasure party, and the aldermen are very punctual in their attendance at those courts of justice, if they be courts of justice.

504. Have you anything further to say upon this branch of the question?—Before proceeding to the next part of the question, will you allow me to call your attention to a case. I have stated previously that according to the municipal law in the City of London a freeman may not employ a non-freeman to the prejudice of a freeman. The tendency of such a law in its general aspect is of course to give to the freeman a higher rate of wages than the non-freeman can command, and that without reference to the value of the labour given. Very recently, it being just now the fashion among the operative class to strike, there was a strike among the privileged labourers of the City of London, in connexion with the lightering of goods on the Thames; that is, among the water section of privileged porters. There are several small companies, and their names run very much into each other; but these were the water section, who navigate the lighters which convey goods from one vessel to another, or from a vessel to the shore. There was a strike among those who are the privileged labourers on board those lighters. I think it was the waterman's company, or some society connected with the waterman's company. The consequence was, that the trade of the port of London was very materially and very prejudicially interfered with, those men being few in number compared with the number of men who would pursue that calling if there was no such exclusive privilege for the few. In consequence of their striking, the lightermen were under the necessity of discontinuing their business, or of employing those not engaged in the strike, and not, according to the City law, privileged to do the labour. Some lightermen set the law at defiance, urged by the importance of the work which they had to be performed, and employed men who were not free of the City of London; and although they had, commercially speaking, and locally speaking, full justification for such a course, yet the law being against it one of those lightermen was proceeded against in one of the magisterial courts of the City of London, I think the Mansion House, and had a fine imposed upon him in vindication of such City law. There is no question, that such being the state of the law, the men who were on strike were materially favoured, and that the attainment of a beneficial result on their part, where the master was unable to help himself, was promoted. Now in this era of free trade—not as an experiment—not as a fancy or a theory—but as justified by practical results which we have all witnessed—it is most objectionable that such a system of monopoly in favour of a small section of the operative class against their employers should be maintained. And a larger view may be taken of it, for it is not merely in support of the employed against the employer, but it is in support of a very contemptible minority of the operatives against those who would be employed but for this monopoly; and it is to the prejudice of the great mass of the labouring classes of the City of London that they must not undertake this work unless they pay the corporation 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* for the privilege of doing so, besides other charges.

505. Is not that rather an objection to the state of the law with respect to the privileges of this portion of the working class, than to the jurisdiction of the magisrate who fined the person brought before him?—Yes; I am not urging that the magistrate who so fined acted illegally, because I know at the time the magistrate expressed his regret that he was obliged to fine; and it always makes much against a law as affecting the principle of it, when he who administers it is obliged to regret that under the law he muct come to this or that decision.

506. Do you believe that the rate of wages received by the members of those companies differs materially from the rate of wages received by labourers of the same description who are not thus incorporated?—I am quite sure of it; I say so, because, not only am I certain that such must be the effect of such a cause, but I know a particular case which enables me to speak most positively upon that subject. It is the case of a man who is a carcase butcher and slaughterer in Whitechapel within the City of London, in Aldgate High Street; his name is Woodley. He is free of the butchers' company of course; he being in the trade, the butchers' company had the power to compel him to take up his freedom in the trade, and he is free of the butchers' company; but the operative butchers who are free of that company are very few; that portion of them who choose to engage in the coarser part of the business, the slaughtering, are still fewer. An operative butcher would, of course, rather take a situation in the house and establishment of a retail butcher, where everything is comparatively cleanly and comfortable, and where his wages are regular, than accept a situation in the employment of a carcase butcher where there is every discomfort necessarily connected with his employment. The consequence is, that the carcase butchers have extreme difficulty in procuring freemen to labour for them. Mr. Woodley employed what freemen he could get, and he also employed a non-freeman. Two years back he disagreed with one of his men, and an information was immediately lodged against him, that he, being a butcher and a freeman of the City of London, had employed a butcher who was not a freeman of the City of London. He was obliged to settle the action in the Mayor's Court, and the only way in which he could settle it was by agreeing to find the money to take up the freedom of the non-free butcher. He did so. Afterwards a similar instance occurred, and then a third instance occurred of the same kind. In each of those instances he had to take up the freedom of the non-free butcher in his employ; and no sooner had he done this on each of those occasions, than the party whose freedom he took up said, "Now I must have more money; I must have higher wages;" and the wages were increased from the sum of 18*s.* to 30*s.* per week; and now there is a fourth instance where, in consequence of a quarrel resulting from a refusal to give a man more than the man was worth, another information was laid against him, and this proceeding is at this moment pending before the mayor and aldermen in the chamber of Guildhall in the City of London. "Sir John Key, Bart., "chamberlain of the City of London (the plaintiff in this suit), by George Thomas Robert "Reynal, his attorney, demands against Thomas Woodley (the defendant in this suit) five "pounds of lawful money of Great Britain which he owes to and unjustly detains from the "said plaintiff. For that whereas by a certain act of common council made by a common "council assembled, according to the custom of the City of London, in the chamber of "the Guildhall of the said City, situate in the parish of St. Michael Bassishaw in the said "City, on Friday the fourth day of July, in the eleventh year of the reign of our Sovereign "Lady late Queen of Great Britain, &c., and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven "hundred and twelve, it was (amongst other things) enacted by the authority of the "same common council, that no person or persons then being free of the City of London "or who thereafter should become free of the said City should after the Feast of St. "Michael the Archangel then next ensuing, by any colour, way, or means, set on work "in any manual, occupation or handicraft within the said City or liberties thereof any "person or persons being a foreigner or foreigners from the liberties of the said City, "knowing or having due notice given to him or them that such person or persons so by "him or them set on work is or are a foreigner or foreigners as aforesaid, upon pain of "forfeiture of 5*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain for every time that any such person or "persons should commit such offence, or do anything contrary to the true intent and "meaning of the said act of common council. And whereas it was then and there, by the "authority aforesaid, enacted, that all and singular the said several penalties and forfeitures "by the said act imposed on any offender or offenders against the same or any part thereof, "should and might be sued for and recovered by action of debt, bill, or plaint, to be commenced "and prosecuted in the name of the chamberlain of the City of London for the time being "in any of the Queen's Majesty's courts of record within the said City, and that the "chamberlain for the time being should in all suits to be prosecuted by virtue of the "said act or ordinance against any offender recover the ordinary costs of suit to be "expended in and about the prosecution thereof, and further, that one moiety of all "forfeitures to be recovered by virtue of the said act (the costs of suit for recovery of "the same being deducted and allowed) should, after the recovery and receipt thereof, be "paid and delivered to the treasurer of the hospital of Bridewell, for the use of the said "hospital, and the other moiety thereof to him or them who should first give information "of the offence for which such forfeiture should be incurred, and prosecute the same in "the name of the chamberlain of the said City, for the recovery of the same, anything "in the said act contained to the contrary notwithstanding, as by the said act of "common council appears. Yet, notwithstanding, the said defendant (although well "knowing), in nowise regarding the said act of common council, nor the penalties "therein contained, after the Feast of St. Michael the Archangel, in the said act men-"tioned, and before the affirming of this bill original, that is to say, on the 17th day of "August in the 17th year of the reign of Her present Majesty Queen Victoria, and on "divers others days and times between the said 17th day of August and the day of "affirming this bill original, the said defendant, being then free of the said City, did set "on work in the manual occupation of a butcher one James Harvey, within the liberties "of the said City and jurisdiction of this court, that is to say in the parish of St. Helen, "London, the said James Harvey being then a foreigner from the liberties of the said "City, and the said defendant knowing, and having due notice given to him, that the "said James Harvey at the time he was set on work as aforesaid was a foreigner from the "liberties of the said City, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the said act of "common council, whereby the said defendant hath forfeited the sum of 5*l.*, and whereby "an action hath accrued to the said plaintiff to demand and have of and from the said "defendant the said sum of 5*l.* above demanded. Yet the said defendant, although often "requested so to do, hath not yet paid to the said plaintiff the said sum of 5*l.* above

"demanded, but hath hitherto altogether refused and still doth refuse to pay him the "said sum."

507. Do you apprehend there is any obstacle interposed to the admission of members into the City companies, of operatives, except the payment of an entrance fee, with a view to limit their numbers?—Certain companies. They have byelaws limiting their numbers; the higher class of companies especially.

508. Can you give any instances?—The instances are all before the Commissioners in this Report. It is especially the case in companies which are trustees of very large estates.

509. The question referred to operatives. Is there any attempt, by limiting the numbers, to keep up the price of labour, except that which consists in the charge of an admission fee on becoming a freeman?—The companies open for operatives are the only companies which I understand to come within the question.

510. Is any operative admitted to those companies as a matter of right, if willing to pay the fee?—Certainly, in all those companies which admit operatives; but all those companies which demand the highest price in the shape of fines on admission of course necessarily exclude operatives. I question whether that is not the case in all companies, pro tanto. Suppose the fine be 15*l.* only, how many operatives can find that sum? Since the year 1835 an operative may become free of the City on paying 6*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* A butcher need not go to the butchers' company in order to become free; but if he becomes a master butcher the City come down upon him, and say, "You shall take out your freedom."

511. If a man is free of the City, has he a right to belong to any of those companies?—Not unless he pays the money. He is not free of the company because he has purchased the freedom of the City. Each company has terms of admission, and his being free of the City does not enable him to become a fellowship porter If you employ me to take a message for you instead of a ticket porter in the City of London we both are liable to a penalty.

512. Who fixes the price of admission to the company of fellowship porters?—Their rulers.

513. Does the price vary?—It has not varied recently. It is one fixed price to all men.

514. Do you apprehend that it varies according to the number on the list. When the number is full, do not they raise the price to prevent others from coming in?—The company is never full, in the case of a poor company; the admission of freemen is a great source of income. In rich companies it is a great inconvenience. They are exclusive in their character, and wish to remain so.

515. Is not it the case, that a person who is free of the City, and not free of a company, is out of the prohibition which you read from the paper in the case of Woodley?—Yes; if he becomes a freeman of the City that ordinance of 1835 holds him harmless to work as a journeyman butcher. There is, however, a question between the companies and the City about that law. The companies contend that the law trenches upon their privileges.

516. The next point is that of wards, upon which you have already made a statement to the Commission?—One peculiarity of the wards deserves notice, namely, that the wards do not comprise any certain number of parishes. Parishes are broken in the arrangement of the wards, which, if the wards were to be retained, is extremely objectionable. Charities are sometimes left to parishes; sometimes to wards; sometimes between parishes and wards; and as wards do not comprise entire parishes, there is a great difficulty in the arrangement; and this difficulty appears very obvious in the register of the revising barrister, where it seems that the parties are given under wards; but where parishes being partly in one ward, and partly in another, two wards are put together, so that from the list you cannot tell which ward any particular voter votes for. It is a practical difficulty, which if ever the Commission come to the arrangement of wards it would be well for the Commissioners to know. The local parochial divisions and the ward divisions are not harmonious. With the disparity in size the Commissioners are perfectly acquainted.

517. Would you wish to keep up the distinction of wards in the City at all?—The present division of wards cannot be maintained; and as the division cannot be maintained, I think it scarcely desirable to keep up the division of wards at all, for the identity of the name would be lost if you altered the divisions.

418. You state that wards, as wards, have charities attached to them?—Yes, as wards; therefore the wards will need to be retained for the charitable purposes of the trust; but they need not be maintained as municipal wards.

519. Do you think it would be better that there should be no division of the nature of wards in the City of London at all?—If there should be a division, it does not necessarily follow that it should be under the form of wards.

520. In the Municipal Corporation Reform Act, all towns of a certain size were directsd to be divided into wards, and that is the case throughout the country?—I am rather disposed to object to division into wards. I am disposed to think that it encourages party feeling, local prejudices and preferences; that it induces an assumption of superiority, or an allegation of inferiority. I am disposed to think that the constituency should not be split up into wards.

521. Your objection would apply the general system in other towns in England as well as to London, in that respect?—If there be anything in it it would; but at all events I apply it to the City of London; and if hereafter I should be permitted to put before the Commissioners what I would submit as a scheme for the supercession of the present system by a better, that question would form a component part of such scheme

522. Have you a plan of that kind for the better government of the City of London which you are prepared to submit to the Commissioners?—I have not It will be in your memory, that on one or two occasions, when I have been asked questions tending to that point, I have suggested that the evidence of fact might be better completed first; and that at the conclusion I should be very happy to submit to the Commissioners a scheme which I am maturing, and with which I shall be prepared in a few days.

523. With respect to the police, have you any observation to make upon the present system on which the police of the City of London is managed?—I think the police o the City of London is well managed. We all recollect when there was a very strong prejudice against the introduction of the police in the place of the old watchmen. The old watchmen were a very peculiar class in the City of London, and of course they had their friends, for they very seldom found the thieves, and there was a strong prejudice in the minds of a certain class against the police. I may say there was a general prejudice; but they have outlived that prejudice, and in the City it is admitted that the police is well conducted. I scarcely know of an exception to that feeling. The commissioner of police is appointed by the corporation. They, however, do not materially interfere with him. I think he is not a man likely long to remain commissioner of police if he were unduly interfered with. He admirably conducts the police. At the same time I have no hesitation in saying that I think the police of the metropolis should be homogeneous. I think it should have but one authority. However they may have removed trifling local difficulties, as I understand they have removed one which existed, namely, the demarcation between the City boundary and the county boundary, which prevented the City policemen going into the county after a thief, and vice versâ, I think, as a question of high polity, the control and direction of the police force of the metropolis should be in the hands of the Government. It is, after all, a governmental metropolis; and the citizen ought not to lose sight of it in his local prejudices in favour of the City of London. I believe the police to be as well administered as it can well be in the City of London. I think it would be as well administered if it were not distinct from the metropolitan police; and then I think if that be the case the weight which turns the scale is the consideration that you would have unity of action and promptitude of action emanating from one responsible source.

524. Is not the City district now completely surrounded by the district of the metropolitan police?—And more than surrounded; it is intersected. There are portions of the City of London into which a City policeman has no right to enter. By law his entrance is barred. I mean portions within the City of London. It is much the same as it was formerly with the counties. A portion of the county of Middlesex might be in the county of Cumberland, and so it is in the City of London. Portions of Middlesex are isolated districts within the boundary of the City of London. I allude especially to the parishes of St. Bartholomew and Glasshouse Yard, and other localities of that kind.

525. In addition to the diminution of harmony of action which is produced by the separation, would not the consolidation tend also to greater economy in the management?—One would think so; upon general principles it is so. I am not sure that the expenditure is extravagant. I am not sure how that may be.

526. Does not the separation of the City police from the general body of the metropolitan police create the necessity of a separate staff for that limited district?—Yes; but still I think any considerable extension of the metropolitan police, for instance, with the City of London, would necessitate more or less an augmentation of the staff above what would be necessary if it were not in the City of London. The City of London, I should say, requires a greater number of police in proportion to its magnitude than any other portion of the metropolis. The warehouses in the City of London are left at night. I live among those warehouses in Milk Street, Cheapside, and I have reason daily and nightly to observe the extreme care with which the policemen examine all the fastenings of those warehouses and counting-houses when there is no person to take care of them, and when, in fact, they are in the sole custody of the police. That is not the case out of the City of London to anything like the same extent. If a family is out of town, a servant is left in the house to take care of it. It is not so in the City of London, to a considerable extent. The portions of other jurisdictions which are thus isolated within the City are small, but perhaps not so small as may be imagined. With respect to the parishes of St. Bartholomew, which are privileged parishes, when the City of London took out summonses against 4,032 non-freemen, to compel them to take up their freedom, among that number there were many, I think 170, who were occupiers in that very parish; and therefore, if there were 170 to be summoned in that parish, whom they had no right to summon, which they admitted afterwards when the inquiry was gone into, it is not so small a portion as the Commissioners might be led to imagine. Glasshouse Yard may not include above fifty or sixty occupiers.

J. Acland, Esq.

527. The next head under which this inquiry is divided is the head of "Port of London." You have already made certain statements to the Commissioners upon that subject; is there anything further you wish to state?—It is an intricate subject, as the Commissioners state; but it is intricate rather because of the defects of the present municipal system. The corporation assume to be, and they are practically, the conservators of the Thames. Whether legally so or not I must leave between the Government and the corporation; but it is a point of the highest importance to the commercial interests of the City of London that the corporation should not remain conservators of the Thames. The power given them under their old charters enables them to impose so many restriction upon trade, so many vexatious imposts upon commerce, that it is highly desirable that those charters should be abrogated, and the commerce of the port of London set free. The items which I had the honour of submitting to the Commissioners on a previous occasion, in reference to the corn-metage and other metages, were inaccurately stated, if the Commission understood me that the amounts I gave were anything like the amounts exacted from the commerce of the City of London. There appears in the corporation accounts for 1852 a sum of 9,567*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* against the entry "Metage Duty on Corn imported." That is not anything like the amount of metage duty on corn which is paid. The entry is made among the receipts of the corporation under the head "Market Tolls and Duties." I suppose that comes under the term "Duty." Metage duty on corn imported, 9,000*l.*, does not mean what it appears to state; it means metage duty to four or five or six time sthat amount, but metage duty yielding to the corporation a balance of 9,596*l.* It does not appear in the account as a balance; it does not appear, as I submit it should, as a total, with a credit of the payments made on the other side. No entry of the fees paid to an innumerable host of vampires who live upon the commerce of London under that term, and under the term fruit metage, appears in that book. They are paid by the corporation, and the corporation net 9,500*l.*, and they enter it as though that were the amount of metage on corn imported.

528. Do the City of London publish any account of their gross revenue, or does their account only give the net revenue?—Their account is incomprehensible. If you turn to page 61, there is a statement of the cash in the hands of the chamberlain at the end of that year; that cash amounts to 228,000*l.* It professes to be the balances of some fifty accounts, as nearly as I can guess, some of them overdrawn, some of them having balances in hand, and deducting the overdrawn account from the balances in hand it shows that the balance is 228,000*l.* as cash in hand. I take upon me to say that they have nothing like that amount of cash in hand.

529. Do they produce any account of their gross receipts, independently of the deductions which may afterwards be made?—No, they do not. In that case of corn metage, for instance, they do not.

530. The account of the expenditure is complete?—It is complete, if you take for granted, for instance, that 1,000*l.* covers the newspapers and the candles; it is complete in that shape.

531. The sums are complete, but the items are not particularized?—The sums appear on the face of the account to be complete; the particular items are not specified, and therefore, without a more searching audit, you cannot say that the sums as they appear are correct.

532. According to your account, that audit never takes place?—Certainly not an effectual audit; such an audit never takes place. That financial account appears under various heads; for instance, "Bridge House Estates," "Trophy Tax," and so on. You will find them differently paged, and the accounts run into each other. The salary given to Mr. Bunning, the eminent architect, is entered as his year's salary from the City funds, 1,500*l.* If you look fifty pages further, under a different heading, "Bridge House Estates," you there find "Mr. Bunning, a year's salary, 600*l.*" So that if you want to find what one person receives, whether as salary or disbursements, you must look right through the book under the great variety of headings which are in that book. It is a complicated system, which has the effect of producing that misunderstanding which the corporation on some occasions profess a desire to avoid. With respect to this account, misunderstanding is unavoidable; the account is unintelligible to anybody, but what I may call a police accountant, an accountant investigating an account for the purpose of satisfying himself of the accuracy of every item entered. If the Commission would be pleased to refer that book, which is an official document, to an accountant of high character, to prepare for them a statement of what the property of the City is, to what extent it is encumbered, and so on, and what the available assets are,—particulars very desirable to be ascertained,—the best accountant you could find would have extreme difficulty in satisfying himself. The corporation have mortgaged the present Smithfield market for 100,000*l.* within the last few weeks.

533. Have the City an unlimited power of executing charges upon their property?—I believe they have; that is, I believe they exercise such a power.

534. With respect to the mode in which brokers are appointed in the City of London, is there anything which you wish to state to the Commission?—This disadvantage results in the case of brokers, in the householders' sense of that term; I mean, brokers seizing under distress:—a broker acting for the corporation puts a poor man out of court; he is backed by his employer; that employer being a wealthy corporation, to stand against which were madness on the part of a poor man. I allude to the case of Gentry, one of those who, as I previously stated, had his goods seized and sold to defray the Mayor's Court charges and the corporation exaction of fine for freedom. Such a broker sells the goods, and makes no return, or merely returns a sofa, because there is a sofa too much. He seizes a great deal more than is necessary of the property, and the man has no remedy. He has indeed a remedy in law; his remedy being to fight the corporation of the City of London. The broker acts for the corporation of the City of London, and the corporation defends all its functionaries. Then also there are brokers in the City, in another sense of the term; brokers who, because they are admitted, and because they give sureties, are trusted by the public, as in a recent case within the last week, which I believe is now under investigation by the corporation, where the broker swindled a number of persons. I have no doubt if he had not been what is called a sworn broker the public would not have had faith in him as a broker; they would have examined for themselves, and ascertained whether he was trustworthy before they trusted him; but the effect of the corporation licensing a man to act as a broker is to give a fictitious position to that broker. He gives security for a most inefficient amount; but he pays a fine for his admission to the freedom of the corporation, which is the great object of the brokerage system, so far as the corporation is concerned, but which ought not to be the object. If it is desirable that a broker should be licensed, the licence should be efficient as a guarantee to the public against any malpractices.

535. Within the Stock Exchange itself are there no regulations with regard to the admission of brokers?—Yes; they have their own regulations.

536. Can a broker appear on the Stock Exchange without the sanction of the body?—I believe not. If he acts as a broker the corporation pursue him.

537. Is it necessary for a broker, in order to act on the Stock Exchange of London, to have both the sanction of the corporation and the sanction of the Stock Exchange?—I believe it is. If the corporation knew that any person acted as a broker who was not so they would summon him, and require him to take up his freedom; perhaps suing him for penalties.

538. Under the head of "Markets" is there anything which you wish to say to the Commission?—The markets are, or are not, the private property of the corporation. The markets which are the private property of the corporation yield a legitimate revenue; but I have to submit to the Commissioners that there is a market which is not the private property of the corporation, which they assume is their private property, and with respect to which they have acted illegally and oppressively on such an assumption; that is Billingsgate Market. I produce the 9th and 10th Vict. cap. 346., being "An Act to "repeal, alter, and amend the several Acts relating to Billingsgate Market in the City of "London." The first provision in this Act to which I will call your attention is the 7th. "And be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this Act Billingsgate Market shall "be in every day of the week, except Sunday, a free and open market for the wholesale and "retail sale of all sorts of fish; and that it shall and may be lawful for any person to buy "or sell, both by wholesale and retail, any sort of fish, or any quantity thereof, in the "said market, without any disturbance or molestation whatsoever." And then the 8th section gives the control, maintenance, and regulation of the said market to the lord mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, who are to have "authority, jurisdiction, "and control over the said market for the sale of fish both by wholesale and retail, as "they now have over the several other public markets of the said City." The 9th section refers to tolls. "And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the said mayor, aldermen, "and commons, in common council assembled, by themselves, or any of their collectors, "officers, or servants, to demand and take or cause to be demanded and taken the "several tolls specified in the schedule annexed to this Act, such tolls to be paid and "payable by the owner of the fish, or the salesman, consignee, or other person to whom "the same shall be delivered." Then there is a short schedule of tolls to be levied on every boat with river fish; in short, upon all boats bringing fish, and upon all carts, machines, vans, or waggons conveying fish, and no other tolls. Now the charge against the corporation in this instance is, that, notwithstanding they are thus limited as regards tolls to the schedule of the Act, and notwithstanding that schedule limits them to tolls upon vessels or carts bringing fish, they exact from those sixty salesmen, or thereabouts, the sum of about 20*l.* apiece, making the sum of 1,200*l.* a year, to which they have, as it is conceived, no legal claim whatever, and which is an exaction, and a grievous exaction, interfering with the supply and the price of a commodity which is essential to the support and health of the community.

539. Has not the question ever been tried in a court of law?—No.

540. Why not?—To fight against the corporation of London is a desperate thing. To appear here as a volunteer witness, as I am doing, is to bell the cat, and take the bull by the horns. It is worse to oppose them in a court of law.

541. How long have those payments been going on?—I can produce witnesses before you who remember when they were not, and who stood in the market when they were not.

542. Before the Act passed did not they take the same tolls as they do now?—I believe so. I know parties who are complaining under this grievance, and who have explained to me that beyond all question in their time—and they are not very old men—there were no such tolls.

543. Have they complained to the corporation on the subject?—I think not. I think the power of the corporation would crush any one of the sixty who mooted the objection, except under the protection of this Commission, which I hold to be a great protection to all those who are suffering under corporate oppression.

J. Acland, Esq.
4th Nov. 1853.

5442. Under the head of "Porters" have you anything more to state to the Commission?—The fellowship free porters are at issue with the corporation, and are seeking justice at the hands of the corporation, by an appeal to the civic legislature. I am sure I shall not be understood as advocating the system which I have been all along condemning. It was a most impolitic thing, in my opinion, ever to impose this system upon the commerce of London; nevertheless, here is a community existing under the authority of the corporation, possessing rights, and claiming of that corporation fair play and fair dealing as towards it. When the London Dock Act was passed a clause was introduced compelling the London Dock Company to make compensation to all those with whose vested interests that dock interfered. In the year 1807, the late Sir William Curtis, alderman, being the governor of the fellowship free porters, as Alderman Sidney, the lord mayor elect, is now governor of the free porters, he received from the London Dock Company 11,366*l.* as the compensation of 130 ticket porters whose business was interfered with by the company. That money was distributed among the ticket porters, and they were well satisfied. I think they had about 90*l.* each. With respect to the free porters, the men who do the porterage on the Thames, and who would have done the porterage as regards the ships which enter the docks, but that the dock companies have their own labourers who usurp the position of the free porters, it is contended that they should have, and it is almost believed that somebody has had, for them, a similar compensation to that which the ticket porters received. It would not appear that the ticket porters, on the face of it, were so likely to be entitled to compensation from the dock company as the ship porters, who load and unload. Those men say, if the system is to be done away with, or if it is to be interfered with, they have a right to compensation pro tanto to the amount to which their vested interests may be effected. They have petitioned the Court of Common Council very often, and they cannot get anything like attention to their petitions. The liberal feeling which has been growing up even in the City corporation of late years, consequent upon the emancipation of trade from restrictive laws, has begotten a feeling of adverse to the claims of those men,—adverse to the institution. I can easily understand how in justice it might be; but as to those men, their tools, or rather their investments in the matter, and of their own creation, how the corporation can turn their backs upon them, in the face of the ordinances of the Court of Common Council, and the legitimate claims which it seems to me they have, I cannot understand? The men do, however, complain that their vested interests are being taken from them without compensation. Many of them are old and decayed, and they look with extreme suspicion upon the conduct of the officials of the corporation who are at the head of their body. They complain that no sufficient accounts are rendered of the money which is diverted from their own funds by an officer for whom they are bound to find a capital of 7,000*l.*, though he is only an officer of theirs, in order that he may carry on the business of his office. They complain, in fact, of many grievances of this kind, and that the corporation turn a deaf ear to all their petitions, upon the principle, as I heard stated in the Court of Common Council, "It is a very dirty case; we ought never to have had such people." That is very true; they ought never to have had them; but they have had them; they have sanctioned them, and they have passed ordinances recognizing their right; and yet the corporation, which standsup for its own franchises,—its exceptional privileges,—denies the right, and turns a deaf ear to these men.

545. Is it the case that the dock company have within their own docks the right of employing their own servants, without respect to the privileges of the City?—On the contrary, I assert that there is a clause in the dock company's Act which entitles all persons with whose occupation they interfere to demand compensation to that extent.

546. Still, provided they give compensation, they are taken out of the operation of the general law relating to the City, and they may employ their own servants, and they actually do so?—That is so; and that suggests the idea, that if a fair estimate were made of the value of those exclusive and objectionable privileges on the part of the corn-meters, coal-meters, fruit-meters, and the like, the merchants of the City of London would be most happy to buy up those obnoxious privileges, and thus emancipate the commerce of the City of London. I have no authority for making that statement; but I think I know enough of the feeling of the merchants of the City of London to warrant me in making it.

547. Are you aware of a single trade privilege connected with the City of London which it is desirable to maintain?—A trade privilege is always a trade injustice. A trade privilege implies a preference of one man to another, and that must imply the prejudice of that other man. A privilege, further, implies the advantage of a few to the disadvantage of the many; otherwise it would not be a privilege; it would be a persecution of the few; and I have yet to learn how a privilege to the few can be otherwise than a persecution to the many. An oppression it certainly is. I know of no reason why any exclusive trade privilege should be perpetuated in favour of any man or any set of men.

548. The trade privileges in the City are very numerous and very various, are not they?—Yes, they are.

549. Are you aware of any, out of them, which can be considered to be of beneficial operation, or of any public utility?—I know of none which can be so accounted. I know of none at all desirable, except to the recipients of the pecuniary advantage, which is an infliction upon those who pay. J. Acland, Esq. 4th Nov. 1853.

550. Have you anything to say respecting the property of the companies?—I should like to endeavour to make this account of the corporation consistent with common sense, whatever the effect of such an attempt might be. I think an analysis of this account, throwing, as they do not, the different heads of the account under which they have a pecuniary interest together, so that we may arrive at the aggregate of their means, and their charges upon their means, and their expenditure of a portion of those means, would be very desirable.

551. Is there any other point to which you desire to call the attention of the Commission?—With reference to the elections at common hall, I have stated to the Commission that in 1846 there was a severe contest in the City of London for the office of lord mayor. The candidates were Sir George Carroll and Alderman Thomas Wood. Alderman Thomas Wood is now chief clerk at the Guildhall justice room. He was then a candidate for the mayoralty. On that occasion there was a great deal of bribery. The far greater portion of the bribery was on the side of Alderman Wood. I hold in my hand a list of the persons who received bribes on that occasion in his interest. They should be liverymen; and, assuming that they were, I have ascertained which of them are still on the livery list and the parliamentary register, and for this reason: that if it shall be your desire, at any period in the course of this inquiry, to receive full evidence of the extent of the corruption practised at those elections, you have here the names of the companies to which they belong, and of some hundreds of liverymen, who, on that occasion, received bribes, and who polled on the days stated in each of those lists. I also hold in my hand evidence with reference to the election of Mr. Alderman Brown, the late chamberlain, to that office, in 1844. Bribery is the rule on those occasions. I happen to have in my possession the original receipts of some eleven or twelve of the parties who were actively engaged upon that occasion, and I find that of those eleven seven are still in existence, and I am prepared to give you their names, if you desire to go further into the question.

552. Do you mean that those were voters, and that they gave receipts for the sum they received for their votes?—It is under the shape of attendance; so many days, at 10*s.* a day. They were more than voters. The system is one of notorious and extensive bribery; and if the Commissioners are at all in doubt upon that point, as to the quality of the liverymen electing, under the present system, the corporate officers, and are disposed to seek further evidence, my only object is to say that here are the means of summoning some of the parties. These are the originals, which I will always hold at the command of the Commission, and I am having a fair copy made, which I will hand in as soon as it is in my power to do so.

Adjourned to Tuesday next, at twelve o'clock.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE IN THE CHAIR.

JAMES ACLAND Esq. was further examined as follows:— J. Acland, Esq. 8th Nov. 1853.

553. Are there any points, which you have omitted in the previous examinations, to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commission?—I desire to make a few observations upon the Irish Society. It is a society in the interest of the twelve principal guilds or livery companies of the City of London; and, until the year 1832, its governing body was composed of delegations from those twelve guilds. Some difficulty arose with reference to one of the companies. I think, if I remember right, the salters' company. The charter required that a certain proportion from each company should constitute the government of the society; and the salters' company, having very few members, were frequently obliged to put an alderman in the place of a salter; and at last the inconvenience became so great that the corporation of the City of London undertook its management by a board, consisting of a governor, deputy governor, and twenty-four common councilmen.

554. Was there any Act of Parliament passed to facilitate that change?—I am not sure how the change was legalized.

555. Is the property now in the corporation of the City of London, or in those companies?—It is still in the companies. The change had this effect, that it gave to the corporation of the City of London a considerable amount of patronage. The governor of the Irish Society is one of the aldermen of the City of London; Alderman Humphery. Its late secretary, Mr. Slade, was a common councilman. His assistant clerk was the son of a common councilman. The present secretary, Mr. Davis, was a common councilman. The late agent in Ireland,—a very responsible situation, and a very lucrative one,—

J. Acland, Esq.

8th Nov. 1853.

Mr. Fletcher, was a common councilman; and his successor, the present agent, Mr. Green, was late the deputy of the ward of Aldgate, which is the ward for which Alderman Humphery is the alderman. So that Alderman Humphery, representing the ward of Aldgate in the councils of the corporation, and being governor of the Irish Society, appoints or procures the appointment of his deputy for Aldgate to the situation of agent to the society on those estates in Ireland. At the last contest for secretary there were twelve candidates. The number of those candidates was reduced to three, of whom two were common councilmen and one the son of a common councilman, and one of the two common councilmen was elected.

556. I observe it is stated by the former Commissioners that the Irish estates under the charge of the general corporation, as well as those under the several companies, are managed with great liberality and benefit to their tenants. Have you any reason to doubt the correctness of that assertion?—I have a strong impression to the contrary. I am aware that the journals of the locality, the daily papers, have frequently complained of the misgovernment of the corporation of the Irish estates. They complain that there is no inducement to the tenants to improve the property, and that if it were in individual hands the property would be immensely improved. The particular grounds of those complaints I am not prepared with; but I am prepared to say that there is in Ireland, at all events, a very strong feeling that the estates are not in good hands.

557. You have no personal knowledge upon the subject?—I have no personal knowledge, except such knowledge as a perusal of the Irish papers of that district may have given me.

558. Is there any other point to which you desire to address yourself?—I am anxious to address a few observations to the Commissioners on a question of very great importance, as it strikes me, involving a very important principle. I mean the practice of the corporation of the City of London, through their recognized agent, the remembrancer of the corporation, interfering needlessly and mischievously in the progress of bills in their passage through Parliament, and in the introduction of clauses calculated to except the City of London from the operation of beneficial Acts of Parliament, and so to prejudice the community over which they preside. I had occasion, on a former day, to observe upon their resistance to the County Courts Act, so far as its application to the City of London went. The County Courts Act being a good Act of Parliament, and greatly in the interest of the community at large, it followed naturally that in course of time the citizens of London found it desirable that that which was enjoyed by other parts of the country should be participated by them in the City of London; and then the Corporation had to expend, I think, seven or eight hundred pounds in getting a special Act of Parliament to do that at a later period which they might better have done at an earlier date. On the present occasion, I will call your especial notice to the circumstance of the interference of the corporation, in the last session of Parliament, with reference to the Charity Trusts Act. The Charity Trusts Act has for its object to give to the community a prompt and economical remedy in all cases of abuse in charitable trusts. No one can question the character of such an Act of Parliament. It was of great interest in the City that that Act of Parliament should be participated in by the citizens, for in the City of London we have 691 charities held in trust by the livery companies, and 740 held in trust by the parochial officers, giving a total of 1,431. The annual returns from the trusts held by livery companies amount to 60,478*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.* The annual amount of charity trust funds held by parochial officers within the City is 47,591*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* Giving a total of 108,069*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*, as the annual income from charity trusts within the City of London, as far back as 1832, when the Commissioners on Charities sat. In all human probability that annual value is now greatly increased. The manner in which the Charity Trusts Bill proposes to remedy the abuses of public charities is this: that whereas it was very expensive to go to the Court of Chancery in order to complain of a grievance and procure a remedy, it is now enacted that Commissioners shall be appointed before whom any person may complain of maladministration of a trust; that is, I think, any of the trustees, or any three inhabitants of the locality. The Commissioners entertaining the question decide, aye or no, Is there cause for further procedure? Is there an abuse? If there be an abuse, they give their fiat to the applicant to proceed in one of two ways; either in the superior courts, by an application, not to the lord chancellor, as formerly, but to the master of the rolls or one of the vice-chancellors; or, on the other hand, to the Court of Requests or the Court of Bankruptcy of the locality. And they are governed as to the court they shall refer the question to by the amount of the charity. If the charity be not exceeding 30*l.*, then the Commissioners have power to send the complainants to the County Court or the Court of Bankruptcy of the district. If it exceeds 30*l.*, then they are sent to one of the vice-chancellors or to the master of the rolls. Now, as the number of charities whose annual produce is not more than 30*l.* each is 1,076 out of the 1,431, the total number of charities, leaving only 355 of which the annual amount exceeds 30*l.*, this appeared to give, as proposed in the Legislature, a most desirable advantage to the citizens of London, as regards those charities. But a clause was introduced in the House of Commons, through the instrumentality of the remembrancer of the corporation of London, to this effect, that all the trust charities within the City of London of 30*l.* and under should be taken to be charities of over 30*l.*, so as to throw upon all complainants the obligation of resorting to the master of the rolls or one of the vice-chancellors, instead of the cheaper and more prompt remedy of the Bankruptcy Court or of the County Court of the locality. This is the extent of the complaint upon that head. But you will see the great importance of my complaint when I state to you that in the last inquiry,—the inquiry before the Commissioners in 1832,—looking to their report, it appears that there had been misapplications of the charities held in trust by the livery companies to an extent involving 21,133*l.* of principal money, besides an annual sum of 910*l.*; and that as regards the parochial charities of the City of London, there had been misapplication of funds to the extent of 10,805*l.* of principal money, and of 4,564*l.* annual sums; that of the livery exhibitions,—the exhibitions held in trust by the livery companies,—8,184*l.* annually had either been misapplied or not applied at all. Giving a total of 31,938*l.* of principal money misapplied, and 13,659*l.* of annual payments misapplied. And if you bring the annual payments of 13,659*l.* into a principal sum, at the rate of four per cent., it will make a grand total of defalcation or misapplication of 318,783*l.* I will hand in a statement which I have prepared for this purpose, showing you the magnitude of the question as regards the charities of the City of London, which are most of them very old. One does not charge malversation upon the present trustees; but, looking simply at the fact that the Commissioners report that there had been these malversations and misapplications or negligences, you will understand with how great interest the citizens of London looked towards the benevolent measure proposed by the Government in the Legislature with respect to charity funds, and you will imagine their vexation that the corporation should stand between them and justice (justice, by-the-bye, to the poor), by the introduction of that clause exempting from the operation of the Act,—not merely the charities of the corporation,—not merely the charities held in trust by the livery companies,—but all charities within the City of London, including all the parochial charities, with which description of charities the corporation officially have nothing to do. I beg to hand in the statement to which I have referred. (The same was delivered in, and is as follows):—

J. Acland, Esq.

8th Nov. 1853.

559. Is there any other point to which you desire to advert?—I am anxious to say a few words upon a subject which has greatly interested, not merely the inhabitants of the City but of the metropolis, and not merely of the metropolis but of twenty miles round. I advert to the coal dues; the history of which may be said to lie in a nutshell. The corporation of London in former times lent money to a sovereign, which money was lost, and the coal dues were granted to the corporation, in order that they might be repaid the amount they had advanced. That amount was repaid by the coal dues; and that amount being repaid, one would think there should have been an end of the imposition. But not so; from time to time the corporation have procured what may be called a renewal of their Parliamentary leases, and that lease now existing I think will expire in the year 1862, about nine years hence. They toll the coal consumed by the citizens of London, and they toll the coal consumed by every inhabitant of this metropolis and within twenty miles of its centre. Surely the metropolitans have a right to complain that the corporation of the City of London taxes that necessary of life. First, that they tax it against all policy, because to tax a necessary of life is not only against policy, but against humanity, for it must tax most heavily those who can least afford to pay it. And next they have a right to complain of the injustice of the citizens of London taxing the citizens of Westminster in such a matter, especially in a matter which no more concerns the citizens of Westminster than it does the inhabitants of York. Why are the citizens of Westminster to be made to pay this debt from the Crown to the City of London, rather than the inhabitants of Manchester or Birmingham?

J. Acland, Esq.

8th Nov. 1853.

560. Is it not the case, that part of the proceeds of those coal dues is applied to the improvement of other parts of the metropolis besides the City?—It is so; but the argument is not affected by that, because the City of London at all events tax the citizens of Westminster more than 4*d.* The citizens of Westminster have to pay 13*d.* per ton tax upon their coal, and they only have expended upon the metropolis at large 8*d.* The City of London take that 4*d.* a ton from the inhabitants of Westminster, and from every inhabitant within a radius of twenty miles, as their private property, and they claim to have an equal right to that 4*d.*, under the Act of Parliament, with any other portion of their City estates, and to do what they please with it. Now it is the least important portion of the argument, that it amounts to a very large sum of money. The more important matter is the impolicy, the injustice, the dishonesty of the principle involved. I say dishonesty, because the debt has long been paid, and the tax is still continued. How the corporation have been enabled to deceive the legislature upon the point, as I must assume they have, I know not; but assuredly this tax is not an honest tax as it regards the inhabitants of other portions of the metropolis. The 4*d.* tax received by the City in 1852 amounted to 62,440*l.* The penny tax received by the City to defray the expenses of carrying out the Act of Parliament amounted to 15,607*l.* The 8*d.* tax received and expended I believe by the Board of Works (which was the Woods and Forests) amounted to 124,880*l.* Making a total of 202,927*l.* The Commissioners are aware that a portion of this is levied within the port of London, and another portion of it is levied from the canals and railroads within twenty miles of London.

561, Are you aware that we have abundant information on this point in the report of the House of Commons committee?—I am not going further into it; but it has been complained, and I believe with justice, that the corporation obtained an undue advantage on the last occasion of this matter being before Parliament, in extending the twenty miles by the road, which had always previously been the limits, to twenty miles as the crow flies. It was a surprise upon the Legislature and upon the Government, and certainly a surprise upon the trade. Very extensive complaints are reaching me from all quarters around this twenty miles upon the subject. I have been asked by many, whether the Commissioners would receive their memorials, and I have said that there could be no harm in sending them, and that I had no doubt they would receive them. The people of Croydon have a good right to ask why they should be taxed to pay the debts of the Government to the City of London, or for the purpose of improving the City of London.

562. Without entering into the policy of the coal tax at all, if seaborne coals have to pay the tax on coming to London, do you think it unreasonable that coals brought by land carriage should pay the same tax; that they should be put upon the same footing?—Then, upon that principle, I should say, why have you a limit of twenty miles? Why do you stop at twenty miles? If the principle is good for anything, it should extend over the empire. My answer to the question is, yes. If the one is just the other is just; but the one not being just, the other cannot be just, of the same kind. The Commissioners are aware that there is a strong feeling in London upon this question, and I am not disposed to trouble you by enlarging more upon it. I think in a few words I have put the question fairly before the Commissioners.

563. When you were last here you said that you wished to put in some observations in writing upon the financial accounts of the City of London. Will you have the goodness to do so?—I hold in my hand a statement of the produce and expenditure of the City estates, published by the corporation as the account for the year 1852.

564. Have you a duplicate copy of that?—They are extremely difficult to get; they are made for special circulation; and they are not adapted for general circulation. It is the most talented book I ever attempted to understand, because I take its purpose to be to prevent anybody understanding it. Certainly I am utterly unable to understand it. There is a statement in this book which purports to be the chamberlain's account with the corporation, made by the chamberlain, in which he debits himself with the receipts, and credits himself with the expenditure. There is another officer of the corporation, called the comptroller; and at the close of the account of the chamberlain you will find the account of the comptroller, in which he debits the chamberlain for the receipts, under the head of "City Income". Now it occurred to me that the comptroller's account debiting the chamberlain should be a check on the chamberlain's account debiting himself. Of the thirteen items of which it is composed, I find but one item that agrees in amount. The first item at page 1 is: "By general rents within the City of London and liberties thereof" the chamberlain debits himself with 43,415*l.* 7*s.* 5½*d.* At page 69 the comptroller debits the chamberlain for the same item 44,455*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, being a difference which should leave the chamberlain debtor to the corporation, beyond his account stated, 1,040*l.* 3*s.* 7½*d.* Then the second item is of precisely the same kind, leaving the chamberlain debtor 319*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* over and above what he states himself in his account to be debtor to the corporation. The next item is of a different sort. There the chamberlain debits himself 82*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.*; the comptroller debiting him only 69*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; making a credit to the chamberlain of 12*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* The office of the comptroller, I need scarcely state, is to check the accounts between the chamberlain and the corporation of London; and there is only one item in the account in which they agree. The total difference between the two accounts is upwards of 9,000*l.* If you subtract the total of the one account from the total of the other, you will find that the chamberlain's account against himself amounts to 9,000*l.* and odd less than the comptroller in his account charges him. But that 9,000*l.* involves a considerably larger amount. It is like a penny wrong in the accounts of a banking house, for which they hunt for hours, because it may involve many other amounts; so that this sum of 9,000*l.* involves a considerably larger amount. But taking it at 9,000*l.*, then I have to submit to you that at all events the discrepancies in the accounts have to be accounted for before you by the corporation, and that the account which they profess to publish should be an account which the Commissioners should understand. I think, when they look into it, they will find that it is an account which they cannot understand. I was anxious to discover how these differences might have arisen; and it occurred to me that possibly the chamberlain might have deducted expenses which the comptroller had not deducted from the gross amounts. But there is a case in the comptroller's account, the fourth item, respecting the Finsbury estate, where the comptroller deducts the expenses, and the chamberlain does not; so that I was completely deprived of that which I had thought a happy means of solving the apparent discrepancy.

J. Acland, Esq.

8th Nov. 1853.

565. What are the relations of the comptroller to the chamberlain? Does the comptroller make payments, or does he, in fact, audit the accounts?—No. The chamberlain makes the payments; the comptroller renders an account to the corporation of all sums in which he thinks the corporation should debit the chamberlain or treasurer, and in such account there appears to be 9,000*l.* more than the amount with which the chamberlain debits himself.

566. Does the comptroller execute the duties of an auditor?—Not exactly that; but, for example, in the case of the coal dues, the clerk of the coal market has to deliver to the comptroller every afternoon the particulars of the quantity of coal entered, and the amount of dues received. Before he goes to the chamberlain's office he lodges that account with the comptroller, and then he proceeds to the chamberlain's office, which is the treasury department of the corporation, to pay the money.

567. Then he accounts to the comptroller before he pays the money into the corporation?—It appears so.

568. Then the comptroller's part would be the reverse of an audit; it is rather a preliminary check.—It is so.

569. Do you know what relation the comptroller bears to the auditor?—I should say, none whatever. I should say that the auditor should also audit the accounts of the comptroller; the auditor should see that the comptroller does not debit the chamberlain with more money than should go to his debit; and per contra. I cannot see any relationship between the two.

570. Then the comptroller is an accounting officer; not an auditing officer?—He receives nothing. He is the check.

571. Does he render an account?—He renders an account, and here it is published. I have no doubt that in the evidence given by the corporate officers on the former occasion they will have described the special duties of the comptroller; but I find it somewhat difficult satisfactorily to describe them, except as I practically instance them in the case of coal duties. The comptroller seems to be a check as against the commission of error, and the auditor seems to be an officer appointed to detect errors, and point them out. I do not think the comptroller has any other function than that of acting as a check. In these accounts you will find that it is a very general practice of the corporation of London, as far as their accountancy goes, to merge a very great number of items under one head; so that it is extremely difficult to analyse the portions which may be allotted to any one of the heads of this combined account, and you are thus prevented from making out the exact amounts of the different portions of those items. Take, for instance, the charges connected with the office of lord mayor. You will find, at page 17, the sum of 7,151*l.* "To the lord mayor, the late deputy sea coal meters, and others; compensation allowances for the loss of emoluments on the abolition of the metage of coals." Now if we are anxious to know what the office of lord mayor costs the City, how are we to find it out? How are we to know what proportion of that 7,151*l.* goes to the lord mayor, and what proportion to the coal meters? I beg to hand in, for your consideration hereafter, a general statement of the differences in the accounts between the comptroller and the chamberlain. I also beg to hand in these charges, as connected with the office of lord mayor, but with this remark, that of course, after the observation I have just made, I cannot vouch that this item is correct; indeed I am sure it cannot be, because whatever proportion the sea coal meters have to take of the 7,151*l.* must be deducted from this; but here we have under the head of lord mayor sums making a total of 13,889*l.* I am willing to take off the 7,151*l.*, when I can be told on authority what I am to put in its place as the lord mayor's portion of that 7,151*l.* There are three items in this which seem rather singular, and worthy of attention. At page 42 you will find the lord mayor had a violet gown supplied to him; but the account will not tell you how much was paid for it, because with the lord mayor's violet gown two gowns for sheriffs' yeomen are combined, and you thus are ignorant of the amount which the violet gown cost, until I tell you that the sheriffs' yeomens' gowns cost 7*l.* 7*s.*, so that there was a violet gown which cost 15*l.* for the lord mayor. At page 37 in the same year you will find that Mr. William Price was paid for a silk violet gown for the lord mayor 18*l.*; so that there are two gowns for the lord mayor in that year,—two silk gowns, I suppose,—the one 18*l.* and the other 15*l.*; and at page 57 you will find a payment to William Price for a crimson velvet robe for the lord mayor, on the occasion of the Duke of Wellington's funeral, 72*l.* Making 100 guineas for three gowns for the lord mayor in one year. At page 40 you will find that the sword-bearer and the common crier have each a gown costing 30*l.* each, because they had not had a gown for three years. In the year 1849, then, I naturally look to find the same charge; and I find they had 30*l.* each because they had not had a gown for three years. But in the year 1850 I find they each had a gown costing 30*l.* each, because the Coal Exchange was opened in that year. So that, although there were gowns in 1849 which cost 30*l.* for the sword-bearer, and 30*l.* for the common crier, they needed new gowns in 1850, at 30*l.* expense for each, and in 1852 they each had another new gown because they had not had one for three years; but they certainly had each had one two years back; they had had two within three years. This does not seem to imply a very careful charge of the pecuniary affairs of the City of London. With respect to the law expenses for the year 1852 in the accounts before you (which it would take you some time and give you much trouble to find, for they are spread through the entire of the volume in single items), they amount to 3,973*l.* At page 14 you will find:—"Holding Court of Pie Poudre, 7*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*" We had thought that court would have disappeared with Bartholomew Fair; it had been thought so in the City; but it seems to be continued, and to involve legal expenses of some kind, for here we have a charge of 7*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* for holding a Court of Pie Poudre. At page 15 you will find 200*l.* for a suit in Chancery, in relation to the oyster meters, and in the same page 70*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.* for a suit with respect to markets; and then at page 19 you find one of very many charges which have been incurred by the City of London for legal proceedings between the corporation of London and Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Co., on a question whether they may carry their malt from their malthouse to their warehouse without the corporation touching it, and charging them metage. There is the sum of 506*l.* 15*s.* this year in that one case. The whole legal expenses (without occupying your time needlessly by going through them) amount to 3,973*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.* The corporation have, as all the world knows, a state carriage; they have also a navigation barge and a shallop. I have no items about the state carriage. I could not copy the whole amount, but I have extracts of the expenses in relation to the navigation barge and shallop for the year 1852; they amount to 541*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.*, and for the four years 1849 to 1852 they amount to 2,411*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*; giving an aggregate of more than 600*l.* a year towards the expense of water excursions of the corporation of London. On a former occasion I gave the amount paid to the committee men of the corporation, or rather paid to committees of the corporation, at, I think, 2,825*l.* I find it is more. I then stated also that in addition to that there was 500*l.* for swan hopping. That 500*l.* appears to be 750*l.* Then, again, the 300*l.* to the improvement committee I do not find in that account. The little pocket book which I hold in my hand cost the corporation 120*l.* It is therefore an official document and is good evidence for the various items of all the various committees. It gives an item of 300*l.* to the improvement committee, and why it is not in the accounts I have yet to learn. However, that goes to the extent of 300*l.*, in addition to my former estimate of 2,825*l.* Then there is 600*l.* to the Irish Society, which I did not include in that 2,825*l.*, because it does not come out of the estates of the corporation, but out of the estates of the Irish Society; but it goes into the pockets or into the stomachs of the members of the corporation of the City of London; and therefore I think that may fairly come into my account; thus raising the sum to 4,050*l.* as the amount paid to the committees of the corporation of the City of London and the Irish Society, including the swan hopping to the common council themselves. Then, in the bridge accounts, which you will find at the conclusion of the corporation accounts in that book, there is a certain kind of benevolences, which is only singular with reference to what follows. The benevolences in 1852 of the Bridge House Committee stand thus:—"The Right Honourable "William Hunter, Lord Mayor, the usual benevolence out of the Bridge House estates for "and towards the charge of feasts during his mayoralty, 50*l.*" And then follows the item, "Thomas Cotterell, Esquire, and Richard Swift, Esquire, Sheriffs, the same during the "shrievalty, 50*l.*"

J. Acland, Esq.

8th Nov. 1853.

572. What is the meaning of "feasts" in that entry?—I have no dictionary with me; but my idea is that it embodies eating and drinking.

573. For whom?—I should say they are feasts in which the members of the Bridge House committee participated, beyond their allowance from the corporation.

574. You do not suppose that it is anything for the purpose of charity?—No; I take it to be most inconsistant with benevolences. In that book you will find immediately afterwards these items: St. Thomas's Hospital, 5*l.* The parishes of St. Olave and St. John Southwark, 2*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* So there is benevolence of the dry bread kind for the poor, and benevolence of the turtle and wine kind for the rich. Not a very seemly or becoming series of items for the corporation of the City of London. There are many items of expenditure made by the corporation which do not appear in that account. I will not be tempted, by a recurrence to my former evidence, to detain you at any length; but I assert my personal knowledge of the existence of a secret service fund in the hands of an officer of the corporation, and my personal knowledge of the expenditure of many hundreds of pounds, not one farthing of which appears in the items of that book.

575. Do you mean that there is an expenditure which is not included in those accounts, or an expenditure which is not detailed in the items in those accounts?—I cannot say that it is not included in those accounts. I cannot say that a law charge of 100*l.* may not mean something else; but I say that under no item in these accounts could such expenditure honestly and fairly range.

576. Do you know, or have you any belief, as to the amount of the secret service fund to which you refer?—I have not.

577. Have you any belief as to the purposes to which it is applied?—I believe it is applied to any purposes that the corporate functionaries imagine that they have an interest in. By the term "functionaries" I do not mean only the paid officers; I mean the corporation and the officers, and the corporation acting by their officers.

578. You say that you have personal knowledge that part of the funds of the corporation are misapplied for purposes of secret service which are never accounted for. Are you able to give the Commissioners any evidence of that fact?—I am not at this moment prepared to do so; but I am prepared to say that the Commissioners shall have evidence of it before the Commission closes. I will hand in the extracts from the accounts to which I have referred. (The same were delivered in, and are as follows :—)

In closing my observations upon the finance accounts, I will beg to submit to the Commissioners a list of returns which I respectfully ask them to call for at the hands of the corporation. "First, a return of all the real and personal estate and income of every kind, "direct and indirect, of the corporation of the City of London. Secondly, a return of all "the debts, mortgages, bonds, or otherwise charged on the corporate estates, or indebted "by the corporation. Third, the entire expenditure of every kind for the last year, 1852. "Fourth, a schedule of all the salaries paid by the corporation in every department "of their municipal and other government,"—because all the salaries are not in this book. You will not find the chamberlain there; you will not find Mr. Scott, the chamberlain's deputy; you will not find any officer in the chamberlain's department; and this leads me to correct an error which I made with reference to the chamberlain's department. Under a recent arrangement the interest of the monies does not go to the chamberlain, but goes to an account out of which the chamberlain and his officers, and that portion of the corporate establishment, are paid. It was formerly as I stated. It is not so any longer; and there is this inconvenience in the present arrangement, that we have not the salary of the chamberlain or of any of his establishment in the printed accounts published by the corporation.

579. You mean that the chamberlain and his clerk are paid out of the profits of those balances?—I mean that they are paid stated salaries out of the profits of the balances. But then this shows the want of proper accountancy there. There should be an item, on the one hand, of the profits made by the floating capital, and, on the other hand, of the expenses paid out of those profits. But there is neither the one item nor the other, and the accounts are therefore imperfect. This one circumstance, out of very many, justifies me in requesting you to call for a return of the amount of all the salaries paid by the corporation in every department of their municipal and other government. "Fifth, a "schedule of all fees or gratuities received or taken in any office or by any officer of the "corporation; and a schedule of the gross amount of all fees or gratuities received by "individual officers or servants of the corporation, whether such officers are partly paid "by salary or exclusively by fees or gratuities. Sixth, a debit and credit statement of "corporate assets and liabilities at the present time. Seventh, a balance sheet exhibiting "the present annual value of the corporate estate, after satisfaction of all charges and "claims thereupon." I think if we have those accounts we shall better understand the financial state of the corporation.

580. Have you now finished your statement upon the subject of the accounts?—I think I have.

581. After carefully examining the City accounts, do you think that they afford evidence of pains having been taken to draw them up in such a form as shall be most intelligible?—In such a form as shall be least intelligible.

582. Do you mean to say that you think that the form which has been adopted has been chosen with the design of preventing persons from clearly understanding them?—I believe that the corporate officers are very far from fools; and, assuming that the person who prepared the account has any talent in him, and, assuming that there is a motive, from the fact that it is an incomprehensible account, I am led to the conclusion that such must have been the intention.

583. Did you ever hear of any complaints having been made as to the form in which the accounts are presented?—No.

584. You have now stated to the Commissioners at great length the defects which you believe to exist in the system of government of the Corporation of London, and in the manner in which that system has been conducted. Will you now have the goodness to state to the Commissioners any opinions which you may have formed as to what would be the nature of the system which you would propose to substitute for the municipal government which now exists in the City of London?—I have given the subject some attention, and I have prepared a scheme by way of suggestion. I would rather that the Commissioners had arrived at their own conclusions, though I cannot object that they should ask my opinions, and the conclusions of others. I would have desired rather that I should not have had to submit my opinions upon the subject to the Commissioners as a whole; but I prefer doing it to giving them piecemeal in such a way that one part would have little or no relevancy to the other, and that there would have been a want of harmony in the aggregate of those opinions.

585. I beg you to understand that the Commissioners have no wish to urge you to make any statement to them under this head, unless you are perfectly ready and willing to do so. The question was put under the supposition that you have some scheme of municipal government for the City of London to propose, and if so we should be desirous of hearing it. I will add that we only ask you for the outline of such a scheme?—I am anxious to be understood as not pledging myself to various items of this scheme as a whole. I give the suggestions for as much as they may severally be worth; and I am not to be considered as pledging myself to the whole, so as to preclude me from altering my opinion upon the subject. I suggest them merely for the consideration of the Commissioners, each on its own merits; and I shall willingly submit to the rejection of nine, if it leaves the tenth of any value. Then the whole object of my labour will be answered. I propose:—1. That the principle of the Incumbered Estates Act for Ireland be applied to the estate of the corporation, with the exceptions of the Mansion House, Guildhall, the markets, public offices, and courts of civil and criminal judicature. 2. That the proceeds of the sale of such property be paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the president, councillors, and burgesses of the City of London. 3. That all mortgage bonds, debts, and other liabilities, be paid off and discharged. 4. That the balance be invested in one description of stock in the public funds, and that the dividends thereof be paid to the aforesaid account in the Bank of England. 5. That the Parliamentary register for the City of London be the burgess roll of the corporation of the said City. 6. That each burgess be required to sign the electoral check book at the Guildhall prior to the exercise of his electoral functions. The necessity for which, or the advantage of which, will presently appear. 7. That no addition be hereafter made to the list of liverymen forming a portion of such register. 8. That the existing ward system, as regards Parliamentary and civic registration and elections, be discontinued in favour of one strictly alphabetical list of the entire constituency, 9. That the council of the City of London consist of thirty members, burgesses of the said city, to be appointed annually. 10. That twelve of the members of the first council be nominated by the Crown; four retiring at the end of the first year, four at the end of the second year, and four at the end of the third year. 11. That eighteen of the members of the first council, twenty-two of the second, twenty-six of the third, and subsequently the whole of the members of the council, be elected by the burgesses, by voting lists duly signed, and delivered to official collectors, or by the post, at the Guildhall, in order to the authentication of each signature by the proper officer, by comparing the signature on the voting list with the signature previously given at the Guildhall. 12. That the councillor having the greatest number of votes be the president of the council and chief magistrate of the corporation for the ensuing year, with the Mansion House for his residence, and an allowance of 5,000*l.* (the salary of a cabinet minister) for the proper support of the dignity of his office. 13. That the councillors whose names stand second and third on the return be sheriffs of the City of London, with an allowance of 1500*l.* a year each. That the recorder, town clerk (who shall be a solicitor), steward (that is chamberlain), and accountant be the chief officers of the corporation. That all present officers of the corporation, with whose continned services the council may dispense, be compensated upon a scale to be approved by the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury, such scale being prepared with equitable regard to the length of period during which such services may have been performed. 16. That the corporate year be the ordinary year of the calendar (not beginning on the 9th of November, but on the 1st of January). 17. That no fees of any description be paid to any officer or servant of the corporation, in addition to his fixed salary. 18. That the police, sewers, paving, lighting, and cleansing of the City be transferred to metropolitan commissioners. 19. That the City coal dues be abandoned. 20. That the City street tolls be abolished. 21. That the City metage upon corn, salt, fruit, and oysters be no longer compulsory. 22. That the monopoly privileges of ticket porters, free porters, fellowship porters, and all such be abrogated. 23. That the burgesses of the City of London shall be no longer subjected by the guilds or livery companies of the City to compulsory membership. 24. That all the City judges and three City justices be appointed by the Crown, at salaries to be fixed by the council, and approved by the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury. 25. That the affairs of the Irish Society be managed by a committee elected by and from the several guilds interested therein. 26. That the corporate conservancy of the River Thames shall not extend westward beyond the city boundary, the Temple. It now extends thirty-six miles. 27. That Southwark be released from enforced connexion with the Corporation of the City of London. 28. That the corporate dues within the port and harbour of London be restricted to a moderate fixed tonnage duty upon shipping. That would get rid of a very complicated system. 29. That the Court of Hustings, the Lord Mayor's Court, the Appeal Court of St. Martin-le-Grand, the Court of Pie Poudre, the Court Leet and Court Baron of Finsbury, and the Court of the Manor of Duke's Place, be abolished. 30. That the City dues upon wine, oil, and all other gaugeable articles, and the charges for groundage and water baillage, be discontinued. 31. That all localities within the City which are considered privileged places, or which claim to be under other than civic jurisdiction, be henceforth under corporate jurisdiction, as portions of the City of London, and within the boundary of its Parliamentary constituency. 32. That the Royal Commission of Conservancy be recalled, and all proceedings on account of impediments to the navigation of the Thames be instituted in the ordinary civic courts of magistracy. 33. That the appointment to all offices now in the gift of the lord mayor, or either of the Courts of Aldermen, Common Council, or Common Hall be vested in the council. 34. That no appointment by purchase be allowed. 35. That no appointment be bestowed upon a member of the council or any of his immediate relatives within three years of his having been a member of that body. 36. That the council be empowered to levy the necessary rates in aid of the corporate funds towards satisfying the assessments of the metropolitan commissioners for the expense of conducting the affairs of the corporation, and for effecting the requisite street and other improvements within the City of London. 37. That all proceedings of the council be held in open court. And I conclude these suggestions by observing that in the event of similar local institutions being given to the other metropolitan boroughs, a metropolitan board might advantageously be formed by the delegation of one or more members from each council, in whom might be vested the charge of all matters of common interest. If upon any of these points the Commissioners should desire to have my reasons for entertaining the opinions which they involve, I shall be very happy to give them.

586. You stated that you were desirous to see the coal dues abandoned; do you mean at once?—At once.

587. Are you aware that some of those coal dues are mortgaged to a considerable extent?—They may be; the book does not show us to what extent.

588. How do you propose to deal with the obligations which have been contracted under the Acts of Parliament by which those coal dues were granted?—In one of my suggestions I propose that all mortgages, bonds, and other existing debts shall be paid off. My first proposal is that the Incumbered Estates Act for Ireland shall be applied to the corporation of London.

589. You mean that you would sell the property of the corporation of London in order to pay the debts that are now secured upon the coal dues?—In order to pay all debts which the corporation owes.

590. Are not the charges upon the property of the corporation of London chiefly special in their nature, and not general? Is there not, for instance, a charge on the coal duty for one purpose, and another charge upon a certain estate for another purpose? Do you mean then, that you would throw all the charges into hotchpot, and pay off the charge upon the coal duty by the proceeds of the sale of the land?—I would pay off all the debts of the corporation. Suppose the case of an outgoing corporation; if the incoming corporation is to succeed to a free estate, there is no way that I know of freeing that estate except by selling the property they have, and discharging all their debts out of that aggregate sum, and handing over the difference as their real capital.

591. But is there not a difference between a temporary tax upon coal, which is imposed by Parliament, and made subject to a charge for a specific purpose, and an estate in land which has been devised to the corporation as their own property?—If the question were whether you would pay 20*s.* in the pound to each creditor, having reference to the different character of each security and its value, I might understand it; but I cannot see how a corporation owing different sums of money can make a difference with reference to the specialty suggested, as affecting its payment of the money it owes.

592. Have you made any calculation which satisfies you that if the coal dues were suddenly to cease the City estates would enable them to pay off all the obligations now secured upon those coal dues?—I have made many calculations, and I have arrived at the conclusion that the economy which would be effected by getting rid of the complicated machinery under which the corporate estates are now administered would go very far to compensate for all the large charges which I have made in that scheme. It is not the mere question, how much you have to pay, but it involves the question how much you save; and if you should go into that question you will find there would be a saving to an enormous annual amount; and if the result did not leave us with the precise amount that the corporation now enjoys, it would leave an honest corporation, having sufficient to enable them to maintain the dignity of the office, and to be of essential service to the citizens of London.

593. Do you consider the corporation to be in an insolvent state?—I believe it to be in such a state that it cannot be insolvent, but that it cannot tell how far it is from insolvency. I believe the complication of its accounts, the magnitude of the mortgages, the clashing peculiarities, the different and many Acts of Parliament affecting it, the infinite variety and character of the properties it possesses, is such that simplification is the first thing which is desirable, in order to the economizing of the estates of the corporation, and in order to the facilitating of the better government of the City of London under another corporation.

594. Do you propose that the whole of the landed property of the corporation should be sold, and the proceeds invested in the manner you have described?—I do.

595. That being the case, what is your meaning in proposing, under No. 25, that the affairs of the Irish Society be managed by a committee, elected by and from the several guilds interested therein? What would be the business of the Irish Society if all their Irish property were sold?—The Irish property belongs to the guilds, which are not part, as they say, of the corporation of the City of London. If any portion of it belong to the corporation of London, as a corporation, let the guilds pay them its value.

J. Acland, Esq.
8th Nov. 1853.

596. Do the proceeds of those estates go to the corporation or to the guilds?—To the guilds; they found the money.

597. Do you mean that the corporation only manages those estates for the guilds, but does not receive the income?—Exactly so. I am not sure that the corporation may not have a very trifling interest of some few pounds a year; but it is the twelve principal companies who own the estates.

598. Is there anything else which you desire to state to the commission?—Not at the moment.

Adjourned to Thursday next, at twelve o'clock.

Thursday, 10*th November* 1853.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE IN THE CHAIR.

W. Delafield, Esq., and H. N. Fisher, Esq.
10th Nov. 1853.

WILLIAM DELAFIELD, Esq., and HORATIO NELSON FISHER, Esq., having been sworn, were examined as follows.

599. (To Mr. Delafield.) Are you a partner in the house of Combe, Delafield, and Company?—I am.

600. We have been informed that you consider yourselves aggrieved by a particular privilege which the City exercise, or at least claim, with reference to the metage of corn, and we desire to hear any statement you have to make to us with regard to the nature of that alleged grievance?—I shall be happy to give any information which the Commissioners may desire upon the subject; but our solicitor, Mr. Fisher, who has conducted the suit which has arisen upon this question between the City and our firm, is perhaps more fully prepared with all the particulars.

601. (To Mr. Fisher.) Will you have the goodness to make any statement that you wish to the Commissioners upon the subject?—

Mr. Fisher.—Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company are, as is well known, brewers of considerable note. Their house of business and their brewery is in Castle Street, Long Acre. In or about the year 1833 they took a lease from the Duchy of Lancaster of what is called the Duchy Wharf. It is a wharf on the Thames just above Waterloo Bridge; on the Westminster side of Waterloo Bridge. It was with a view to unship their malt and grain which they use in the brewery. They did so for two or three years. I should state, probably, that Messrs. Combe have large malting houses at Yarmouth, where they purchased barley, and turned it into malt, and shipped it from Yarmouth to London, in their own vessels, it being malt, and in bulk. For some little time they unloaded this malt at this wharf. The City then in the first place made this claim. A party of what are termed fellowship porters, came and demanded a right to land that corn, and every particle of it, at certain charges. This was resisted by Messrs. Combe; and in or about October 1835 a bill was filed against them on behalf of the City, and on behalf of the fellowship porters, claiming this right, which, in the words of their bill, they set out thus:—"That the portage and carriage of all coals, corn, and grain, of what kind "soever, and of all salt, of what sort soever, and of all kinds of apples, pears, plums, and of "onions, and of roots to be eaten, and of all merchandises, measurable or to be measured, "arriving or brought into the port of the City of London upon or by the water or by "the River of Thames, or going out of the said port, within the limits hereafter mentioned, "in any ship, boat, barge, or vessel whatsoever, floating, loading, remaining, or being of "what side soever of the River of Thames, and upon any bank or wharf or shore of "the same river, which shall happen there to remain. and to be delivered or landed or to "be carried outwards or from the said City from the bridge of the town of Staines in "the county of Middlesex unto London Bridge, and from thence unto a certain place "called Yendal, alias Yenland, alias Yendeele, towards the sea, in the county of Kent, "have time out of mind belonged and yet do belong unto plaintiffs the mayor, and "commonalty and citizens of the City of London, or their grantees, and always have "been and now are exercised and used by certain porters, freemen of the said City, called or "known by the name of corn and salt porters, taking their denomination from the chief of "the merchandises aforesaid anciently established and appointed to and for their labour "and work of portag, by orders of the Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the said City; "and the said mayor and commonalty and citizens, or their grantees, the said corn and "salt porters, have had and taken and ought to have and take certain reasonable rates or "wages payable in that behalf." Messrs. Combe and Co., finding that they could do the work at a very considerably less rate than these fellowship porters charged, declined and refused to have anything to do with them. This bill was filed, as I said before, in October 1835, Messrs. Combe put in their answer to that bill in January 1836, and witnesses were examined. But before a decree was had in this suit another claim was made by the City, which was, that they insisted upon measuring the corn, although Messrs. Combe did not require it to be measured. It was their own corn, and when a cargo of their own corn was landed they did not require it to be measured. But still the City said, "We claim the "right of measuring this," and making what they called reasonable charges for doing so. Messrs. Combe did not require their services; therefore they refused to have anything to do with them. In consequence of that refusal another suit was instituted against Messrs. Combe and Co.

602. Did they claim to measure the malt as well as the corn?—It was all malt, and they claimed to measure it. In consequence of the refusal of Messrs. Combe and Co. to allow the city meters to attend and measure, another bill was filed against Messrs. Combe and Co., in July 1839, to which Messrs. Combe put in an answer on the 6th of March 1840. That bill was with the view, as was the bill in the portage suit, to take an account against Messrs. Combe of the quantities of corn or malt that they had landed at this wharf, and claiming that upon each of the quarters, after the account was taken, they should be paid what they would have received if they had done the work which Messrs. Combe refused to allow them to do. Of course it was a question of considerable importance to Messrs. Combe, and the advisers of Messrs. Combe thought that by a bill of discovery Messrs. Combe would get an inspection of the City documents, and would get from the City such information as might upset the claim which the City had made upon them. Consequently, in March 1840, a bill of discovery was filed in the metage suit against the City, on behalf of Messrs. Combe, setting out certain documents, and praying that they might be allowed to inspect those documents, with a view to their defence to the suit which the City had instituted against them.

603. What was the cause of the delay of five years, between 1835 and 1840?—The portage suit was commenced in 1835; the metage suit was commenced in 1839. Messrs. Combe also were advised to file, and had previously, in December 1838, filed a cross bill in the portage suit. I should state that the porters have an office in Tower Street, at which office all their books of account and other things are, and where all the business of the fellowship porters is transacted; and it was necessary to file a bill of discovery, not only in the portage suit, but also in the metage suit. To the bill of discovery in the metage suit the City put in answers. One, the answer of John Hurcomb and John Eayres, which was filed December 1840.

604. Who are they?—They were two of the clerks or heads of the fellowship porters, or at the corn meters' office, having the custody of the books of accounts and other books. And the other by the mayor of the City of London and Henry Woodthorpe, who was then town clerk. That was filed in January 1841. But they were not willing, of course, to give very direct answers to our bill of discovery; and we were obliged to except to their first answer, and then we got another. The second and further answer was put in by the mayor and Mr. Woodthorpe, in November 1841. Still we did not get what we conceived we had a right to, and we were obliged again to except, and we had a third answer from the City and Mr. Woodthorpe, filed in February 1842. Upon that third answer coming in, we moved the Court with a view to get an inspection of these documents, admitted to be in their possession, by having them produced and shown to us.

605. I presume that in their answer they quoted certain documents?—They referred to and admitted the possession of certain documents, and they stated certain reasons why they should not produce those documents. In June 1842 an order was obtained from the present Lord Justice Knight Bruce, who then was Vice Chancellor, directing that we should have an inspection of the documents that we claimed.

606. Were those documents mentioned in the answer of the City?—They were mentioned in the answer of the City, and mentioned in our bill of discovery. We mentioned certain charters and other documents which we thought would assist us, and those were the documents which we got an order from Lord Justice Knight Bruce, then Vice Chancellor, to produce. I should probably have stated that we obtained an order from Lord Abinger, the Chief Baron, in our suit, for a discovery in the sortage suit.

607. That was in the Court of Exchequer?—That was in the Court of Exchequer. Those suits were both instituted in the Exchequer. We saw some few of the documents which Lord Abinger gave us liberty to inspect, and desired that we might have the inspection of; but they were not of very much use to us. Then the portage cause came on for hearing, before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. Witnesses having been examined on both sides, some fifteen were examined on behalf of the City; and some fifteen, or rather more on behalf of Messrs. Combe and Delafield, at, of course, very considerable expense,—it came on before Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, and certain issues were directed by that learned Judge to be tried at Winchester at the summer assizes then following. That decree was in January 1842. But in June 1842, having obtained in the metage cross suit an order from Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce to examine documents of the City, which we conceived to be of material importance in our defence in both suits, we moved in the portage suit that the trial of those issues should be postponed till we had the privilege which Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce had given us to inspect those City documents. There was an appeal to the Lord Chancellor immediately lodged against Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce's order in the metage cross suit, and the trial of the issues was put off in consequence, upon our application in the portage suit. The appeal came on before the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, and was argued in January 1843. The judgment of Lord Lyndhurst upon the appeal was not given till December 1845. In the meantime we got the trial of our issues in the portage suit postponed. Lord Lyndhurst confirmed the order of Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, and refused the application of the City. We then immediately had notice given us that the City would appeal, and they did appeal to the House of Lords, and upon that point we are now in the House of Lords. Our suit began in October 1835; we are now in the month of November 1853, and the thing is still going on, but it is tied up in the House of Lords, upon that appeal of the City from Lord Lyndhurst's order of 1845.

W. Delafield, Esq., and H. N. Fisher, Esq.

508. Which appeal is given upon a collateral point?—Upon a collateral point.

609. That point being the refusal of the City to produce certain documents in their possession?—Yes.

610. Can you, without going into detail, give us a general idea of the nature of these documents? Are they charters?—They are charters and other City documents which are in the archives of the City, which we think will show something to prove that the claim which the City make, which I read when I first commenced, is confined, either to the City or to some part of the City, or that it is confined as between seller and purchaser, where it may be very useful; but here the claim is made on our corn for which we do not require either metage or portage.

611. Are they documents in the nature of charters upon which the City ground a public right affecting the whole population of the metropolis from Staines to Yantleet Creek?—They claim the privilege by prescription, I believe; but there are charters which support that, I believe.

612. Are we right in infering from your statement that the City withhold the knowledge of public documents upon which they ground a very extensive public claim affecting the metropolis, and a large population beyond the precincts of the metropolis?—Most undoubtedly they do so, and they have appealed to the House of Lords against decisions given by Lord Lyndhurst and by Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce upon that question.

613. The result of this delay has been, that the right which the City claim, has not been hitherto enforced?—It has not, against Messrs. Combe and Co.

614. Have the issues ever been settled?—Yes, they have. The issues were framed by Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce. When the cause came on, he used words to this effect: "I think the better course will be that I should now, as you are all before me, put down "in writing what the issues are to be." He did so, on the spot. The issues were these which he directed to be tried at Winchester, and which, by an order of the 11th of March 1846, have now been postponed until further order, it being understood between us (there is a separate solicitor for the fellowship porters) that the portage suit remains as it is till after the decision on the appeal to the House of Lords in the metage suit. The issues were these: The order as made by Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce on the 19th of January 1842, "Doth "order and decree that the parties do proceed to a trial at law at the next Summer assizes "to be held for the county of Southampton, or at such other time as the judges of the Court "shall appoint, upon the following issues, viz.: First, whether the measurage, portage, and "carriage of all coals, corn, and grain, of what kind soever, and of all salt, of what kind "soever, and of all kinds of apples, pears, plums, and of onions, and of roots to be eaten, "and of all merchandises measurable or to be measured, arriving or brought into the "port of the City of London upon or by the water or by the river of Thames, or going "out of the said port, from the bridge of the town of Staines in the county of Middlesex "and London Bridge, and from thence into a certain place called Yendall, alias Yenland, "otherwise Yendale, towards the sea in the county of Kent, in any ship, boat, barge, or "vessel whatsoever, floating, loading, remaining, or being of what side soever of the river "of Thames, and upon any bank or wharf or shore of the same river, which shall happen "there to remain, and to be delivered or landed or to be carried outwards or from the "said City, from the bridge of the town of Staines in the county of Middlesex and "London Bridge, and from thence into a certain place called Yendall, alias Yenland, "otherwise Yendale, towards the sea in the county of Kent, have from time whereof the "memory of man runneth not to the contrary belonged and yet do of right belong unto "the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the City of London, or their grantees, and "always have been and now are of right exercised and used by certain porters, freemen "of the said City, called or known by the name of corn and salt porters, anciently "established and appointed to and for their labour and work of portage by orders of the "Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the said City, and whether the said mayor and "commonalty and citizens, or their grantees, the said corn and salt porters, have from "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary of right had and taken "and ought of right to have and take certain reasonable rates or wages payable in that "behalf." That is, I believe, in the words of their bill. There are other issues which are something similar, but which I need not read.

615. You have given us the history of one suit. Will you now state what was done with respect to the other?—The other suit, the portage suit, arrived at a hearing, as I have stated, and a decree was made directing certain issues, one of which I have read, and the cause stands over now till the appeal to the House of Lords, with reference to the order in the metage suit, for our seeing those City documents, is decided.

W. Delafield, Esq.; and H. N. Fisher, Esq.

10th Nov. 1853.

616. Then the one suit hangs upon the other?—It does. The Commissioners of course will observe that Messrs. Combe's wharf is out of the City, and they thought themselves very much oppressed in being obliged to have these fellowship porters.

617. According to your statement, this right claimed by the City has no reference to the limits of the City, but it is claimed to extend from Staines to some place in Kent?—From Staines Bridge to Yantlet Creek in Kent. I believe it is upwards of 100 miles of river.

618. Can you give any idea of the expense to which the parties have been put by all this litigation?—I can, in round figures. I believe it has cost Messrs. Combe something like 2,000*l.* to resist this claim, which they could not have borne if they had not been of the character that they are. It would of course have swamped a small person. Perhaps the Commissioners will allow me just to mention further, I have here the evidence of a Mr. Amsinck, who was brewer to Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Co., stating what the City charges were for what they claimed to do, and what they could get it done for by porters who were not fellowship porters. I will just read the witness's evidence. This evidence was taken in the Court of Exchequer, and taken by interrogatories, not taken vivâ voce. The witness is George Stewart Amsinck. To the fifteenth interrogatory he describes who the fellowship porters are, and how the body, as he learns, is constituted; and he says, "that the hours of work are regulated as follows: for three months of the year from 5 to 7; four ditto, 6 to 6; and five ditto, 7 to 6; and that the charges are: metage $\frac{1}{2}d.$ per quarter; holdage, $\frac{1}{2}d.$ per quarter; lastage, 1*d.* per ten quarters; fillage, 8*d.* per ten quarters; porterage, 2*d.* per quarter, being after the rate of 3*s.* 3*d.* for ten quarters; and deponent says that men, not being members of the fellowship porters, complete the same work in a shorter space of time at $3\frac{3}{4}d.$ or 4*d.* for ten quarters."

619. Would that include metage, or would it be for porterage only; because metage is not wanted by these parties?—I take it that the $3\frac{3}{4}d.$ or 4*d.* for ten quarters would be for porterage, and that the metage would be an additional expense.

620. So that it is not a fair comparison of the price of labour, but it is a fair comparison of the difference of expense to those parties?—Yes; because we should not require metage.

621. If the sum for which it is said it could be done by persons not members of the fellowship porters, namely, $3\frac{3}{4}d.$ or 4*d.* per ten quarters, applies to porterage only, it ought to be compared with the charge of the fellowship porters for porterage simply by itself, which appears to be 20*d.* per ten quarters, and that has to be compared with $3\frac{3}{4}d.$ per ten quarters?—Yes. I hardly know what lastage is, but I take it that lastage would be necessary in taking it and putting it into the sacks; that is 1*d.* per ten quarters; fillage is 8*d.* per ten quarters, and porterage 2*d.* per quarter; this latter charge would be 20*d.* per ten quarters.

622. Can you give us any idea how much per annum Messrs. Combe and Delafield would have lost if they had yielded to the two demands which were made upon them for porterage and for metage, and had not contested the question with the City?—I am not prepared to say.

(Mr. Delafield.) I think it was something like 1,000*l.* a year.

623. (To Mr. Fisher.) Have you anything further to state?

Mr. Fisher.—I might observe, how hard it is upon Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Co. to have these two suits instituted against them, supposing they are right in resisting them, putting them to very heavy expenses, from which they could derive no benefit whatever.

624. Do you happen to know whether there have been other cases of the same description, or is this the only case of the kind?—I believe there have been others, where the parties have given in, being afraid to resist the City. I know one of them, to my own knowledge, where they came to me. They were small parties, and I could not advise them to resist the bill filed against them by the City; they had not the means to resist it.

625. In what description of trade were they engaged?—They were general corn-factors and dealers.

626. Do you know whether this claim is enforced upon parties who live out of the metropolis, but within the jurisdiction of the City, in this respect?—I believe it is, in some cases. I have known some instances where it has been.

627. It appears that the claim extends to all sorts of corn and grain, to certain species of fruit and vegetables, and to all sorts of merchandises landed in the port of London or on the shore of the Thames, at a considerable distance above and below the City of London?—Yes.

628. Do you happen to know whether that claim is generally enforced?—I believe it is, wherever it is worth the while of the City,—where there is a sufficient quantity to make it pay for them to send their porters.

629. The claim extends all the way from Staines to Yantlet Creek?—It does.

630. You said that Messrs. Combe and Delafield hold their premises on the north side of the river under a lease from the Duchy of Lancaster. Was any point raised in the course of these suits as to any peculiar right of the Duchy?—Yes; it was within the limits of the duchy. I had the evidence of the Secretary of the Duchy, with the view, if we could,

W. Delafield, Esq., and H. N. Fisher, Esq.

10th Nov. 1853.

to escape by that means, but I am afraid it is not sufficient. We raised that point; but I do not think the Duchy have the privilege, although we attempted to make it out.

631. But possibly the case of Messrs. Combe and Delafield might differ upon that ground from the cases of other persons?—It might. Although we took that ground, I believe it was considered that it would not avail us as a defence.

J. G. Hubbard, Esq.

JOHN GELLIBRAND HUBBARD, Esquire, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

632. You are the Governor of the Bank of England?—I am.

633. You have been for a long time a merchant in the City of London?—Yes; 25 years.

634. Do you reside in the City?—No.

635. You never have resided in the City?—No.

636. But you have carried on the business of a merchant a long time?—Yes.

637. Have you ever had any connexion with the corporation of the City of London?—As a merchant, the only connexion I have had with the corporation has been on the arrival of grain ships, which I have arriving almost every year; having to apply at the Mansion House for the Lord Mayor's order to the sworn meters to measure the cargo. That is the sole connexion I have had with them.

638. Have you any reason to complain of the system of the City of London with regard to the metage of corn?—No; I have no reason to complain. This order costs 5s. 6d. A fee is paid at the Mansion House of 5s. 6d. It is very little inconvenience sending there for it; and that is the only subject I can mention with respect to the corporation; otherwise I have had no knowledge of their existence.

639. But with regard to the service of these meters in measuring the corn, either as to their charges, or as to the manner in which they perform this service, you have no cause of complaint?—No. I have had no means of comparison. I do not know whether any other persons could have done it better; but I have never had occasion to be dissatisfied.

640. Do you consider the charge is moderate?—I have no means of comparison. I have no means of ascertaining what it ought to be, having made no comparison with anybody else's charges. I never analysed it to see what the labour really cost, and therefore what ought to be paid. I have rather assumed that what had been going on so long under that system was not a very aggravated charge.

641. You have no option as to the porters and meters you employ?—I can hardly follow the operation, beyond that order which I obtain from the Mansion House. I know that the meters measure the cargo. I know very little about it. As a merchant that is really the only thing I know of the corporation.

642. You have probably not turned your attention much to the constitution of the corporation?—No; I know nothing of it.

643. Is it not the case that the leading merchants in the City of London have for a very long time shown an indisposition to connect themselves with the corporation, or to accept corporate offices?—I can only state what my own experience has been of the matter. I was once invited to take an alderman's gown, which I have no doubt was intended as a compliment, but I declined it. My reason for so doing was, that had I accepted the office of alderman I should have been obliged to go through what I observed an alderman generally had to go through. I observed that he had in his capacity of alderman to attend a great many civic feasts, which would not have suited my constitution; and that he had also to administer justice at the Guildhall and at the Mansion House; and it occurred to me, that in order to undertake the sacred task of administering justice it required a man either qualified for it by education, or capable of devoting his time to the acquisition of the knowledge necessary to fit him for the discharge of the office; and I felt that it would be incompatible with my vocations to go through that preparation, and that I should shrink from the possibility either of giving an unjust decision, or administering justice imperfectly myself, and still more of having to leave the decision to a clerk, who may be a most competent person himself, but whose decisions I should be personally apparently responsible for; and that alone would have prevented my taking the office.

644. Do you believe that if the corporation of the City of London were brought to a closer degree of resemblance to the corporations of Liverpool and other great cities and towns in the country, there would be a disposition on the part of the leading merchants occasionally to accept of municipal offices in the City; for instance, to fill the place of lord mayor?—I know so little of Liverpool or of any other great town that I can hardly compare them with London in this matter. I can only say, that seeing what would be required for the office, if accepted, in the City of London, I came to the conclusion that it was utterly impossible for me to take it here. What it might be at Liverpool I am not prepared to say, for I do not know what it involves.

645. Supposing it were not necessary to be an alderman in order to become Lord Mayor, do you think that in that case the leading merchants would be averse to accepting the office of chief magistrate, as a matter of public duty, for a year, if it did not oblige them to go through the preliminary duties of aldermen?—I hardly know what the Lord Mayor would have to do, if he had not been first of all an alderman. If it was merely to provide for a single year, and if it was an office peculiarly connected with the discharge of a great public trust or duty, that might be a reason for taking it; for instance, the post I hold now is one which I think nobody would take voluntarily: it does not tempt by emolument or patronage; and it is only assumed by those to whom it presents itself as a duty connected with their previous service in the Bank direction. If it could be possible to put the office of Lord Mayor upon a higher footing, so as to make it appear that one's duty required it to be accepted, it would then assume a totally different character; but I hardly know what would be the nature of the office of Lord Mayor in that case. If it were merely to make a splendid exhibition for the year, I should think it most disagreeable.

J. G. Hubbard, Esq.

10th Nov. 1853.

646. You think that the amount of pageantry which now surrounds the office would be by no means an inducement to a first-rate merchant to accept the office?—It would be anything but attractive; the very reverse.

647. During your connexion with the City you have no doubt become generally conversant with the constitution of the Corporation, and the manner in which it is administered? Have you formed any opinion as to any defects which may exist, or any mode of remedying them?—I am sorry I must demur to the premises of the question. I know nothing about the corporation. I am not intimately acquainted with any member of the corporation, except one alderman, who has served the office of Lord Mayor, and is also a member of the direction of the Bank of England, Alderman Thompson. Besides him, I hardly know a single member of the corporation. I have not been so situated as to learn anything of their constitution, nor has anything occurred to interest me in it.

648. You have not formed any opinion upon the subject?—No.

649. With respect to Liverpool and other great towns, you are probably aware that previously to the Municipal Reform Act the mayor and the aldermen used to exercise magisterial functions, but that has been removed from them by the Municipal Reform Act? Can you state whether you have perceived in any of those corporations any difference in that respect since the passing of that Act, as compared with the state of things before that Act?—No, I cannot.

John Dillon, Esq.

JOHN DILLON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

650. You are a merchant in the City of London?—I am.

651. What branch of trade do you carry on?—I am partner in the firm of Morrison, Dillon, and Company, wholesale warehousemen in the City of London.

652. Do you reside in the City of London?—I do not sleep in the City of London. I have been engaged in business there since the year 1818.

653. Did you ever reside there?—For a great many years I did.

654. Are you connected with the Common Council?—I am not.

655. Were you ever connected with it?—Never.

656. Have you given your attention to the subject of the present system on which the corporation of the City of London is conducted?—I am much less acquainted with the details of the subject than I was some years ago. Twenty years since, in the year 1833, a Commission was issued upon the subject of the corporation, which visited the City of London. At that time a committee of freemen was appointed to inquire into the abuses of the corporation, or the supposed abuses, with a view to communicate with the Commissioners. That committee appointed me their chairman; and I hold in my hand the report we then made upon the subject (producing the same). I see that amongst the members of that committee, consisting of 28 gentlemen, was one who is now one of the Members of Parliament for the borough of Lambeth, Mr. Williams; also Mr. Travers, deceased, the father of the present Mr. Travers; Mr. Pritchard, the high bailiff of the borough of Southwark; Mr. Pearson, the present City solicitor; also one gentleman (Mr. Alderman Wire), who has been recently elected sheriff of the county of Middlesex and the City of London. I mention that to show the competency of the parties to make that inquiry. At that time I certainly took more interest than I have done since in the subject, as many of the grievances of which we then complained have been remedied. Besides that, I look at the subject now from a different point of view. Some very large and important questions have since arisen; the question of police and various sanitary questions have extended the inquiry; and if you were now to make the existing corporation of the City of London as perfect as man could make it, you would be compelled to extend it beyond the present area, and beyond the present limits of the City of London.

657. What is the ground upon which you arrive at that conclusion?—The necessity of uniformity of plan with regard to police, for instance; that the duties or power of the police officer should not cease at Temple Bar. With regard to sewerage (taking that by way of illustration), there is the necessity of some uniform and large plan, and the preventing conflicting jurisdictions.

658. Would it not be possible to devise some plan which should provide for a uniform system both of police and sewerage for the whole of the metropolis, without altogether abolishing the municipal system of the City of London?—I think it quite possible. If I were asked whether I would propose the immediate and total abolition of the corporation of the City of London, I should answer, decidedly not. The present corporation has arisen from old times and old institutions; it has grown up very much mixed with all the manners and institutions of the City of London, and it retains many obsolete, some useless, and some objectionable customs; but I should think it very far indeed from desirable suddenly and violently to destroy it. I would recommend the abolition of some customs and the reform of some institutions; and that you should endeavour to frame a more perfect system, by constituting as corporations Finsbury, Marylebone, Lambeth, the borough of Southwark, and so on; and that, having formed a series of corporations, you may hereafter, by means of boards to superintend the sewerage and the police, &c., without danger establish a more perfect system.

John Dillon, Esq.

659. What are the predominant evils of the present system, in your opinion?—One of the most important matters to look to is the mode of making freemen in the City of London. Some short time since, within our own memories, persons were admitted to the freedom of the City upon the payment not only of a large sum in the way of fees to the City, but the admission to the freedom was also embarrassed by the necessity of a previous admission to the freedom, and I believe also to the livery, of some one of the trading companies. The admission to the freedom of the City was therefore at that time a matter of very great expense. That expense has now been reduced in two ways; in the first place, by the reduction of the fees paid to the City officers; and in the second, by the necessity being removed of being first a freeman of a company. The latter reduction was, I believe, allowed by an Ordinance of the Court of Aldermen and Common Council in the year 1835. But a very anomalous state of things has arisen and still exists as to the parties obtaining the freedom. It would appear that in early times the corporation of the City of London had an inkling of what we know now to be a great truth, that commerce prospered best by freedom; and whilst they exacted large fines generally on the admission of traders to the freedom, they exempted the larger wholesale merchants and traders ("foreigners" as they called them) from those fines upon admission.

660. Do you believe that that difference was made upon grounds of public policy? Do not you think it was much more likely to be for this reason, that the strong could break through, while the weak were stopped in the meshes of the net?—I have no reason to believe that; but it may have been so. The fact, however, is, that they have exempted the large merchants and wholesale houses; a state of things of a very anomalous kind has thus arisen. In the first place, we had a number of persons trading in the City of London who were not able to pay the fines. Some years since I was a member of a jury—an old institution in the City called, not inappropriately, the "Annoyance Jury,"—whose business it was to inquire into weights and measures, and to find out persons who had not taken up their freedom. Most of those, of course, were of the poorer class of persons. I remember one case which I took upon myself to represent to the Court of Aldermen, and which I got exempted from the visitation of the law. A poor woman was called upon to pay fees amounting to 14*l.*, whose whole returns from her business in a small shop amounted only to 52*l.* in the year. Whilst, on the one hand, the poor are thus necessarily exempted, because they cannot pay, the richer merchants and wholesale traders are also exempted, because by the law or custom of the City they are not called upon to pay. This has been a cause of much dispute and litigation. Three or four thousand actions were recently commenced, or threatened, and the reason given was that the existing law or custom was so oppressive and so unequal that the parties proceeding hoped to obtain its repeal by threatening to enforce it against the poorer traders. Now I apprehend that an immediate and easy remedy for this state of things would be that the freedom should be granted as a right—not as a privilege; that every person who lived or traded in the City should by that fact become a citizen, or be free of the City, as it is called; and that no fine should be exacted, except a small fine for the mere purposes of registration.

661. You mean quite a nominal fine?—Yes; not for the purpose of revenue.

662. If it were a mere nominal sum, sufficient to defray the expenses of registration, would not it be in effect pretty nearly the same thing as doing away with the freedom altogether, and adopting burgesses, as in other corporations?—Yes.

663. Do you see any advantage in maintaining a connexion between the freedom of companies and the freedom of the City?—I see none whatever. The connexion is an antiquated one, formed under circumstances which have long since passed away, and any relationship which still remains between the trading companies and the corporation of London should be at once dissevered and put an end to.

664. Do you happen to be a member of any trading company?—Yes.

665. Of which?—The Founders' Company.

666. Are you at all acquainted with the feeling which prevails in that company, or in any of the companies, with respect to their connexion with the corporation of the City?—The feelings and opinions upon those subjects are so various that I could not classify them so as to tell you any general feeling upon the subject.

667. Is it your belief that there is a prevailing wish on the part of the companies to maintain a connexion with the City freedom?—I should think there was; but that is more a matter of surmise than knowledge. Most of the persons who are members of the City companies are also free of the City. They act in both capacities, and would retain their rights and interests in both,

668. Do not some of the companies at present insist upon their right to compel persons exercising the trade of which that company bears the name to take up the freedom of that company?—I am told that they do; but I am not well informed upon that matter.

669. Are you aware whether any action has been brought, in which that point has been brought to determination?—I have heard of such actions, but I do not know of any particular case in which that has happened.

670. Will you pass to the next point?—A good deal has been said about City honours, and the reluctance which eminent merchants and bankers of the City of London feel to accepting such honours; and I have heard that reluctance given as an argument in favour of an abolition, or a total alteration of the Corporation of the City of London. I must admit that the Corporation of the City of London has many defects; that many things, which were originally right, have, in the lapse of time, become wrong; but I doubt whether there is any ground for the conclusion, sought to be founded upon the assertion that merchants and bankers of the City of London do not, for that reason, seek for City honours. It is easy to laugh at City honours. I have myself joined in the laugh, and have avoided them when, by the kindness of my friends and neighbours, they have been almost forced upon me; but I think that there has been some exaggeration on this subject. Take some of our richest bankers and most eminent merchants; if they look back for a generation or two, they will find that their fathers or grandfathers were aldermen and Lord Mayors; and as to a large class of our merchants, though they may object to the Corporation of the City of London, with respect to its offices, and other matters, yet it should be remembered that they amassed their fortunes, and gained their present eminence under this very system of which they complain. But, what is perhaps more important, I see reason to believe that the contempt which has been thrown upon City honours, has often been an excuse rather than a reason for neglecting them. So far as I have seen of the habits of the merchants and bankers of the City of London, whatever alteration you may make in the corporation, there will still be a reluctance to undertake municipal duties. I cannot pretend to explain the reason, but that is the fact. There is almost a national character in London merchants, which leads them to devote their leisure time, and direct their ambition to other objects. Thus, in the case of a chamber of commerce, I have witnessed several attempts unsuccessfully made to form such a chamber in London. The example of Liverpool has been quoted in support of the establishment of such a tribunal for the purposes of commerce. Whether however it may arise from the extent of the trade of the City of London,—the various and conflicting interests of its merchants, and their having other tastes and other objects of ambition in Parliament and elsewhere, I cannot tell,—but the fact is certain, that there is, in these matters, an essential difference between the commercial bodies of London and other ports and cities; so that if you were to reform the City Corporation, and to clear away all the nonsense and foolery of the Lord Mayor's show, you would not thereby, as I believe, create an inclination on the part of the merchants of the City of London to take part in the management of municipal affairs.

671. Was it not much more the habit, a generation or two back, for the principal bankers and merchants to reside in the City, than it is at present?—It was.

672. Do you think that may have had some influence in causing the difference to which you have referred?—I think it is very likely to have had a very great influence.

673. Is it not natural that persons should feel more interest about the municipal offices of a place where they reside than they will feel if their residence is quite unconnected with their place of business?—It is so natural, that I am myself under the influence of that very feeling. I still carry on business in London, but I am quite conscious that I do not take that interest in its municipal affairs that I did when I slept and lived there myself.

674. Is there any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—A few words as to the constituencies. I believe that there are at present three large constituent bodies in the City of London. I should suggest their being reduced, for the purposes of simplicity, and for other political and municipal purposes, to one only. The constituency under the Reform Act has worked a considerable difference in the constitution of the City of London, and removed many objections.

675. You mean the constituency formed for the purpose of voting for members of Parliament?—Yes. The qualification of that is the 10*l.* householder. I can see no objection to that constituency, except that in London, as elsewhere, it has been saddled with the freemen or liverymen, who, whether resident or not, still vote under the Reform Act; which leads to most, if not all, the abuses or corruptions, if there be corruption, in the elections of the City of London.

676. In order to vote for members of Parliament, they must reside within seven miles; is it not so?—Yes, I believe it is so; they are governed by the general law that they must reside within seven miles. But still they, as liverymen, have not necessarily any interest in the Municipal Corporation, or the welfare or the rights of the City. They need not be engaged in business; they need not live within the City. That is the first constituency in the City of London. The second is the old constituency of the Common Hall. That is entirely composed, I believe, of the liverymen of the trading companies; and amongst those trading companies is one called the Waterman's Company, whose votes are commonly known by the name of "Long-shore men," and to whom is attributed (whether truly or not I do not know) the corruptions of many of the City elections. The third constituency is a less objectionable one; it is a ward constituency for the election of aldermen and of local officers. That consists of the resident householders, being freemen. There is no longer any necessity for the voters being freemen or liverymen of the companies. In place of the two first of these constituencies, I would suggest the propriety of establishing one common constituency for all the elections of the City of London.

677. You were understood to say that you saw no reason for keeping up the present connexion between the companies and the freedom of the City?—I can see none.

678 Therefore the general constituency you would propose would be wholly independent of the companies?—Entirely independent of them.

679. Do you think there is any advantage in having any of the officers of the City of London elected by the large constituency, and not either by the Court of Aldermen or by the Common Council?—That is a question of general policy about which I cannot give an opinion.

680. At present some of the officers are elected by the Court of Aldermen, some by the Court of Common Council, some by the large constituency at Common Hall: is not that so?—That is so.

681. Do you see any ground in public policy for that distinction?—Although I very much incline to a liberal policy in such matters, I can imagine some offices which had better be confined to the appointment of an active and limited body.

682. You mean judicial offices?—Judicial offices and some others.

683. Take for instance the office of chamberlain, who is the treasurer of the City, and discharges for the City the same sort of business that the Board of Treasury discharges for the country at large. Do you see any reason why he should be elected by a large constituency at Common Hall?—I think it better that he should.

684. On what ground would you wish that he should be elected by a large constituency?—The objection to any form of election is the chance of its being corrupt or misapplied, and I suspect that the office of chamberlain is one which it would be better not to give into the hands of a few. I have not, however, considered the subject, and the Commissioners must take my remarks for what they are worth.

685. Will you state your reason for making the distinction?—The fear of its being given for corrupt or undue motives, and from mere favouritism instead of fitness for office.

686. Do you think an office which is given away either by the Court of Aldermen or by the Court of Common Council is more likely to be given by favour and from corrupt motives, than when it is bestowed by an election in Common Hall?—I do.

687. Is it your belief that contested elections in Common Hall are in general free from corruption?—In the first place, the contested elections in Common Hall are extremely few. The office of Lord Mayor, which is the chief election there carried on, has become almost a matter of rotation among the aldermen.

688. When there is a fear of a contested election, the uncontested election is likely to be decided by what would probably be the result of a contest; is not it?—Yes.

689. If, therefore, contested elections in Common Hall are not free from objection, it is likely that those elections, which are matters of arrangement in order to avoid such contests, will not be settled upon very satisfactory grounds?—The constituency in Common Hall, I take it, is so large at present, and I would make it larger by the admission of a greater number of freemen, that corruption must be extremely difficult.

690. Would you alter the limits of the wards?—Perhaps yes; but that must be taken in connexion with another subject. The principal public duties which the wards perform is the election of aldermen. Every alderman, by a law passed I think as late as the reign of George the 2nd, is a magistrate and justice of the peace, and he is not only a justice of the peace for and in that ward, but for the whole City, and being a justice of the peace under that Act, he is elected such, in fact, for life. Cases have occurred within my own knowledge in which a constituency of 50 or 100 persons in some of the smaller wards have appointed a man to be as they thought their alderman, they neither knowing nor caring about the circumstance of his thereby becoming a justice of the peace. That I think a very injudicious and very unbecoming way of appointing a magistrate or justice of the peace.

691. Some of the wards have charities connected with them as wards, have they not?—I am not aware that they have.

692. You do not know whether there would be any difficulty in the re-distribution of those charities in any new arrangement of the wards?—I am not aware.

693. Is there any advantage in retaining the division into wards at all in your opinion?—I have not considered that subject.

694. The City is but a small area, is not it?—Yes.

695. What would you consider to be the advantage of dividing and mapping out this small area into certain precincts for electoral purposes?—Perhaps the best answer to that question is, that the object was self-government, and the appointment, by the residents of a particular spot, of their own officers.

696. But they appoint officers who act for the whole City, do not they; the alderman of a ward acts for the whole City, not only for his own ward?—They are, in fact, delegates—representing the wards in a court called the Court of Aldermen; but it is I believe only as a justice of the peace that an alderman becomes an officer in respect to the whole City of London.

697. The Court of Aldermen acts for the whole City of London?—Yes, in its collective capacity.

698. Does it occur to you that there is any good reason for maintaining a division into wards in so small a district as the City of London?—I see no reason for it.

699. Do you see any reason why it should not be abolished?—Only that I think that local government is a very desirable thing.

700. Have you ever particularly considered the case of the borough of Southwark?—I know nothing of the details, but I believe that it stands in an inconsistent and incon gruous position.

701. You have not considered the subject enough to be able to express any opinion to the Commission as to how the case should be dealt with?—No.

702. Do you consider it desirable that the aldermen should continue to discharge the duties of justices of the peace?—Upon the whole, my opinion is in favour of a stipendiary magistracy.

703. In that case you would appoint barristers of a certain standing, and pay them salaries for discharging magisterial duties in the City?—Upon the whole I think that would be the better plan.

704. In that case the Lord Mayor and aldermen would be relieved from their magisterial duties?—Yes.

705. You have expressed an opinion that the connexion between the companies and the Corporation of the City of London ought to cease?—Yes.

706. If that were carried out completely, would not it of itself involve the total destruction of the Court of Common Hall?—As at present existing, yes.

707. The Court of Common Hall consists of the liverymen, which of course involves their being free of some company. If the connexion between the Corporation of London, therefore, were at once dissevered, there would be an end of the Common Hall?—An end of the Common Hall as at present constituted, but it would become a Common Hall formed of freemen of the City, instead of liverymen of the companies.

708. Will you pass to the next point on which you wish to make any remarks to the Commission?—I have already stated an opinion that it would be desirable that a complete severance should be made between the trading companies and the Corporation of the City of London. How these companies should be dealt with when separated from the corporation is not, I conclude, a part of the inquiry before this Commission. It was one great grievance against the companies some years ago, that whilst claiming to be private corporations (so much so that I believe they resisted the inquiries of the Commission then issued), they, in fact engrossed every public function in the City, the only mode of obtaining the freedom of the City then being through their halls. As far as the qualification of voting for members of Parliament goes, that evil was remedied by the Reform Act; and as to ward elections, it has been done away with by an ordinance of the corporation; but the interference of the companies in City matters still exists in full force in the Common Hall, and in the election therein of corporate officers—that I suggest should be entirely abolished.

709. If it were abolished, would there be any other connexion between the trading companies and the corporation?—I am aware of none, except that I have a general impression that they are joint trustees for many purposes—I believe for some large properties. The Royal Exchange is held under some kind of joint trusteeship between the Corporation of London and one or more of the City companies. There is a connexion which I do not profess to understand between the Corporation of London and the companies, with regard to their Irish estates. These might have many matters of account between them, but no question of public principle. With regard to the funds and the accounts of the City of London, they certainly require revision. With some knowledge of accounts I have often examined their blue books, and, to use a common expression, "I can make neither head nor tail of them." I have not yet found the man who is able to tell me, though I have very often asked persons who ought to be competent to do so, what is the amount of the revenues of the Corporation of the City of London. Their accounts should certainly be stated and audited more particularly and more clearly than they have hitherto been.

710. Has any complaint been made in any public manner to the officers of the City of London as to the mode in which their accounts are kept and published?—The subject was frequently discussed some time ago at Common Halls. Objections have been raised to the manner in which the auditors were appointed, and to the manner in which the accounts were laid before those auditors.

711. To what class do the auditors belong; are they independent persons competent to investigate the accounts of the City?—My general impression is, that they are incompetent persons; but that is an impression derived from past times. I do not recollect the names of any of the recent auditors.

712. Is it your belief that the system according to which the City accounts are kept and published, admits of great improvement?—It is. I believe the accounts have become complicated from the natural operation of events. Their funds have arisen from different sources, and have been left at different times, and under different trusts, and particularly many of them have been either created or are controlled by Acts of Parliament. I have heard members of the corporation say, "You have no right to inquire into these funds, the trusts being imposed upon us by Act of Parliament;" but those acts being obtained by themselves, or by their influence, and to suit their own views, afford no reason to justify them in not submitting the accounts to public investigation.

John Dillon, Esq.

10th Nov. 1853.

713. Is there any further statement which you are desirous of making to the Commissioners?—I approach the suggestion of remedies with a great deal of hesitation; it is much easier to pull down than to build up. The first suggestion which would occur to every mind looking to the Corporation of the City of London in connexion with the map of London, would be the propriety of extending the area of its jurisdiction. To that, however, it occurs to me there are some very grave objections. If the corporation were so extended as to include the whole of the 2,000,000 of inhabitants, it would be a very large and a very powerful institution. I fear it might, in the hands of the Government, be destructive of the liberties of the people; or it might, in the hands of the people, be injurious and dangerous to the Government. Besides, to the mere extension of the Corporation of the City of London to the whole area and extent of the metropolis, which has been frequently suggested and talked of in the City, there would be an objection of another kind. The inhabitants of the metropolis are very various in their pursuits, their habits, and what they require from a corporation. A municipal government which would suit Thames Street and Cheapside, would not be very fit to provide for the wants of the inhabitants of Belgravia and Grosvenor Square. The citizens of Marylebone and Finsbury also would have wants of their own. It would certainly not be desirable suddenly or violently to destroy the Corporation of the City of London. It is much mixed up with the wants and the habits of the people; and I would suggest that corporations might be given to the surrounding boroughs, even without their applying for them, and that the experiment might be tried, say for three or five years, of the operation of such corporations.

714. Do you mean that they should be obliged to become corporations whether they wished it or not?—Yes; it being for the public good, and not merely for their exclusive benefit. From such four or five corporations, you might appoint boards, either by some federal union between themselves, or some other means to be devised, and those boards might separately take—perhaps one the police; another the lighting and the sewerage, &c.; another perhaps might have in charge the conservancy of the Thames, including the port and commerce, and regulations for the trade of the City of London. You might thus gradually take from the Corporation of the City of London some of their present powers and privileges, and so exercise them as not to produce any very sudden or injurious effect. I have suggested the extension, not the extinction of corporate rights. Having a very high opinion of the value of our vestry institutions and our municipal and corporate institutions, and thinking that they have largely operated in improving the people, and that the Corporation of London particularly has materially contributed, with all its defects and all its abuses, towards promoting the prosperity and interests of the people,—it would be with considerable hesitation that I should recommend anything that might take the power of self-government from the citizens and inhabitants of London, and place the administration of their affairs, by centralization, directly in the hands of the Government.

715. Could not the joint action of different parts of the metropolis be provided for on those subjects on which that joint action is desirable, without obliging those different districts to adopt the whole of the machinery of a corporation unless they desired it?—I should be happy if that could be so, but I do not see how it would be possible.

716. Confining yourself now to the City of London, properly so called, you are of opinion that it would not be desirable, as some have wished, to abolish municipal institutions there, but to remodel and improve them?—I am of that opinion.

717. Can you state to the Commission the outlines of any plan which has occurred to you by which those institutions could be so remodelled?—No further than I have already done. As to the freedom of the City, the constituencies of the City, the trading companies, and the funds, I have already stated all I desire to state.

718. Are there any other alterations which appear to you necessary?—Not immediately.

719. According to the plan which you have sketched out, the City would remain with its present limits as a corporation?—Yes.

720. You would further propose that the rest of the metropolis should be partitioned out among several municipal bodies; that there should be a municipality of Finsbury, a municipality of Marylebone, and a municipality of Westminster, and of Southwark, and of Lambeth?—Yes.

721. You also expressed an opinion that there were certain objects of municipal regulation which it was desirable to place under separate boards, the jurisdiction of which should extend over the whole of the metropolis. Do you think it desirable that the police should extend over the whole of the metropolis, and not, as at present, be divided between the Metropolitan Police and the City Police?—I certainly do so think.

722. Do you think it desirable that the sewerage of the metropolis should be placed under a single authority, and not, as at present be divided between the Board of Sewers at the northern part of the Thames, with the exception of the City, and another Board of Sewers for the City?—I certainly think so.

723. What would you say with respect to lighting and paving; would you make them matters of parochial regulation or municipal regulation, or would you place the lighting and paving of the whole of the metropolis under one board?—I am afraid I am leaving the proposed corporations but little to do; but seeing the inconvenience to the public of breaking open the streets in various places at the same time, I think it desirable that they should be placed under the supervision of one body.

John Dillon, Esq.

10th Nov. 1853.

724. What arrangements would you propose in respect to the supply of water? At present the supply of water is divided among several independent companies; would you take it out of the hands of the companies and distribute it among the municipalities, or would you place it under one board?—I confess I see no reason for taking it out of the hands of private individuals or companies.

725. You would leave the supply of water as at present in the hands of companies?—Yes.

726. You have also expressed an opinion that the administration of justice in the City by the magistrates should be transferred to stipendiary officers appointed by the Crown?—Yes.

727. Assuming those measures to be carried into effect, what functions of a municipal nature would remain for the corporation of the City, and for the other corporations of the metropolis?—I believe very few; the view I have taken may perhaps tend to the same result, but that result would be more safely and gradually obtained.

728. Is not the corporation of the City of London in possession of a very large income, which is independent of rates or local taxation?—I believe it is.

729. Do not you consider it a matter of great importance, with a view to corporation reform, that the good administration of that large income should be provided for?—Yes; I do.

730. Does it occur to you that it is a legitimate object of corporation reform in the City of London, that endeavours should be used to apply the income of the Corporation to as beneficial objects of a public nature as possible?—I think so; but that should be done under public control, and not by the Government.

731. This income being peculiarly the property of the City, ought not that control to be exclusively exercised by the corporation itself?—I think it should; and I should have gone further, and made some suggestions as to the future appropriation of a large portion of the funds of the trading companies also, but that I understand those funds not to be within the scope of the present Commission.

732. Do you think that the property of the City ought to be applied to objects which are exclusively connected with the present area of the City, or that they could be legitimately applied in part to purposes which are useful to the metropolis at large?—I do not think they can be fairly applied to objects out of the City. They might of course contribute to common objects.

733. Do you think it possible to find, within the limits of the City, objects of public utility to which the whole of the income of the City should be applied?—I certainly do.

734. Can you give the Commissioners an idea of the nature of such objects?—Widening the streets would be a very material object, and improving the port and public buildings.

735. Has any considerable part of the revenue of the City been applied to purposes of that sort?—I really do not know.

736. You have stated that your own business is that of a warehouseman. Have you had any experience of the privileges of the City with respect to porters and meters?—None whatever. We deal entirely in what are called dry goods, and have no business connexion that I am aware of with the corporation as to dues.

737. Where are your warehouses situated?—In the ward of Cripplegate.

738. You are not required to employ the sworn porters of the City?—We never have employed them.

739. Have you any reason to complain of the trade regulations of the City, as far as your business is concerned?—None.

740. Is there anything further which you wish to state to the Commissioners?—Nothing further.

Adjourned to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Friday, 11*th November* 1853.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M. P., IN THE CHAIR.

A. Pulling, Esq.

11th Nov. 1853.

ALEXANDER PULLING, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

741. The Commissioners are anxious to have the benefit of your evidence upon the subject which has been referred to them, because they are aware that you have given very special attention to it. You are the author of a treatise on the Laws and Usages of the Corporation of London?—I am. Perhaps I may be allowed to say, before giving evidence upon the present occasion, that I have been reluctant to attend except under the compulsory process of this Commission, because I felt that having been engaged in several City cases, the imputation might be made that I had disclosed matters which had come to my knowledge in a professional capacity. I am sure the Commissioners will always allow me to refuse to answer questions which I think are infringements upon my professional privilege. With this reservation I shall be most happy to give every information in my power.

A. Pulling, Esq.

742. The Commissioners are quite willing to receive your evidence under the restrictions and limitations you have yourself placed upon it.—I may say that I have paid very considerable attention to the subject for a great many years. I have written upon the subject, and it has been my fortune since I have been called to the bar to be engaged in a great many cases relating to the City of London. I have been engaged in matters affecting the constitution of the corporation, the rights and franchises of the corporation, and the construction of their charters and byelaws, and particularly the customs of the City of London.

743. Have you turned your attention to the state of the corporation of London not merely as a lawyer, but more generally in regard to any defects which may exist in the present system, or any remedies which it might be desirable to apply to those defects?—My attention has been more directed certainly to the law and constitution of the corporation of London, and to the existing legal franchises of the corporation, than to the moral or political view of the question. I have not attended to the matter as a reformer but as a lawyer, and perhaps merely as a lawyer. In the course of my professional experience I have noticed defects in the working of the present system, and those defects I will with all respect point out to the Commissioners, but my views as a reformer would perhaps be of little value.

744. Will you have the goodness, in the first instance, to give the Commissioners any statement respecting the corporation of London which you may think desirable with regard to its relation to the state?—There is no doubt the more one looks to the early charters of the City of London and the history of the corporation, the more one sees that this corporation stood in early times in a peculiar position towards the state, a position in which it is impossible at the present day it could stand. The corporation of London, or rather the body politic of the citizens of London, in early times stood in a very important position in reference to the state. It has been a question whether in the time of the Anglo-Saxons it was not in a great degree independent of the Crown. It had palatinate powers, and it had formerly very extensive powers, which appeared to render it independent of the Crown. The only remains which we have now of the power which existed in ancient times with regard to the corporation of London and its influence with the state, are to be found in the ceremonies occurring at the coronation, and those which attend the sitting of the members for the City of London in Parliament, and the presentation of petitions. We know with regard to the choice of the Sovereign and the accession to the Crown in ancient times, the corporation of London had a more than moral influence. It had a very powerful influence in deciding upon the choice of the Sovereign. We have been told by historians that some kings have lost their crown by having opposed the City of London, and others have gained a crown by the favour of the citizens. We know in the time of the wars between York and Lancaster, great influence was exercised by the city in the choice of a sovereign. We find, and here I refer to records which exist upon the subject, that the Anglo-Saxon kings conferred with the whole body of the citizens of London as to the government of the empire. We have in the laws of Athelstan, a sort of solemn compact between the Crown and the reeves, who were then the governors of London, as if the governors of the chief city were agreeing with the Crown as to the regulation of the state—that distinctly appears in a record of an Anglo-Saxon law set out in Wilkins' Leges Saxonicæ. We have a great many instances of the same kind in early times. Then after the accession of the Norman sovereigns, we find William the Conqueror in his very first year confirming the whole of the franchises and customs of London as they had existed from remote ages—confirming them at once in general terms, without specifying what the customs were, but declaring that the citizens of London should be law-worthy, as they were in the time of Edward the Confessor, admitting the existence of certain peculiar laws in the City of London at a previous period. Whether those rights of the citizens had been derived from their position when they were one of the free cities under the Roman system of colonization it is impossible perhaps at this remote period to say, but it is quite clear that the charter of the Conqueror did confirm customs then very ancient of the citizens of London. We have then charters from William the Conqueror down to the time of Richard the Second, which continually confirm the customs of London. In two or three instances those customs were confirmed by Parliament, that is to say, a charter granted by the Crown was sanctioned by both Houses of Parliament. We have a remarkable instance of that in Magna Charta, chapter 9, which confirms the customs of London. We have also a celebrated confirmation upon the accession of Richard the Second. It is a charter in 1st Richard the Second, which appears upon the Rolls of Parliament, and it expressly confirms the whole of the customs of London as they had previously existed. Upon those occasions the City of London appear to have paid very considerable sums to the Crown for the confirmation of their charters—they purchased, in fact, certain rights from the Crown. We know that independently of the sums which they positively paid to the Crown, the corporation of London were in the habit of lending very considerable sums to the Crown for state purposes, and when levies were made upon the country towards the expenses of the state government, we know before the Conquest so large a proportion as 11,000*l.* out of 83,000*l.* levied upon the whole kingdom was paid by the City of London.

745. Was that paid by the City of London as a corporation, or by individual merchants?—I shall presently suggest to the Commissioners, although I call the City of London the corporation of London, that it did not exist as a corporation till long after the time I am now speaking of. The money was lent by the body politic of the City of London then existing.

746. Out of a common fund?—The loans were made out of a common fund, but the levies, I expect, were not; they were made, I imagine, from the whole body of the citizens. There is no doubt that the loans were made by the citizens assembled in their political assembly, whatever it was—their folkmote, or whatever other assembly they had. The only relic which now remains of this great influence which they had in the state is in certain ceremonies which attend my Lord Mayor.

747. Did not the political influence of the City last to a much later date than you have descended to?—I cannot attribute to the corporation of London any direct influence in the state after the accession of Henry the Seventh.

748. Was not a great influence exercised by the City during the Civil War?—A great moral influence was exercised, but they had no legal influence.

749. Did not their legal privileges enable them to give an asylum to the five members, and did not Parliament sometimes adjourn to the City in order to avail themselves of the privileges of the corporation?—There was, certainly, an advantage to be obtained from the right which a person had to protection within the City of London, and so far, great influence would be enjoyed by the corporation, but I do not infer from that that the corporation of London had any constitutional influence in the government of the state.

750. It had a very direct political influence upon the conduct of the supreme government, had it not, through its privileges?—Through its privileges it had a great moral influence.

751. Was not it something more than a moral influence?—It did not form a part of the machinery of the government, as it had done in ancient times. We know that down to much later period than the time of the Civil Wars, the City of London continued to enjoy great political influence, and possibly it does enjoy some more than ordinary political influence now. But I do not find, from any records of the corporation, that the City have any greater voice in the movements of the state than any other corporation. The ceremonies to which I have alluded are very unimportant. First of all, the Lord Mayor is a member of the Privy Council.

752. Is the Lord Mayor a member of the Privy Council on any other occasion than one, namely, when the Privy Council assembles upon the demise of the Crown?—Whether the Lord Mayor is admitted on other occasions, I do not know; but it has always been contended that the Lord Mayor is a member of the Privy Council.

753. Do you apprehend that the Lord Mayor would be summoned to any meeting of the Privy Council for any other purpose than that which has been mentioned?—I apprehend in ancient times he was. Upon a coronation, the Lord Mayor receives a certain golden tankard. The Lord Mayor claims also to act as chief butler. That claim was insisted upon in ancient times, as a great city privilege. In the time of Richard the First, and at the coronation of four or five sovereigns after Richard the First, certainly up to the time of Henry the Fourth, the City insisted upon this right as a great City right.

754. Has the right of appearing as chief butler at the coronation fallen into desuetude, or is it still asserted?—It is still asserted. I do not know practically whether the Lord Mayor took any part at the last coronation.

755. This right, probably, is not exercised at the coronation, unless there is a coronation banquet?—Not unless there is a coronation banquet.

756. The last coronation banquet being at the coronation of George the Fourth?—Yes.

757. Do you know if the Lord Mayor acted as chief butler upon that occasion?—I think the Lord Mayor did. I am not very conversant with the festive ceremonies of the coronation.

758. Is there any record from which it appears how the Lord Mayor came to be considered as a privy councillor?—There is a very considerable difficulty about the origin of the Lord Mayor acting as privy councillor.

759. Is he ever sworn in?—I do not think he is. With respect to the ceremonies, as we are aware, at the proclamation of a Sovereign, the Lord Mayor has insisted upon his right to exclude every stranger from admission into the City, he being at Temple Bar to receive the announcement of the accession of the new Sovereign. There are, also, ceremonies which take place in the Houses of Parliament.

760. Is not a formal communication always made by the Secretary of State to the Lord Mayor, when either the Sovereign or any member of the royal family dies?—Upon all great occasions, I believe, the Home Secretary or the Prime Minister communicates with the Lord Mayor. Upon the illness even of the Sovereign, a communication is made to the Lord Mayor, as it is upon all great state occasions. It does not appear to me that, except as a mere matter of ceremony, the corporation of London has any legal influence in the government of the State, more than any other corporation in the country.

761. Are there any observations which you wish to address to the Commission, in regard to the relation of the corporation of London to the trade of the metropolis?—Yes. With regard to the trade of the metropolis, the early charters of London show that the corporation, which at that time was composed of all the citizens of London, all the citizens of London being merchants or traders, had then the exclusive and entire control of the trade of London. There is a law of Ethelred, with regard to the customs to be paid by foreign merchants, and there is there a provision that foreign merchants should not forestall the markets from the burghers of London. That is set forth in Anderson's History of Commerce under the reign of Ethelred the 2d. That record shows that in those days the corporation of London had very considerable influence over the the trade of the kingdom, and had the entire influence over the trade of London. I will not attempt to go back to an earlier period, because every member of the Commission knows what Tacitus says of the trader of London; how, at a much earlier period, London was the resort of merchants from all parts of the world. This influence that the City of London had over the trade of London was made the subject of several charters, and ultimately of an Act of Parliament, which appears upon the Rolls of Parliament in the time of Richard the 2d, expressly giving power to the citizens of London to exclude foreigners from selling or buying of any other foreigner any merchandise within the limits of the City. Those exclusive privileges,—those rights to monopolise the trade of London in favour of the citizens and the members of the body politic, or the corporation existing at that time,—appear to have been the principal objects of the laws then in force in the City with regard to trade. The City was composed of every resident there; every resident was compelled to be free; and the majority of the residents being traders, there was no conflict between the citizens of London and the merchants, for the merchants were the citizens. The City of London was a peculiarly commercial body, composed of all the resident merchants there; and the contest then was, not between English-born merchants, who resided there, but with alien merchants,—with foreigners who resorted there, and were compelled, by certain laws, to sell their goods within a very limited period. This custom of excluding foreigners was supported by a number of the laws and customs of the City. One custom was, the seizing foreign-bought and foreign-sold goods. If a freeman of London protected goods belonging to a non-freeman, those goods could be seized; and that is always stated to be the custom of the City of London, called the custom of foreign-bought and foreign-sold. The custom, also, of excluding strangers, those who were not free, from the City, existed, as it has always been contended, long anterior to any of the charters or laws to which I have referred. It is set forth in Waggoner's case, in 8th Coke, as the immemorial custom of the City of London. There is a very elaborate judgment, which is partially referred to in the previous Report upon the corporation of London, which I have here in print; the judgment of Sir Orlando Bridgman. A question arose upon the subject of traders in London, and Sir Orlando Bridgman speaks in the most glowing terms of the power of the corporation of London over the trade of the City and Port of London. He says, in his judgment in Hutchins v. Player, "The same reason there is "for restraint of persons, as places for public buying and selling, and times within which "they should buy and sell, and trades with which they should meddle, and with which they "should not meddle as,—that a dyer should be no clothier, nor a butcher a tallow-chandler, "—without the aid of and before the statute of 5 Elizabeth. So the carmen, draymen, "porters, cobblers, musicians, exchange brokers, retailing brokers, farriers, watermen, and "generally all other trades in the City, have had their regulations and restrictions from the "Common Council and Court of Aldermen, and so generally men of all other trades and "employments in the City, till they have been admitted to become brotherhoods, and after-"wards to obtain charters, with powers to choose governors and officers for regulation of "their own mysteries, subject nevertheless to the mayor and aldermen, &c.; and these "restrictions have been as great as in our own case." This judgment is full of observations about the extent of the powers of the corporation of London over the trade of the metropolis; and Sir Orlando Bridgman specifies a number of instances in which the corporation have exercised power over trade. They appear to have had within the City almost as extensive a power over trade as the supreme legislature; a power which was more often exercised, and more directly exercised, than by the supreme legislature itself. They regulated the brokers, as they do at the present day. They regulated the companies and guilds of every trade set up in London. Every trade, at one period or other, in the course of time, became a brotherhood, and those brotherhoods or guilds were under the immediate governance of the corporation of London. The corporation at large could control the admission of individuals to the livery, and make general trade regulations. This connexion of the corporation with the trade of London, as it existed in the custom of exclusive trading, and the custom of regulating the trades or mysteries, has rather fallen into desuetude.

A. Pulling, Esq.

762. What meaning do you attach to the term exclusive trading? What do you consider was the nature of the privilege which the citizen merchant of London possessed when he was said to have the privilege of exclusive trade?—It is set forth in Waggoner's case, as regulated by the charter of Richard the 2d, "that no foreigner do sell or buy of any other foreigner any merchandise within the liberties of the said City, upon pain of forfeiting the same." All dealings between persons who were not freemen of the City were prohibited.

763. That is to say, a foreigner might no doubt purchase from a citizen, but he might not sell to him?—He might not sell to him.

764. All selling upon the part of a foreigner was absolutely prohibited?—It was absolutely prohibited, except in the public markets of the City of London, and within forty days of his coming within the City. He had a right to remain for forty days within the City, to sell his wares, and then he must depart.

765. At that time you think a foreigner could have sold his goods in the open markets of the City, without being a freeman?—Yes.

766. What do you understand to be meant by the public markets?—We know, with respect to the City of London, the whole of the City was a market overt, and there was the difficulty; but the way in which the foreigner was restricted was by the internal regulations of the corporation, which fixed upon certain spots for the goods to be sold, and certain days for the markets to be held on. For example, there was a market at Blackwell Hall for cloth, and markets in various places for various goods. We know, from the names of streets, how markets were confined to particular streets. Those markets were regulated, not only as to their place, but as to their time. Sir Orlando Bridgman mentions in his judgment that the corporation regulated the places where they were to be held, and the times. The great subject of trade was cloth, which was sold at the Cloth Fair, which was in the neighbourhood of the St. Bartholomew's, where the merchants came, and were obliged to leave in a certain time. There were officers of the corporation continually on the watch to give them a hint to go when they had sold their goods.

767. Are you aware whether the laws and regulations of the City of London were more or less liberal towards foreigners than those of other mercantile towns at the same period?—They certainly were less liberal than those of other mercantile towns of England; for we have several Acts of Parliament, in the time of Henry IV. particularly, and, I think, also in the time of Edward III., giving merchants a right to come and go, for the purpose of trading, generally throughout the kingdom, there being special clauses introduced to save the customs of the City of London.

768. With regard to foreign merchants, in the ordinary sense of the word, that is, aliens, has not it always been the disposition of the City of London to encourage the resort of foreign merchants?—It cannot be said that it was always the case, for Acts of Parliament prohibiting aliens from remaining a certain time were passed by the express prayer of the corporation of the City of London.

769. You are not aware whether, with regard to foreigners, the disposition of the City of London was more or less liberal than that of the citizens of other commercial cities on the continent at the same period?—I cannot undertake to say whether the policy of the City of London was more or less liberal than that of continental towns, but it was certainly less liberal than that of the borough towns in England; for they had special laws, giving them exclusive rights, at their express prayer.

770. At present there is no cloth fair, is there, in the City of London?—There is not.

771. Formerly a merchant who was not a citizen, whether he was an Englishman or an alien, could have sold cloth in the City of London without being a freeman, provided he sold it at the cloth fair?—Yes.

772. If a person now were to wish to sell cloth in the City, could he do so without being a freeman of the City?—Whether he could legally do so is a very great question; but practically the corporation have ceased to enforce their rights against wholesale dealers at all.

773. Supposing he were a retail dealer?—Supposing he were a retail dealer, he could not.

774. Then a retail dealer in cloth would now be in a worse position in the City than he would have been at the time of the existence of the cloth fair?—Yes.

775. Can an alien become a freeman of the City?—He cannot.

776. Then, in point of fact, an alien could not set up as a retail shopkeeper in the City of London?—He could not, as a matter of right.

777. Is it the case now that no alien is permitted to exercise any retail trade within the City?—He could be excluded if the law were enforced against him. An alien could be admitted to the freedom by the express act of the common council.

778. Do you know, as a matter of fact, whether there are aliens who are shopkeepers in the City of London?—No doubt there are a great many.

779. Is their being so winked at?—I conclude it is winked at; and that, inasmuch as an alien could not have the same facility of obtaining his freedom as an Englishman, the wardmote inquest would pass him by, or, if he were returned, no proceedings would be taken against him.

780. Does he obtain his freedom in the ordinary way, or by a special act of the common council?—I believe by a special act of the common council.

781. In that case would he pay more for obtaining his freedom than if he obtained it in the ordinary way?—I do not know what the fees are. It has been a very rare proceeding. Practically, at this day, the only regulations which are enforced as to exclusive trade are against retail dealers and against brokers and publicans. There are some retail dealers, as the Commissioners are aware, who are protected by special statutes as to sailors and soldiers and their children. Being myself the son of an old officer, I have the privilege of setting up a retail shop in London, if I like. All those whose fathers have been in certain wars during a certain period have that privilege, as also the soldiers and sailors themselves, and their wives and children. These Acts of Parliament passed at the conclusion of the peace.

782. Did the Acts of Parliament of which you speak refer solely to the City of London?—No; they referred at the time to the whole of the corporations of England which had exclusive trade privileges. But those trade privileges, in other cases, have been repealed by the Municipal Corporations Act, so that now they only exist in the corporation of London.

A. Pulling, Esq.
10th Nov. 1853.

783. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commissioners what is the exact extent of the trade privileges now claimed by the City of London, and what is the extent of the privileges which they actually exercise?—It is difficult to separate those two things. They can hardly be said to claim that which they do not enforce. They do not really claim any privilege, except against retail dealers and brokers and publicans. No person can be a broker within the City unless he is free, and is admitted by the Court of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. No one can set up as a retail dealer except he is free of the City; and no one can open a public house without taking up his freedom.

784. Are not the claims of the corporation, with regard to metage and porterage, trade privileges?—Yes; those I will refer to immediately.

785. The trade privileges to which you have referred, existed in other corporations besides that of London before the Municipal Reform Act?—Yes.

786. Did they rest upon the same ground, as being conferred by charter?—Those rights could not exist by charter. The right of exclusive trading, inasmuch as it is opposed to the common law, could not be conferred by charter; it could only rest upon immemorial custom or Act of Parliament.

787. Did the rights of those other corporations rest upon immemorial custom?—They were assumed to rest upon immemorial custom.

788. They were abolished by statute?—Yes.

789. Therefore it would be possible for the Legislature to deal with those customs in the City of London as they have dealt with them in other corporations?—Precisely so. And I may say, to the credit of the corporation of London, that in a bill which was brought before Parliament the session before last, which I had the honour of opposing, they did propose to abolish those customs.

790. Is it your belief that there is no custom in restraint of trade in the City of London which may be considered as dormant, and which is not enforced by the City?—I believe the custom of excluding all dealers, wholesale or retail, and the custom of seizing foreign-bought and foreign-sold goods exist in law at the present time.

791. Then it would be true to say there are legal customs which the City may claim as such which they do not enforce?—Yes. Then also the corporation regulate brokers. The regulation of brokers is by virtue of an immemorial custom which is recognised in some of the earliest charters and some of the earliest laws relating to the City of London. There is a law called the Statute of the City of London, in Edward the First's time, and that law speaks of it as an ancient custom that no one should act as a broker in the City of London except he should be admitted in a corporate assembly by the choice of the trades or mysteries in which he practised. That custom, thus conferred by statute, has been confirmed by a variety of statutes, till an Act of the 57th of George the Third, which increased the amount payable by a broker upon his taking up his freedom, and the annual sum payable by him, which are received by the corporation under the name of brokers' rents.

792. Is that a public Act?—It is a local Act. A statute of Anne, a statute of William and Mary, and four or five other statutes relate to this regulation of brokers, though all enforce the same law originating in the custom that the City authorities should regulate all brokers between buyer and seller in the City of London; and the Court of Aldermen, in whom the power is now vested, requires the broker to enter into a bond for his good behaviour and to pay the brokers' rent. He is also to observe certain byelaws which are made by the Court of Aldermen for the regulation of brokers. The Court of Aldermen, while they are a legislative body regulating the brokers, are also a judicial tribunal to which the offences of brokers are referred, and they sit as a court to hear complaints against brokers. There was a case which was reported in some of the daily papers a few days ago of a complaint made against a broker upon the Stock Exchange who had committed some frauds. The corporation of London took up the case, but I do not think that they are very often called upon to exercise those powers. As far as my personal experience goes, they appear to me not to exercise their powers, unless in a very clear case indeed. For example, I was engaged some time ago in a dispute which occurred in the leather trade as to some charges made by a broker. There was no charge of misconduct against the broker, but there was a system of charging which was objected to by the sellers. Very considerable expense was incurred in order to have the question properly tried. I recommended the case to be brought before the Court of Aldermen, and certainly the result of that appeal impressed me with anything but a favourable opinion of the Court of Aldermen as a judicial body in deciding matters of any importance. I believe a large number of merchants who were engaged in that case were very much dissatisfied with the result; in fact, the Court of Aldermen came to no conclusion whatever.

793. How many aldermen sat?—About twelve or fourteen. There was very considerable confusion.

794. Was the Lord Mayor in the chair?—The Lord Mayor was in the chair.

795. But they came to no decision?—No.

796. Was the question put to the vote?—The room was cleared, and the question was put to the vote, and the result was, after an adjourned meeting, that the Court of Aldermen would not interfere.

797. Did they pronounce no adjudication upon the question?—No.

798. Was it a judicial question?—Yes, as to the construction of their own byelaws.

799. Was the result of the case that they declined the jurisdiction, and did not adjudicate?—I cannot say what the ground of the decision was. All I can say is that the Court of Aldermen refused to exercise the jurisdiction they had.

800. Was any other remedy open to the parties?—An action to try the question.

801. Was it in the nature of a civil proceeding; were there a plaintiff and a defendant, a distinct issue being raised?—The application was made under the byelaws of the Court of Aldermen which regulate brokers, and which prevent brokers from receiving commission from both buyer and seller. The selling broker upon this occasion claimed a commission from the buyer at the public sale, as well as from the seller. It was a fair and, I believe, an honourable dispute between the brokers as a class and the buyers as a class, and it was in a good spirit referred to the Court of Aldermen.

802. Did it come before the Court of Aldermen as arbitrators, or as exercising a sort of patriarchal jurisdiction?—It came before them as a tribunal exercising jurisdiction over brokers.

803. In what form did the question come before them?—In the nature of a complaint of the infringement of one of the bye-laws.

804. It was rather an application for redress than an issue joined?—Yes.

805. In that case, therefore, they might with propriety have declined to give redress?—I do not charge the Court of Aldermen with any impropriety in the matter; but I think that in cases of that kind, and in all cases where difficulties arise, the jurisdiction of the Court of Aldermen is of little use. That was one of the cases which showed that the Court of Aldermen did not feel themselves competent to decide a matter, as to which the Legislature had conferred upon them jurisdiction.

806. Do you suppose they felt that they had an interest in the question?—I have no reason to impute to them misconduct in any way, or a belief that they were interested. It certainly was an instance where the Court of Aldermen had power, and did not exercise it. With regard to the regulation of the river Thames, which is immediately connected with the trade of London, the corporation are invested by very early statutes and charters with the conservancy and regulation of the Thames. The conservancy of the Thames in ancient times appears to have consisted principally in the regulation of the fish, and there are very few of them left in the stream of the Thames near London at the present time. For the exercise of those powers, which were conferred by early charters, the corporation of London had an officer called the water bailiff, whose power and authority still continue.

807. Does it appear clearly that the original purpose of the conservancy of the Thames was principally limited to the preservation of the fish?—The preservation of the fish, and also the removal of the weirs which impeded the navigation up the river.

808. Below the bridges, had they nothing to do with the protection of the river against the accumulation of shoals and other impediments of that nature in the channel?—I am not aware of any record which exists of the corporation of London having in early times kept clear the great stream of the Thames below what is now London Bridge.

809. Are there not other parties—the Admiralty and the Crown—who have claims with regard to the river?—A case is now pending with regard to the claim of the Crown to the government of the Thames. It is the case of The Attorney-General versus The Corporation of London, and is now pending in the Court of Chancery. The question is the right of the corporation to the conservancy of the Thames.

810. Does that suit involve a dispute of the right of the Corporation to anything like the conservancy of the Thames?—It does. That question is still pending.

811. Is the question in that case as to the conservancy of the Thames, or as to the right to the soil between high and low-water mark?—I have nothing to do professionally with the case, and I cannot be positive; but I think it involves the right to the conservancy as well. Certainly one of the questions is as to the bed and soil of the Thames. There is a charter of Henry the Sixth, which is said to grant the right to the bed and soil of the Thames. That charter was afterwards repealed; at all events, the right to the soil of the Thames, which is supposed to form one of the rights of the City, is in dispute. The right to the preservation of rivers appears to have been conferred, in the case of other rivers, upon particular officers, called "Conservators." The Act of Richard the Second, referring to the conservancy of the Thames, gives the Mayor of London the same power over the conservancy of the Thames which those officers had in other rivers. With regard to the port of London and the river Thames, as connected with the trade of London, the rights of the corporation at a very early period were confined to the exaction of tolls. They, no doubt, expended money on the erection and keeping up of quays, and wharfs, and landing-places. I do not know in what other way the corporation expended money to preserve the port of London. They were also entitled to certain tolls. The Crown had a right to certain tolls on landing goods, in the nature of petty customs, at Queenhithe and other landing-places, and those were granted by the Crown to the City in consideration of a sum of money, There were tolls taken at Queenhithe where corn was landed, and also tolls at other places; those tolls attached upon corn, and fruit, and roots used as food. And upon the accession of James I. he granted a charter to the City of London, in which he gave them the right to what was called the metage of all corn, and fruit, and roots edible (extending to potatoes, a very large article of importation into London), brought within the limits of the port of London.

812. That would include both banks of the Thames?—Yes, as is contended by the City; but the question is in issue upon that point. That was a grant from the Crown, but not a grant by Parliament. I am now speaking of the charter of James. That same charter also granted to the corporation the metage of coal. Sea-coal was an article of new importation, and not a subject of immemorial custom. The corporation, having the grant of the right to measure the coal as it was landed, in order to measure it, it was necessary to carry it to be measured; and it was hence that the corporation of London, without any express grant of the porterage of either corn or coal, but with that general power which they had to regulate labour and trade within the bounds of the City of London, erected the fellowship of porters called the corn porters and the salt porters. The corn porters had particular things which they might carry; and the salt porters carried salt, which was then an important branch of trade, and so on. The metage of corn and the metage of coal were regulated by the City porters insisting upon the right to carry it and taking it to the meter to be measured, in order to ascertain the amount of the duty which the City might claim for the labour of measuring. So that there was the carrying it to be measured, and when it was measured the City claimed the right to be paid for measuring it. There was no immediate advantage in the measuring to the owners of the coal or corn; but the City claimed that duty, and the duty was supposed to be good (as it was held to be in the case of other grants) as a port custom, in consideration of certain repairs done to the port by the corporation.

813. You stated that the extent of those privileges was now in dispute?—Yes.

814. To what case do you refer particularly?—I am speaking of the limits within which the meters may exact the City payments. The particular case I refer to is the case of Combe versus the Corporation of London.

815. In that case, other points are in dispute besides the extent of the jurisdiction, are they not?—Yes; there is a bill of discovery, and a denial of the right altogether.

816. In all those cases the metage is compulsory?—The metage is compulsory.

817. So that if a person landing coal or corn or any other article falling within the grant, objects to its being measured, the City insist upon measuring it, in order that they may have their fee?—They do.

818. Has that right been constantly exercised?—I believe it has been constantly exercised ever since the charter of James.

819. Do you happen to know the territorial limits within which the claim extends?—The claim is made within the port of London.

820. What are the bounds of the port?—The bounds of the port of London are Yantlet Creek in the county of Kent, and Staines in the county of Middlesex.

821. That would include both banks of the river, taking Staines as the highest point and Yantlet Creek as the lowest point?—Yes.

822. Do you happen to know the number of miles?—No.

823. Do you believe that the privilege is enforced in the county of Kent?—I believe there are places in the county of Kent where it is enforced, but I know there are places in the county of Kent where it is resisted. I should be touching upon professional privilege if I alluded any further to the case in which I have been myself engaged upon that subject.

824. Is that a right of much value to the corporation?—The metage is of very considerable value; it produces a large revenue.

825. Is it a right to which the public submit willingly or reluctantly?—All the public, except such wealthy men as Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company, who can carry the case to the House of Lords, submit to this claim.

826. Do they submit willingly or reluctantly?—I am not able to say. I should think they grudged the payment very much.

827. The charges which the City make are much larger than would be paid supposing the privilege did not exist?—They are.

828. Are the meters a close corporation?—The meters form a fellowship which is not incorporated; they are admitted to form an associated body of men under certain regulations.

829. Can any one who wishes to be a meter become so as a matter of right?—Certainly not; it is a valuable office.

830. Can he become so if he chooses to pay the entrance fee?—No; the men enter first as labourers under the name of porters, they then obtain a certain rank. There are two or three hundred members of the fellowship, many of whom are in a very poverty-stricken state. They rise from one step to another till they become corn porters, which is a higher grade than that of ordinary labourers. From that they may become shifters—a shifter being a very important officer indeed, deriving a very large revenue from his share of the metage.

831. There is a double advantage derived from that privilege, one by the persons who are meters, and another by the City?—Decidedly there is a double advantage.

832. Do you know what the entrance fee of a labourer desiring to be admitted to this fellowship is?—I do not know; it is not large in the first instance, but they pay an annual sum out of their wages. There is a very large sum accumulated by the fellowship, and there have been many disputes of late.

833. Do they pay that sum to the corporation?—No, to the fellowship. There is a fellowship with certain funds. It is a corporate institution, but it is also in the nature of a friendly society.

834. In point of fact, this institution of the fellowship you speak of is a subject of valuable patronage to the corporation?—Yes, so far as regards the metage, but not so as regards the fellowship porters.

835. With whom does that patronage rest?—With the corn and finance committee of the corporation of London.

836. They are common councilmen and aldermen?—They are common councilmen and aldermen. The Commissioners will understand me, that the fellowship to which I alluded is the fellowship of porters; the meters and sifters are connected with the porterage, and they act in unison with them. Connected with this metage is the porterage of corn. In order to take it to be measured, it is necessary to convey it, and the corporation claiming the right to regulate all labour within the City, have made laws which profess to extend beyond the limits of the City, and to be co-extensive with the metage. The consequence is, that the fellowship porters who are attached to the metage, claim to exercise their powers out of the limits of the City of London proper, but within the limits of the port of London. The fellowship porters are by the byelaws of the corporation invested with the monopoly of labour throughout the whole of the port of London: that claim has been resisted.

837. You stated that the claim to the superintendence of the porterage was derived by implication from the general power of controlling the trade of the City?—That is so.

838. The power of the metage is derived from the grant of the Crown, and extends much beyond the limits of the City?—Certainly.

839. It would follow, therefore, that the power over the porterage is limited to the City, strictly so called, and is not co-extensive with the power of metage?—That is the case; but the corporation of London, by the byelaws that were passed upwards of one hundred years ago, have made the mistake of conferring upon the fellowship porters a monopoly of labour co-extensive with the metage, and further than they can legally extend it, and the fellowship porters insist upon their rights now.

840. Is that claim now abandoned by the corporation?—It is not abandoned. I have myself been engaged in a dispute with them with regard to one of the dock companies on the Surrey side.

841. Does not the present state of the privileges of the City of London generate a great deal of litigation?—I was almost going to say that I was happy to find that it does engender litigation. Looking, however, without the narrow view of a lawyer upon the subject, I must say it does engender a vast deal of litigation. And when I call the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that there are within the limits of the metropolis 700 local Acts of Parliament; that there are very nearly 100 charters, and nearly as many customs, which can be called up from their slumbers to experimentalize with by any adventurous attorney or solicitor within the limits of the metropolis; the Commissioners can readily see how injurious is this system of obsolete customs and local conflicting laws being allowed to remain as at present.

842. Would not it be very important even for the interests of the corporation itself, always excepting the lawyers attached to the corporation, that the nature of its claims should be ascertained and simplified and rendered more distinct?—Most decidedly. One of the principal points to which I should wish to direct the attention of the Commissioners is the subject of the consolidaton of the useful laws and customs of the City, as well as of the rest of the metropolis, and the entire abolition of those which the corporation have thought proper not to enforce.

843. Of course to the community at large the vexation and expense caused by the litigation to which you have referred must be very considerable likewise?—It must.

844. What means have the public at present of gaining information as to the grounds upon which the City claim their privileges?—I do not know that they have any other means of obtaining information, except by consulting a lawyer, who would refer to the old books, or those which had been produced in modern times, or the Commissioners' report, or some other record of the law.

845. Have not the City certain charters and records and other documents upon which they ground claims, but which are inaccessible to the public?—To my personal knowledge the charters of the City of London themselves are not accessible to the public. I applied to the present town clerk for the inspection of the charters, with the view of giving an authentic version of them to the public in connexion with the book which I published. In the most courteous way possible Mr. Serjeant Merewether told me he was compelled to refuse; that he was not at liberty to give them to me.

846. In a short account of the case of the corporation of London versus Combe, the Commissioners were informed that the defendants, the house of Combe, Delafield and Company filed a bill of discovery to obtain information as to the grounds upon which the City made their claim with respect to porterage and metage, the right to which is in issu in that case. The City filed an answer to that bill, which was not considered satisfactory Exception was taken to that answer, and a second answer was filed. Exception was again taken to that second answer, and a third answer was put in. It was represented to the Commissioners that the defendants in that case, upon whom a large pecuniary claim was made on behalf of the City, were unable to obtain any satisfactory information as to the ground upon which the claim was made. Is that a state of things of which you have had any experience?—I certainly have found very great difficulty in obtaining access to records of the corporation to authenticate any custom or any charter, popular copies of which have been already before the public, and the contents of which the profession suppose themselves to be familiar with.

847. In the case referred to, the corporation came into court to assert a right which they say extends to the whole port of London on both sides of the Thames from Yantleet Creek to Staines. They are asked by the defendants to show the legal grounds upon which the claim is made. They refuse to give what is considered by the defendants a satisfactory answer. It is necessary to take exceptions twice over to their answers, and upon that point they have gone by appeal to the House of Lords. Does that describe a state of things with respect to the knowledge of the legal privileges of the City which appears to you at all desirable?—Certainly not.

848. We know by much experience that, however public legislation may be, disputes will arise as to the application of laws to a complicated state of facts; but does not an additional cause of litigation here exist, because the public are unable to ascertain the nature of the very laws or legal regulations upon which the claim is based?—Most certainly, and I propose to address myself to that point presently, as one of the most serious evils which appear to me to arise from the present state of things in the City of London. There are a great variety of conflicting laws, a great number of franchises claimed by the City of London and not enforced, and a great number of customs which are in the nature of local laws in the City of London, which are equally binding with the common law itself, but which have been so perfectly secluded from public notice that even the legislature is not aware of them. Gentlemen who draw Acts of Parliament are not aware of them, and great inconvenience frequently arises in consequence.

849. This is the case of a right which the City seek to enforce by expensive litigation. Do you think it reasonable that they should withhold a knowledge of the charters or whatever the legal grounds may be upon which the claim is made?—Certainly not.

850. Is it the usual practice in litigation of that sort to drive the defendant to a bill of discovery to obtain such information?—It was, until the passing of the Evidence Act, I am sorry to say too much the case, that people in possession of old rights generally kept their adversaries in the dark—at all events it was the custom of the legal profession to do so.

851. Would the City of London consider itself in the same position as the lord of a manor or proprietor of the toll of a bridge, and regard its charters in the light of title deeds?—I believe that is the view which the officers of the corporation of London are instructed to take at the present time—that they are not to expose the records of the corporation, although upon public matters, to the public view.

852. Practically would they treat them in the same way in which a private proprietor would treat the title deeds to his estate?—Practically they do so.

853. Is it upon that ground that they are resisting that discovery?—It is upon that ground. As the Commissioners will well see if it were not Combe, Delafield and Co. but some poor corn merchant, he would have been ruined before the first bill of discovery could have been brought to a close. The alehouses in the City are now so generally regulated by the general Act of Parliament that the few regulations of the City require but a very short comment at my hands; it is sufficient for me to say that the Licensing Act secures the privileges of the City—one of the privileges being that the members of the Vintners' Company are entitled to carry on business as publicans—I think it was commented on in the Report of the previous Commissioners, that very often the members of the Vintners' Company who carry on the business of public houses, are not the very best class of publicans. I believe occasionally brothels have been kept by members of the Vintners' Company, and dancing houses—a notorious place called "H's" I believe was kept by a vintner.

854. Are the members of the Vintners' Company who have the regulation of these houses, of necessity vintners?—No, the Vintners' Company exercises very little control over its members in regard to their trade, provided they pay their quarterage.

855. Is not it the case that in process of time the persons who become members of different companies in London have nothing to do with the trade the name of which the particular companies bear?—Nothing at all.

856. Can a man who is a member of the Cooks' Company, for instance, exercise any trade in London?—Yes, he may turn over to another company. There are some of the companies who enforce their rights, and there are certain acts of Common Council which require persons who are admitted to the freedom to be admitted through particular companies. The Butchers and some half-dozen of the smaller companies have the protection of acts of the Common Council requiring people of these trades to be admitted through them; but otherwise the rule is as stated in the question.

857. You stated that the Evidence Act gave facilities for obtaining information from the City of London as to the charters: what has been the operation of that Act in that respect?—The Evidence Act which was passed two sessions ago, gives a power to a court of common law of granting an inspection.

858. Does not the City of London claim the right, that paramount effect should be given to its usages, unless they are specifically repealed in an Act of Parliament?—It does, and I particularly wish to draw the attention of the Commissioners to that point.

859. Would the Evidence Act therefore afford any remedy to the inconvenience complained of in the case of litigation against the City of London?—The great evil which arises from those customs and usages of the City of London being placed in the position in which they stand by so many confirmatory Acts of Parliament is, that there is always a doubt whether they continue to exist or not, and whether they shall avail against a public general Act of Parliament. I shall presently call the attention of the Commissioners to a list of cases, where the legislature in its wisdom has thought proper to introduce certain general and comprehensive reforms loudly called for, in the general administration of the law in which questions may arise and indeed have been raised—whether the City of London is comprehended in those reforms.

860. Suppose Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company were to attempt to obtain an inspection of the charters of the City by means of an order of a judge at chambers, would they not be opposed on the ground that the City were not specifically named in the Evidence Act?—I assume that that might be a possible consequence.

861. Therefore the Evidence Act might only give rise to further litigation?—Yes, with regard to the companies I think I ought to address a word or two to the Commission. The companies do not exercise any power over trade, except in the few small instances to which I have referred; but the corporation at large have a power over the companies, and as I conceive, they might insist if they were so disposed, upon the companies being composed only of members of the trade. They have still great power over the companies or guilds, and members of the corporation in general, and they may oversee the regulations of the companies as to their trade.

862. Will you have the goodness to pass to the next point on which you wish to address any observations to the Commission?—With regard to the regulation of the metropolis, the corporation of London at this time have very little power beyond the limits of the City. A great many of the charters of the livery companies extend to a certain distance round London, some 7 miles and some 21 miles. In the case of the Tobacco Pipe Makers they extend all over England. Thus indirectly the corporation of London have some small powers beyond the limits of the City. With regard to the port of London also, which extends farther than the limits of the City, they have a certain power, otherwise their power out of the City is almost nominal.

863. They have a control over some of the Irish corporations, have not they?—That is in respect of their Irish estates, which are private property. The City, under the authority of certain charters, elect the sheriff of Middlesex. We know that the sheriffs formerly had very extensive powers; they were the principal conservators of the peace, and it is very possible that the objects of those charters was to give the corporation of the City of London an extensive power over the whole of Middlesex, in which county the City was locally situated. They had, by some other charters, power to arrest thieves who escaped out of the City into the suburbs, and it would appear that the City were invested with those powers, for the purpose of extending their police jurisdiction as the City increased in extent. To prevent the suburbs exceeding the limits of the municipal government, at a more recent period, viz., in the time of Elizabeth and James, Acts of Parliament were passed prohibiting new buildings in the neighbourhood of London, and, as matter of antiquarian curiosity, sometimes those statutes are dragged out of their obscurity, to show the absurdity of legislation at that time. The object clearly was to give the municipality of London a jurisdiction over the whole of the metropolis. In Westminster there was a special Act of Parliament passed in the 27th of Elizabeth, which gave to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster a power to exercise a sort of police authority, to punish certain persons, (among others prostitutes,) and to exercise a similar authority over the parishes of Westminster, which the corporation of London had within the limits of the City. That authority still continues. There is a high bailiff of Westminster, and certain forms are gone through, but in consequence of the establishment of the new police and the various Acts which regulate Westminster, the power of the Dean and Chapter has sunk into disuse.

864. The connexion of the City with Southwark is very peculiar, is it not?—It is very peculiar. The first instance of their having power in Southwark, was on the occasion of a grant from Edward III.; he granted the whole of Southwark to the City. Previous to that time, Southwark had a distinct charter of incorporation. I suppose the system of local government failed within Southwark, and Edward III. granted to the City of London the government of Southwark. The charter of Edward III. merely had the effect of enabling the City to receive certain dues in Southwark, and they also searched for thieves and felons there; but Southwark was not incorporated as part of the City of London till a long time afterwards; Edward IV. granted another charter to them, and in Edward VI.'s time the City obtained a complete grant of the whole of Southwark. Those grants appear to place the whole of Southwark within the limits of the corporate authority of the City of London. Practically, however, it is not so. The charter of Edward VI. gave to the City the power to annex Southwark to London. An Act of Common Council was passed soon afterwards, declaring that the borough of Southwark should be constituted a distinct ward of the City, and it was called the ward of Bridge Without. At that time on London Bridge there existed some houses. The charter to which I have referred, having granted to the corporation the government of Southwark, and it having been constituted a distinct ward, common councilmen and aldermen were chosen for a short period for that ward; but in the course of time the practice sank into disuse, and Bridge Ward was confined to the houses at the Bridge foot, as it was called, the corporation of London only recognized the persons who lived at the Bridge foot, on the Southwark side, as members of the Bridge Ward Without. The result was, that when the houses were pulled down, there remained no constituency; the practice of returning common councilmen fell into disuse; and, by virtue of various acts and bye-laws of the City, the senior alderman, for the time being, was made the alderman of the ward of Bridge Without, receiving a certain sum for the onerous duties he performed.

A. Pelling, Esq.

865. What do you suppose to have been the reason why Southwark was never incorporated with the City?—Possibly, like other City questions, a difficulty might have arisen as to the extent of the operation of this charter annexing Southwark to the City of London. Inasmuch as many charters and laws in the City of London previously to that time were confirmed by statute, and differed from the general law, this charter of Edward VI., which was a mere charter from the Crown, would not completely incorporate Southwark within the City franchises, but only make it part of the municipal government for certain purposes.

866. Did the City at any time evince a desire to complete the assimilation by applying for an Act of Parliament?—Never, that I am aware of. There was an application made to them from some of the inhabitants of Southwark in 1836, I think, which was supported by a sort of committee within the borough of Southwark. It was an application to be either connected with the corporation of London, or that the corporation of London would be pleased to abandon all claims upon them, and allow them to obtain a charter for themselves. The City of London maturely considered the question for a long time, but they made no report on the subject.

867. Have you yourself formed any opinion as to the mode in which it would be desirable to deal with this part of the case?—I think the best plan with regard to Southwark, as with regard to all the other metropolitan boroughs, would be to incorporate it separately.

868. Do you apprehend that there would be any great difficulty experienced with regard to property or otherwise, in severing Southwark from the City of London?—No difficulty whatever.

869. The City of London has property connected with Southwark, has it not?—It has landed property in Southwark, but that would not be disturbed any more than the property of private owners. They have also certain franchises, such as the right of holding a court; but I should think, speaking now merely from memory, that the franchises of the City of London within Southwark are not remunerative to the City.

870. If it were thought expedient upon public grounds to sever Southwark from the City of London, do you apprehend there would be any practical difficulties in that course?—I apprehend not.

871. You state that the franchises of the City in Southwark are not remunerative to the corporation: do you think that may have been the reason why there was no great desire in former times on the part of the corporation, to bring Southwark effectually within the limits of the corporation?—I think it was probably the case. The Commissioners will see, that if Southwark had really formed one of the wards of the City, the four or five common councilmen who might have been returned for the ward of Bridge Without, where the inhabitants have no interest in the hereditary revenues of the City of London, would still have a voice in the common council of the City, in voting away those revenues. The City, therefore, would have considerable interest in not allowing the inhabitants of Southwark to participate in the franchises.

872. Two or three centuries ago, Southwark was a much poorer place, in comparison with the City of London, than it is at present, was it not?—Certainly.

873. Do not you think it likely that that was a strong motive to prevent the City taking any effective means for incorporating Southwark within their boundary?—That might have been another reason.

874. Do not you think that is more likely to have been the reason than the legal difficulty which you have pointed out?—Yes. The legal difficulty could have been overcome by an Act of Parliament, and as the City obtained many Acts of Parliament in each session, they might have obtained one for that purpose.

875. Was there ever a period when the common councilmen who represented Southwark were chosen by the inhabitants of Southwark?—Yes; there were common councilmen and an alderman chosen by the inhabitants of the ward of Bridge Without.

876. Will you now proceed to make any statement you may desire to offer to the Commission upon the constitution of the corporation?—The corporation of London is different from any other corporation in this kingdom. It has no governing charter, and no Act of Parliament which really defines what its constitution is. It has no constitutional charter at all. The early charters, and some of the early statutes, simply declare that the citizens of London, as a body, should have all their ancient customs; but there is nothing said about what the citizens were, whether they were a corporation, or in what way they formed a body politic.

877. Did the corporation of the City of London materially differ in this respect from the corporations of other towns in the kingdom?—It did; because the greater number of the corporations which existed before the Municipal Corporation Act, were really created by charter. There are some instances, but they are few, of corporations having existed by prescription. Generally speaking they were either created by charter, or so remodelled by charter that there was a governing charter, declaring what the corporation consisted of. I cannot undertake to say whether there were not instances of corporations without any governing charters at all; but they were very few, if there were any. In the case of the City of London, there are charters which run from William the Conqueror, certainly down to Edward IV., in which the corporation of London, or the body politic, or whatever it is, is described in every variety of way. There is a charter of William the Conqueror, which is to the port reeve and burgesses. The Anglo-Saxon law which preceded it—the law of Athelstan—speaks of the bishops and reeves in London met in their free guilds and confers certain rights. In Magna Charta it is said "the City of London" shall have all its ancient privileges. It is not mentioned as a corporation, but only as "the City of London." Then come a number of charters from Henry I. up to John, in which the words are "citizens of London." One of John's charters calls them "the barons of London." I should mention that the merchants of London had certain Anglo-Saxon privileges; of being raised to the rank of thanes on having made a certain number of voyages. A subsequent charter also speaks of the corporation at large, as "the mayor and commonalty," the title of mayor being used first in the time of Henry III.

878. Is the office spoken of as early as the time of John?—Yes, but it is possible that the title of mayor, which was a French term, might have been merely descriptive of an officer who had existed for a long time before, for instance, the port reeve mentioned in the charter of William the Conqueror might really have been the mayor. In the reign of Henry III. they are mentioned as "the mayor and commonalty," and in some instances as "the mayor and honest men." At the present time the City of London in pleading their privileges call themselves "the mayor and commonalty and citizens of London," they always set up that they are the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London; they plead that they are a corporation which has existed from time immemorial, by several names of incorporation, and that they now are an incorporation by the name of "the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London." This name will appear to the Commissioners to be of more importance, if they will consider the extensive powers of internal legislation which the citizens have.

879. Is there any charter which says there shall be a mayor, aldermen, and common council of the City of London, having certain powers?—There is no charter or Act of Parliament which expressly says so; but there are charters which have conferred upon the corporation powers which can only be exercised by the common council, and powers which can only be exercised by the mayor, aldermen, and common council.

880. There are charters and statutes recognizing those bodies, but none constituting or creating them?—Exactly so. It is always laid down that it is essential to a municipal corporation that it should have a head; the mayor therefore may be considered an integral part of the corporation. Whether the Court of Aldermen is an integral part of the corporation, or whether the various courts in which the affairs of the corporation are now conducted, form integral parts of the corporation of London, may possibly be matters of great legal doubt. I see it is observed by some lawyers, by Mr. Kidd among others, that they do not form an integral part of the corporation of London.

881. To how early a date can you trace the title of alderman?—I am not certain; but I think to the time of Henry II. There are various statutes which give powers to the common council which can only be exercised by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty; therefore it is quite clear that the constitution of the corporation cannot be altered except by an express Act of Parliament, which would repeal the whole of those laws. The constitution of the corporation consisting of the citizens of London assembled in their various courts, having various governors, the lord mayor, and aldermen; there are certain laws which regulate the qualifications of citizens to preside in the several courts. One law, which has been certified to the courts of Westminster, is, that before a person can become a citizen of London he must become free of one of the companies; and, in that respect, the companies have always appeared to me to form integral parts of the corporation of London, inasmuch as a person cannot acquire the rank of citizenship without being a member of one of the companies. The companies, therefore, form legally an integral part of the corporation of London. That custom of the City of London is certified to the Court of Queen's Bench I think in an old case as an immemorial custom; which, as the Commissioners remember, being a custom of the City, is confirmed by Act of Parliament, and which, therefore, cannot be altered without an express Act of Parliament. Such being the state of the law, as I conceive, the common council have undertaken to alter it without resorting to the legislature; and, as far back as 1835, there having been a great dispute between the guilds and the City, the common council came to a resolution (they did not pass an act of common council, but they came to a resolution) that persons might be admitted to be free of the City without being free of one of the companies. That was a mere resolution of the court of common council in the year 1835. I have drawn attention in the book which I wrote on the subject, and in opinions which I have since given to this circumstance, I do not know what the answer to it is, but there appears to be a difference of opinion as to what the effect of that resolution is.

A. Pulling, Esq.

11th Nov. 1853.

882. Is not that specifically mentioned in the first volume of Strange's Reports?—Yes, in 1st Strange, 675.

883. Was the effect of that resolution to repeal a usage which had the strength of an Act of Parliament?—It appears to me to be an attempt to repeal it.

884. If a company had sought to enforce its rights against that resolution, would the resolution have been strong enough to prevail against them?—Clearly not. That was one of the grounds on which the bill, the session before last, was opposed, that the corporation of London had grossly violated their duties towards the livery companies, inasmuch as instead of trying to reform the livery companies and receiving them into the body of the corporation, they were annihilating them by admitting strangers to be members of the corporation.

885. Do not the corporation of London claim a right of repealing, by an act of common council, the charters under which they derive their powers?—I conceive they have no such right. I was going to direct the attention of the Commissioners to that power, which is certainly a most extensive power, and which has not existed in the case of any other body, except the corporation of Norwich, who have claimed it under an ancient charter of Richard II. This power in the City of London to reform themselves is by ancient custom. It is mentioned in the charter of Edward III. as a custom: it is not attempted to be conferred by charter, because it is quite clear that a charter could confer no such right. The custom always alleged in pleading is this: "Where any customs "theretofore used and obtained, proved hard or defective, or any matters newly arising "within the City, needed amendment, and no remedy had been previously provided, to "apply and ordain a convenient remedy, as often as it should seem expedient; so that "the same were agreeable to good faith and reason, for the common advantage of the "citizens and other liege subjects sojourning with them, and useful to king and people." That is the custom that is always set forth in pleading where the custom of London is relied on. It certainly is a most extensive power, and it has been contended that one of the powers of the corporation of London is the power of re-constituting itself in a manner different from any other corporation. As the Commissioners are aware, that peculiarity in the corporation of London is pointed out in the report of the last Commission as one reason why it should be left to the corporation of London to reform itself without a resort to the legislature. Independently of the charters which affect the constitution of the corporation, and of the statutes which affect them, it is possible that those extensive powers of internal legislation may enable the corporation of London to do that which it is the object of this Commission to inquire into. It is possible that the corporation may have that power of internal reform, which belongs also to the legislature, but they have not exercised it, and difficulties no doubt would arise in their exercise of it; for, as I have already observed by a great number of charters and Acts of Parliament, powers are conferred only upon the mayor, aldermen, and common council, in common council assembled, and they are dependent entirely upon the assumption of the duration of the present state of things in the City. Probably that is the reason why, whenever an attempt has been made in the common council to put those powers in force, and carry out measures of reform, it has always been met by that objection on the part of the legal advisers of the corporation. You may have power to remould the corporation; but the corporation, under its new constitution, would be divested of a great number of those valuable powers which the legislature have given to it under its old constitution. We know, before these statutes were in force, this power of internal legislation was extensively exercised. It was only by virtue of an act of common council that the court of common council, as it now exists, was first called into existence: it was the act of the general body of citizens under their ancient right of remoulding their own constitution, which called into existence the court of common council of the City. They assembled at a general meeting or folkmote, and constituted themselves a court.

886. Your meaning is, that the common council, as at present constituted, was created at a general meeting of the citizens?—Yes. The court of common council have very extensive powers indeed; they made a change in the office of alderman before the City Elections Act was passed, by regulating the right to vote at certain elections.

887. Do you conceive that the authority of the common council, with the aldermen sitting in it, is supreme; is there any act within the competency of the corporation which could not be done by the common council?—Certainly not. I am not aware of any act within the power of the corporation of London which could not be performed in common council, except the elections which take place in common hall.

888. No act of legislation or administration?—No act of legislation or administration. The common council are all-powerful for the purposes of the corporation, except in matters which have been taken out of their jurisdiction by Act of Parliament, and in certain elections, and in the exercise of judicial authority. The livery are therefore connected with the corporation; and it appears to me, in the exercise of the power of reconstituting themselves, the corporation have not yet severed the connexion between themselves and the livery. It appears to me accordingly, that the companies of London do form an integral part of the corporation.

889. Does it appear to you that because a person, by belonging to a company, thereby becomes a freeman of the City of London, you can with correctness say, that the company itself is included in the corporation?—Yes; the return in Wannell's case went quite to that extent. The chamberlain returned, to a mandamus to admit an apprentice, that London has time out of mind been a corporation, and consists of several societies, guilds, and fraternities, and freemen of the City, and that no person could be a freeman of the City till he was free of one of those fraternities. That was a return by a high officer of the corporation, showing what at that period was the constitution of the corporation, and that guilds and fraternities formed integral parts of the corporation. If that was the custom, and it appears to me that there can be no doubt it was so, nothing short, at all events, of an act of common council, I should imagine an act of the legislature itself, can destroy the custom.

890. Do you object to the step taken by the common council of admitting freemen not members of some company, because it was illegal or because you think it inexpedient in itself?—I am not prepared to discuss the question of expediency at this moment. As to the illegality of it, I have no doubt at all. It was this question of illegality, as well as the question of expediency, that induced the companies, upon the occasion of the bill being brought in in the year before last, to oppose the corporation of London. Although I had the honour of being engaged for the companies upon that occasion, I have upon other occasions acted also against the companies; and, therefore, I have no personal feeling one way or the other. It was a mere question of law that was raised so far as I was concerned. That consideration seemed to weigh with the committee, and more particularly when witnesses of the corporation of London, who were called to support the preamble of the bill, which declared that it was expedient to reform the corporation, came forward to state that the management of its funds, and all its affairs, was little short of perfection. I must say, I hardly expected that the bill would pass; and, accordingly, we were successful in throwing it out. The witnesses of the corporation thought that the funds were admirably administered; that the constitution of the corporation, as then existing, met with the approval of every one; and that the aldermen and common councilmen, and the officers generally, gave great satisfaction. Upon those grounds, I believe, as well as upon the ground that the livery companies, who opposed, had not received notice, the committee reported against the bill, that the preamble was not proved, and the bill was lost. The object of that bill was to repeal an Act of 1849, which was also a private Act, and an Act of George I., called "The City Elections Act." Those were the only two Acts which were supposed to cripple the common council in the exercise of that internal power of self-reform which they claim, and I suppose rightly claim. The Act of George I. gave the livery companies the exclusive right of election at Guildhall in the choice of chamberlain, of mayor, and of sheriffs; it gave to freemen householders, paying certain rates, the choice in the wards of ward officers, the aldermen, and the common councilmen.

891. Was that distinction first introduced by the Act of George I.?—There were a great many acts of common council upon the point, and there were conflicting byelaws. The corporation was in very considerable confusion when that Act was introduced, and perhaps it got into a worse confusion after it was passed. There were inconveniences with regard to the payment of rates, and so on, under the Act of George I. and the Act of 1849, which was a private Act, got rid of those objections, and gave to householders, who were freemen, the right to vote. Then the City bill, to which I have referred, extended to giving the livery a power of electing in conjunction with the householders, and it gave the householders the monopoly of voting in ward elections.

892. That bill proposed to retain the votes of the livery for certain purposes?—For certain purposes. One of the customs with regard to elections I will refer to. The Court of Aldermen claim a very extensive power over elections. There was a case which came before the Court of Queen's Bench, the case of the Queen v. Johnson, where this custom was set forth. The case went afterwards to the House of Lords—it was "A custom of "London that when the inhabitants of any ward shall three times elect, and return to "the Court of Mayor and Aldermen, the same person to be alderman, who shall be by "the said court, according to another custom of the said City, adjudged on such three "returns not to be a fit person to support the dignity, and discharge the duties of the said "office, the mayor and aldermen may elect, and admit, a fit person, being a freeman, out "of the whole body of citizens, to be alderman of such ward." That was held to be a valid custom. This certainly is a very extensive power in the Court of Aldermen. Upon that occasion it was exercised in regard to Mr. Scales, who aspired to the honour of being an alderman of London. The aldermen had a great objection to Mr. Scales—I heard that he was originally in trade as a butcher—he was objected to as an improper person to be an alderman. The Court of Aldermen, when he had been three times returned, three times objected to him, and then they claimed that he having been returned three times, and rejected three times, they had the right to exercise the franchise themselves; that custom was held good.

893. Did their objection to Mr. Scales proceed upon the ground of his unfitness, or was it in the nature of a veto upon the election on the ground of some irregularity in the conduct of the election?—My impression is that no reasons were given at all; it was a veto by the court; that is, a power on the part of the Court of Aldermen, which appears to me to be highly objectionable. It appears to me to amount to a veto on the part of the corporation upon the acts of the rest; and, considering that the election creates an office for life, it is a very serious matter indeed.

894. Will you now proceed to state what occurs to you upon the order and government of the corporation?—With regard to the order and government of the corporation, I have said already that the mayor is the head of all the courts within the City—independently of the rank and dignity which attaches to his office, he is the head of the corporation—and that is in perfect consonance with the principle of the law of corporations, that corporations should have a head, and that the Lord Mayor, for the time being, should be the president. The Lord Mayor is appointed by virtue of those early charters to which I have referred; but there is nothing said about any qualification for the office of Lord Mayor. The barons of London are to elect de se ipsis. There was some contest whether "barons of London" did not mean aldermen, and therefore whether the aldermen should elect. But that has not been insisted on in modern times, though, indirectly, the same result has been produced. The general body of liverymen assembled at Guildhall having the right to elect, the choice is limited to the aldermen who are next in succession; the recorder gives the names of the two senior aldermen, and in fact the livery elect them, and hardly do anything else. They have the power of rejecting the senior alderman and electing the next; but, generally speaking, the officer of the corporation reads over the names, and they elect the senior. On some occasions, as in the case of Mr. Alderman Harmer, they have made an exception, and also in the case of Mr. Alderman Thomas Wood. But, generally speaking, the livery, although they are very riotous upon the occasion, do nothing more than confirm what has been the understanding for a long period, that the next alderman should be Lord Mayor, so that the electing power is not exercised.

895. In fact the Court of Aldermen present, and the livery institute?—It is not strictly so, for the livery have vindicated their right to go out of the order of seniority; but, practically speaking, that is generally the course of proceeding.

896. Do you conceive that, legally, the power of the livery is limited to the choice of an alderman as Lord Mayor?—The custom certainly has been that none but aldermen shall be elected. It is very difficult offhand to give an answer to the question; but I think doubts may exist whether the livery might not go out of the Court of Aldermen, and choose a gentleman not an alderman.

897. You think they might choose a common councilman?—Yes.

898. Do you think that they might go beyond the common council, and choose anybody else?—I think they might go to the citizens of London.

899. The question is whether a constant practice amounts to a legal and binding usage?—If it is a constant practice, it will amount to a legal and binding usage.

900. Has there been any practice to the contrary?—Not within the time of memory. The custom has been for the Lord Mayor to be an alderman; and there are acts of common council which have settled that he must have been a sheriff. Those are only acts of common council.

901. An act of common council may be repealed, of course?—Yes, it may.

902. Do you think it would be desirable that the choice of the constituent body should be extended, and that they should be able to choose anybody as lord mayor of London who is a citizen of London?—I should be exceedingly glad, personally, to see the time when the most eminent merchant in London, though he had only taken up his freedom the day before, should be eligible to become Lord Mayor of London. I can see no evil which could arise from it, and I think it would be expedient.

903. Do you think that that would have a tendency to diminish the consequence of the office of alderman?—I think it would.

904. Probably you think there would be no harm in that?—I do not see any great evil that would arise from the diminution of the dignity of the office of alderman. The Lord Mayor is a most essential officer in the corporation; he could scarcely be dispensed with; order could not be kept in any way without him. With regard to the aldermen, the same observations do not apply. I do not think that the office of alderman is popular at the present time, nor do I think that many of the powers which they exercise in the municipal government of London are essential to the well-being of the corporation or the good government of the City. I think many of their powers might be taken away; for instance, the aldermen of London are practically elected for life. Questions have been raised, upon the construction of the early statutes, whether still the office of alderman is not an annual one; but this is only an instance of the doubts and difficulties which continually arise in construing what the laws and customs of London are; and, practically, the office of alderman has for many years been considered to be conferred for life. Gentlemen, being elected for life, and not being dependent upon the votes and influence of their constituents, form a separate court in the corporation of London, called the Court of Aldermen. In that court they claim the right to consider all questions which are brought before the Court of Common Council. There is no law which prevents the Court of Common Council from entertaining questions which have not been brought before the Court of Aldermen; but there is a law compelling the officers of the corporation to submit all questions to the Court of Aldermen. Practically, the Court of Aldermen is always held before the Court of Common Council.

905. Practically, no question can be brought before the common council without the assent of the aldermen?—Practically, it is so. It would not be compulsory upon the Court of Common Council to regard the deliberations of the Court of Aldermen; but, inasmuch as it is compulsory upon the officers, it would be at their peril if they disobeyed.

906. It has become the common practice?—It has. The business upon the paper for the Court of Common Council is submitted to the Court of Aldermen the day before.

907. Do you know what the nature of the business transacted by the Court of Aldermen is?—In the first instance, they read over the business which is to be brought before the Court of Common Council the next day. Observations are, no doubt, made upon it; but I presume those observations are more often made when the public are excluded.

908. Is it their practice to sit with open or with closed doors?—With open doors; but they claim the right of excluding the public, and they repeatedly do so.

909. How often does the court sit?—I think about once in a fortnight, or once in three weeks. They always sit before the Court of Common Council. Sometimes they sit only once a month. The Court of Aldermen, also, hold special meetings when they require to exercise their judicial functions.

910. Have they any exclusive power, independently of their right to be apprised of questions which come before the Court of Common Council?—They have the power to order prosecutions. In what I shall say about the Court of Aldermen presently, I shall urge that it appears to me that that is an objectionable power. The Court of Aldermen elect various officers of the corporation—among others, the Recorder, who is the highest officer; and they have the power to order payments of money out of the City purse. They have the power to vote pensions; and instances are given of pensions which have been voted of which I am very incompetent to speak. Some of them appear very proper, and some, perhaps, the contrary. With regard to their power to order prosecutions, I think that power is a great evil. It does not necessarily involve any corruption on the part of the Court of Aldermen, but I think it is a constitutional defect.

911. Do they claim an unlimited power of granting pensions?—I do not know that they do.

912. Without entering into the propriety or impropriety of their grants of money, do you know what the limit of their power of granting money from the City funds may be?—There is a resolution of the Court of Common Council which declares that no sum exceeding a certain amount shall be voted without their consent.

913. Within the limit so fixed by the Court of Common Council, can the Court of Aldermen exercise a discretion as to votes of money?—With regard to votes of money for prosecutions, they can. The Court of Aldermen have rarely granted pensions except for some public reason—one public reason being that the pensioner has been in some way connected with the corporation. Some of them are granted to ladies who are widows of deceased aldermen who have been in difficulties.

914. Suppose a vote of money were taken for promoting a private bill or opposing a private bill in Parliament, would that vote be made by the Court of Aldermen or by the Court of Common Council?—By the Court of Common Council. The remembrancer could only act by petition, and that would come before Parliament under the common seal.

915. The common seal can only be affixed by a vote of the common council?—That is so. Practically the real abuse is in the power to grant money for prosecutions.

916. What inducement have the Court of Aldermen to interfere in respect to the institution of prosecutions?—There is the inducement that the aldermen individually are magistrates of the City of London, and are therefore sometimes exposed to a number of actions. I know in my own professional experience cases have come before me where an alderman has taken a very warm view of a certain matter, and has entangled himself in litigation. Applications have been made to the Court of Queen's Bench, and some expensive proceedings have been taken. With a stroke of his pen he gives an order to the City solicitor to defend or carry on those proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench. The Court of Aldermen, it is said, are the executive who exercise paternal care over the morals of the citizens of London; and therefore when any great crime has been committed, and the parties are too poor to prosecute, the Court of Aldermen are the most efficient body to direct proceedings to be taken.

917. Therefore they discharge the functions of a public prosecutor out of the City funds?—No doubt they do; but I am bound to say this, that although I give great credit to the Court of Aldermen in some instances for taking up prosecutions, the principle is bad, and in the majority of cases I do not think I should be justified in designating the Court of Aldermen as a public prosecutor. They do not take up cases as a public prosecutor would, but they choose their cases, and they sometimes have prosecuted people for political offences where they have taken a violent view in one direction or another.

918. Do you think the influence of the committing magistrate weighs with his colleagues in directing prosecutions?—I think it does in some cases. I have no douht the aldermen who are very frequently thrown together, are very much influenced by one another. I think the system of directing prosecutions in that way is a very objectionable system.

919. Can you state what number of prosecutions has been directed by the Court of Aldermen of late years?—No; I can give the Commissioners no notion.

A. Pulling, Esq.

11th Nov. 1853.

920. Supposing the power of the Court of Aldermen to direct prosecutions were abolished, and persons were left in the City to do as they do in the rest of the metropolis, namely, manage their own prosecutions, upon what fund would the cost of the prosecution fall?—It would first come upon the rates, and then come upon the Home Office.

921. Is there any rate in the nature of a county rate in the City?—They have not had a rate in the nature of a county rate for a long time; but there are consolidated rates.

922. The prosecutor would, in fact, be reimbursed under a different system, would he not?—Not to the same extent.

923 Do they now pay the entire costs?—They take the burthen off the hands of the prosecutor, appointing both attorney and counsel.

924. They do it in the same way that the Government would do it?—Yes; I shall presently suggest, among the remedies I shall propose, that there should be a public prosecutor appointed in every case in the metropolis as well as in the country at large. With respect to the sheriffs, their power within the City is hardly more than ceremonial. They have to return the writs, and so on, but it is hardly more than ceremonial. In the county of Middlesex it is hardly more than ceremonial.

925. Have not they a power with respect to the jury panel?—That is all done by their officers. The jury are returned by the secondaries, who are paid officers of the City of London. They are permanent officers, and have no connexion in any way with the sheriffs. In the county of Middlesex the under sheriffs are permanent officers also. An under sheriff indeed is appointed by each sheriff, who receives certain fees; but they do not practically perform any duties that I am aware of.

926. It has been stated as an abuse that some of the sheriffs' officers make a profit out of the fees received from persons attending trials at the Old Bailey?—I am not acquainted with the fact. I have only heard of it. The Court of Common Council is the great council of the city, and they have extensive legislative powers, which I have referred to. They have entire power over the funds of the corporation, with the single exception of the aldermen voting money, about which there has been considerable dispute. To constitute the Court of Common Council it is necessary that the Lord Mayor or his locum tenens and two aldermen should be present. Disputes have arisen with respect to the number of aldermen required to be present. At one time it was contended that a majority of the aldermen ought to be present at the common council. I have in my hand a book of pamphlets of which one-third is taken up by counsel's opinions upon this moot point. In this legislative power, and the power of voting funds, the Court of Common Council is controlled by the Lord Mayor and aldermen. The Lord Mayor has the power of dissolving the court by taking up the mace. The common council being a very numerous body, when questions of great interest arise, more particularly affecting reform, great confusion has prevailed. There are 250 members, and the court is crowded; a great many gentlemen are sometimes speaking at the same time, and when the business becomes troublesome, the Lord Mayor takes up his mace and decides the question by leaving the court. That is an evil, no doubt, which requires some correction.

927. What is the effect of his taking up his mace; is the court adjourned to the next day, or is it indefinitely adjourned?—It is indefinitely adjourned; the proceedings are at an end, and have to be commenced again.

928. What are the forms necessary for the meeting of the Court of Common Council; by whom is the court summoned?—One of the attorneys of the Mayor's Court is the person who issues the precept. He takes it to the Lord Mayor; but the days for the meeting of the common council are fixed. One of the attorneys of the Lord Mayor's Court obtains the precept; that is given to an officer who knows the directions of all the members of the common council, and he takes the notices round.

929. Is there anything which renders it necessary that the Court of Common Council should meet?—The days for the meeting of the courts of the corporation are fixed in the month of December, and the common council meet upon those days as a matter of course.

930. Are there any votes of money, or any other business, necessary to be transacted, which render it indispensable that the Court of Common Council should be occasionally summoned; would it be in the power of the Lord Mayor to prevent the Court of Common Council meeting at all?—No; if the Lord Mayor were wilfully to abuse his power in that way, I apprehend a mandamus from the Court of Queen's Bench would set him right. There are many powers that the Court of Common Council have. With respect to the power of voting away money, they have the management of all the funds of the corporation of London, the hereditary revenues, the tolls, and the city lands. There are various duties devolving upon them, such as watching bills in Parliament, and duties connected with the port and navigation. There are a great many committees appointed at the different courts of the common council for those purposes, which are nearly always at work. With the exception that the Court of Common Council is liable to be dissolved by the Lord Mayor taking up the mace, and that a certain number of aldermen are necessary to constitute the court; the common council themselves have very unlimited power, and are very free and uncontrolled in the exercise of their discretion. They are a very numerous body. It appears to me that they are much too numerous, and that a smaller number would be very desirable.

931. Does the Lord Mayor take the chair at all meetings of the common council?—He takes the chair at every meeting.

932. Does he act as speaker of the assembly; does he put questions to the vote?—He does.

933. Does he decide points of order?—He does.

934. You stated that the powers of the Court of Common Council were unlimited within the functions of the corporation. Do you conceive, with respect to grants of money, there is any object which might appear to conduce to the general welfare of the City which would not be within their jurisdiction?—I am not aware at this moment of any control over the corporation which the Court of Common Council may not exercise.

935. If any purpose may be conceived which may be considered as coming within the scope of the powers of the corporation of London, do you think that the Court of Common Council could make a grant of money for that purpose?—Yes.

936. If that be the case, must not they have more extensive power over their funds than other corporations enjoy?—They have more extensive power over their funds than other corporations enjoy. The control of corporations generally over their funds by the Municipal Corporations Act is limited.

937. Have they an unlimited power of charging their property?—They have; I know of no limit.

938. You are aware, by the Municipal Corporations Act, that power is limited, and that the consent of the Treasury is required?—Yes.

939. Can they alienate their property?—They can; in fact they have unlimited power over their property.

940. Is there any definition, either by usage or in a charter, of the powers of the common council: supposing a proposal is made for some measure to be adopted by the corporation, and there is a question whether it is within the power of the common council: is there any means of deciding that question?—If it is a mere exercise of corporation powers, I conceive that they would rest upon the customs of the City, which confer an unlimited power upon the common council. There are a great many powers which are derived by statute, which can only be exercised by the Lord Mayor, aldermen and common council.

941. Has any member of the common council the right of making a motion without the previous consent of the Court of Aldermen?—Yes; the Court of Aldermen have no power, as I conceive, to limit the Court of Common Council in bringing forward a motion. The court is quite independent of the Court of Aldermen, only the Court of Aldermen make the officers of the corporation give them notice of the business to be done.

942. What is the nature of the limit which the previous consent of the Court of Aldermen imposes upon the Court of Common Council?—It imposes no limit at all.

943. In practice, any member of the Court of Common Council brings forward any motion he thinks fit?—Having given proper notice.

944. The only effect of the previous deliberation of the Court of Aldermen is, that they form an opinion upon the questions of which notice has been given in the Court of Common Council?—Yes; it is for their own information, and not as controlling the Court of Common Council.

945. They merely deliberate beforehand upon the business which is to be brought forward in the Court of Common Council, exercising no veto upon the questions which are to be brought forward?—Quite so.

946. Will you now make such observations as you may think desirable upon the livery and the common hall?—The livery are the higher class of members of the companies, who have the power of meeting in the common hall, or the general assembly at the Guildhall, for the election of the lord mayor, sheriffs, and chamberlain. The livery is the name which was originally applied to the whole of the citizens of London. It was the garb that the citizens wore; every free citizen had a right to wear this livery. Mention is made of processions of the citizens in their liveries to meet the sovereign. The name appears to have been first used when the statutes of liveries, which prevented noblemen having a great number of retainers, made an exception in favour of the guilds of London wearing their own liveries.

947. These statutes were in Henry VII.'s time, were not they?—I think in the time of Edward IV. there were statutes of livery, and in the time of Richard III. That livery was the particular clothing which designated a citizen. They had particular emblems to represent their particular guilds. In the course of time the hall-motes of the companies were composed of the higher class of citizens, and they only were entitled to wear the livery or clothing of the company. At this time, the livery are not all the members of the companies, but only those who are called upon by the masters and wardens of the companies to take upon themselves the livery. Some of the great companies, the Goldsmiths', the Merchant Tailors', and the more aristocratic companies, who reckon noblemen among their members, have imposed the payment of large sums upon taking up the livery; so much so, that it is very rarely the case that you find an actual working goldsmith who is a member of the Goldsmiths' company, wealthy as the goldsmiths are. Among the Merchant Tailors', I should think there must be very few tailors who are members of the livery. So it is the case with nearly all the companies, that the livery is composed of the more aristocratic part of the body. But among the small companies the livery forms a much more numerous body. The expense of being called to the livery, which in the higher companies is 1,000*l.* and sometimes more, in the smaller companies is reduced almost to nothing, they being desirous of obtaining members for the sake of the small fees which are paid.

th Nov. 1853.

948. Are the livery the governing body of the companies?—The masters and wardens are the governing body, with a small body called the court.

949. Are they usually elected by the livery, or by the freemen generally?—By the livery; practically the freemen have no voice in the affairs of the company.

950. Have they any share in the property?—They are entitled to participate in the charities. The freemen of most of the companies have very little voice in the management.

951. Have all the companies liverymen?—There are some companies without a livery; there are some which exist without a charter from the Crown, which have never been admitted to the freedom of the City. The Watermen's Company is not admitted as a free company; so the Fellowship of Carmen, and the Fellowship of Porters, are not City companies, and there are some companies of a higher class which have not a livery.

952. Are there any other observations which you wish to make, as to the Court of Common Hall?—The Court of Common Hall is now a very numerously attended court, being composed of persons who have been members of livery companies, not only the more wealthy members of the higher companies, but a number of the members of the lower companies who have given up trade, and left London, and who live sometimes at a very great distance from London. They are not easily identified; they come in great crowds to the Guildhall, and they are not regulated by such efficient rules as are necessary to preserve order. They assemble in great numbers, and by means of the confusion which arises, there are also introduced other persons who are not liveryman, who are admitted in consequence of the want of proper regulations to the Guildhall, and very often pass as liverymen, and create the confusion and uproar of which we so continually hear at the City elections. Among the liverymen there are, no doubt, some who never appear near London, belonging to the lower companies. There are some who have been compelled to become free, in order to be fellowship porters or watermen, and having taken up their freedom, they think it just as well to take up their livery. It has been said, upon elections for sheriffs and so on, they do get a sum of money for voting; and also it has been said, in the corrupt times now passed away, they had something for voting for members of Parliament. There were some hundreds who were to be bought in that way. It has always appeared to me that the corporation of London having the power to regulate their corporate assemblies, might have remedied those inconveniences, but they have not done so.

953. Do you think that those inconveniences might have been remedied by an act of common council?—Yes; by proper regulation, I think the Court of Common Council might have done all that the legislature has done; I do not see that there is anything to prevent the votes being taken in a proper manner.

954. Will you proceed to state anything which occurs to you with respect to the officers of the corporation?—It appears to me that the officers of the corporation of London are very numerous. There are among them gentlemen of very great intelligence indeed, and very great worth; but, looking to the position of the corporation of London as regards the rest of the metropolis, forming as it does so small a part of the whole of the metropolis, it appears to me that the City of London is very highly officered.

955, You think the officers have been multiplied without necessity?—It does appear to me that there are an immense number of officers. Respecting the inconveniences which arise from such a number of officers, when we look at the different paving boards, at the boards of sewers, and at the different jurisdictions which prevail throughout the metropolis,—the conflict of power between the different officers is a very serious matter indeed. It is said that throughtout the metropolis there are upwards of one hundred different boards, for local purposes.

956. Are not many of those officers to whom you refer unpaid?—Not any of those to whom I refer. I refer to none but paid officers. The corporation of London, which is the largest of those bodies in the metropolis, has almost for every purpose, and every department of municipal government, four or five classes of officers; for instance, in the legal department they have the Recorder and the Common Serjeant, who are considered to be the counsel of the corporation—the Recorder to record customs, and the Common Serjeant to be their champion in the courts at Westminster. From the duties which have been thrust upon those officers, who now most ably perform them, their ancient and legitimate duties of Recorder and Common Serjeant are practically disused. The Recorder, although a most efficient criminal judge, is never seen in the courts at Westminster except occasionally, as for example, when the Lord Mayor comes in state, or when he has to certify the customs of London. The Recorder, instead of being the counsel acting for the corporation in Westminster Hall, rarely shows his face there—his judicial duties take up the whole of his time. Those judicial duties, I need not say, have been thrust upon him by Act of Parliament, and are unconnected with the municipal government of the corporation of London.

957. Are not the duties of the Recorder of the City of London very analogous to the duties of the Recorders of other towns in the country?—If they are analogous, they so greatly exceed the duties of the Recorder of any other corporation, that there can be no practical resemblance between them. The duties may be the same, but the judicial functions of the Recorder so completely absorb his time, that he has no time for anything else.

958. Has not the Recorder of London the power of certifying the customs of the City orally, and not in writing?—He has.

959. Is not that a peculiar privilege?—It is.

960. Is that a privilege which is convenient in the administration of justice?—I cannot see, although one views a custom of that sort with some veneration, that any great advantage is derived from it.

961. It appears to have been derived from an unlettered age?—It does appear to me to be derived from a time when writing was not generally adopted in our courts, and experienced witnesses were called upon to say upon oath, what they knew of the law and custom of the place, just as I now appear before this board.

962. Practically, now the Recorder forms his opinion of the privileges of the City from books, and he then goes down to Westminster and delivers his opinion orally?—Yes.

963. Would there be an objection to require him to deliver it in writing?—He delivers the record in writing. Practically, the effect is this—when an issue is raised, upon a custom of London, the court in which the issue is raised leave it to the Recorder to certify the custom, and if the Recorder makes up his mind what the custom is, and it is acquiesced in, it is a cheap and expeditious way of deciding a matter, which otherwise could only be tried by a jury. If both parties agree that the Recorder's certificate is a correct one, it is a cheap and expeditious way of determining the question. The Recorder, upon the certiorari being delivered to him, looks into the records of the corporation, and having consulted with the other officers of the corporation, he makes up his mind what return to make, and he then goes through the ceremony in the court at Westminster of returning the customs of London, and handing in his certificate. Of late years, it has been the practice to appear before the Recorder by counsel or by attorney, and argue the question before him. Expenses, of course, are thereby incurred, and some considerable delay takes place. But when the Recorder has delivered his certificate, if there should be a doubt upon the point, and the parties are not satisfied with it, and there are great doubts upon every custom of London, the mode of trial is against the Lord Mayor and aldermen, for a false return to the certiorari; that must be tried by a jury, as in ordinary cases.

964. Has there been any instance of that kind?—I do not know that there has been an instance of it, but I know that it has been laid down in Westminster, that that is the only mode of trying it. The Common Serjeant is also an officer of the corporation; both the Common Serjeant and the Recorder are connected with the corporation, not only as judicial officers at the Old Bailey and in the management of the corporate courts, for the Recorder sits as judge, and the Common Serjeant sits as a sort of master in chancery, but the Common Serjeant is the counsel of the corporation. I believe he has a brief in compensation cases, which are tried before the lord mayor's court. His time, however, as well as that of the Recorder, is taken up in the performance of judicial duties. The old peculiar duties of the Recorder of London and of the Common Serjeant, are almost sunk into disuse, and they are very rarely exercised.

965. The judicial duties of both these officers are conferred by Act of Parliament, are they not?—They are confirmed by Act of Parliament. Those of the Recorder exist by ancient custom, and I think those of the Common Serjeant too. Then there are other judicial officers. To the sheriff's court they have one judge, and they have power to appoint two. The judge of the sheriff's court acts as a commissioner at the Old Bailey. His judicial duties have been prescribed by a recent Act of Parliament—the Small Debts Act, which gives in the City the same power as is given to the judges of the county courts. Then there is the City solicitor, for the common law business, and for the prosecutions of the corporation. There is the Remembrancer, for the parliamentary business of the corporation. There is the Comptroller, for the conveyancing part of the business; therefore, there are three solicitors. Then there is also the town clerk, who is now not a solicitor, who used to be the solicitor of the corporation also; so that there are four gentlemen representing the corporation in a legal capacity as solicitors.

966. What are the duties of the town clerk?—The town clerk attends all the corporate meetings; he has the custody of the records; he has to take care of the whole routine business of the corporation, such as attending the various committees which are incessantly meeting.

967. Does he attend the general Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council?—Yes; and the committees too.

968. He must be the most active officer of the corporation?—Officially he is so.

969. He must follow the whole of the business of the corporation?—He must follow the whole of the court business of the corporation; but he has nothing to do with the management of the property, nor with proceedings in Parliament, nor has he to do with prosecutions, nor with the conveyancing part of the business.

970. What are the duties of the Remembrancer?—He has to watch all the bills that come before Parliament; he has to oppose every bill which is supposed injuriously to affect the corporation of London; and to promote every bill which the corporation of London themselves bring before Parliament. He is in fact the parliamentary agent of the corporation.

971. Is he a barrister?—No; a solicitor.

972. Do other corporations exercise a similar power of constantly watching the proceedings of Parliament by a special officer?—I believe there is no corporation in England which has an officer for the purpose.

973. Would it be a legal application of the funds of a corporation, under the general Municipal Act, to apply them to the promotion of a private bill before Parliament, or in opposition to it?—I think not.

974. Supposing, for instance, a railway were contemplated in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, or Norwich, do you conceive it would be in the power of the corporation of Liverpool or Norwich to apply a portion of their funds to opposing that bill before Parliament?—I should say not.

975. Still, if there were a bill directly affecting any corporation, would it be improper in that corporation to employ its funds in taking a part in opposing that bill?—If it affected the corporation I think it would not.

976. Supposing it affected the property of the corporation, would it be illegal in that corporation to defend what they conceive to be their rights out of their corporate funds?—Certainly not, if it affected the property of the corporation.

977. If the borough were only indirectly affected, for instance, by the construction of a canal, or a road, or a railway in the neighbourhood, do you think it would be a legal application of the funds to oppose such a bill?—I imagine that the corporation would have the power to oppose any bill which they might reasonably suppose to affect themselves or their property. I do not think that parliamentary expenses can be put upon a different footing to legal expenses in defending an action, and undoubtedly they would be at liberty to bring or defend an action.

978. I am supposing the case of proposed new legislation: for instance, supposing there were a project for making a new railway or canal ten or twenty miles from a town which did not touch the property, but indirectly affected the interests of the town: do you think it would be a legal application of the funds of that town, being a borough, to oppose the bill before Parliament?—It must depend upon the question, whether the rights of property of the corporation were involved or not.

979. Will you proceed with your statement in reference to the other officers of the corporation?—There are a great many officers whose names are given in that report. I do not think I ought to take up your time by enumerating them. It appears to me that there are too many officers in the corporation for the management of the mere local affairs of the corporation as it at present exists. I do believe that the officers are many of them extremely efficient persons; and I believe that if their duties were extended over a larger area, they would be very fit persons to fulfil those duties; but for the management of the small area of the City of London I think there is too large a staff of officers.

980. Upon the whole, do you think the corporation of London has appointed incompetent or improper persons to offices of trust?—I have seen great efficiency among the officers of the corporation.

981. Do you think that their patronage has been exercised as well as patronage generally is?—I have no means of my own knowledge of answering that question, and I would rather decline it.

982. Do you believe that the unnecessary multiplication of officers in the City of London has been owing rather to the accidental manner in which their powers have been aggregated, and to the want of system and regularity in the construction of the machinery; or do you think it has been done designedly, with a view of providing places of emolument for persons who may be acceptable to those who confer the appointments?—I think, most decidedly, that any evils which now exist in the official establishment of the corporation have arisen from the want of system in legislating for altered circumstances, and not from any corruption on the part of the corporation, or any wish to multiply the number of officers.

983. You mean that the whole system is too complicated, and consequently requires a greater number of persons to conduct it than would be necessary if proper simplification were introduced into it?—I think so.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

J. R. Mills, Esq.
15th Nov. 1853.

JOHN REMINGTON MILLS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

984. What connexion have you had with the City of London?—I have been a freeman and a liveryman since 1822.

985. Do you live in the City?—No. I reside now, and have for the last five years, at Englefield Green, in Surrey.

986. Before that did you reside in the City?—I only lived there a few months, and I carried on business in Milk Street, Cheapside, for twenty-one years.

987. What was the nature of your business?—Silk manufacturer.

J. R. Mills, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

988. Are there any points with regard to the corporation of London which you are desirous of making any observations upon?—I only wish to call your attention to the manner in which the corporation of London abuses the privileges of electing the sheriffs of London and Middlesex by the livery.

989. Will you proceed to state anything that you wish to offer to us upon that head?—I perhaps may be allowed to state that I retired from business in the City of London altogether in the year 1840, still being a liveryman, and entitled to vote at elections of members of Parliament, because I resided at Stamford Hill, within seven miles; and while I resided at Stamford Hill I received notice from Mr. Beddome, the town crier and serjeant-at-arms, that the Lord Mayor, Alderman Gibbs, in the year 1845 had nominated me to be sheriff. The practice I understood to be, that the Lord Mayor nominates a certain number of persons every year for that purpose, and they are put upon a list. That was done entirely without my knowledge and without my consent; it was his own spontaneous act, without any communication with me; but I did not take any notice of it; I did not pay the fine to which I might then have been liable, 400*l.*, because I considered there were always gentlemen, aldermen or others, who were seeking civic offices, and would be willing to serve the shrievalty. However, in March 1848, I removed entirely from Middlesex to Englefield Green, Surrey. I lost there the right of voting for members of Parliament. I think I am justified in saying that by the practice of the privy council in the case of sheriffs, no gentleman, even if he is qualified by property, is required to serve the office of sheriff in a county in which he is not resident.

990. That is not universally so; and when you speak of the privy council having to do with it, which is a notion very generally entertained, that is not correct, but it is done by a special council, under a special Act of Parliament?—I only stated that as an opinion; but however, in June 1848, I received information from Mr. Beddome that I had been elected sheriff. Perhaps you will just allow me to read an extract from the Times refering to this election in 1848. It is a report of the transaction of that day:—"On Saturday, a common hall was held for the election of sheriffs. The assemblage of liverymen was unusually small, the office of shrievalty having stirred up no man's ambition in the present excited and unpromising times. On the contrary, all applications to gentlemen to serve have, it is said, failed; and the two who were elected will, according to the general opinion, rather submit to the severe penalties annexed to a refusal, than enter upon the duties of the office." "Deputy Selson stood forward for the purpose of requesting that the meeting would not call upon Alderman Finnis to serve until next year, on account of the recent election of that gentleman to the office of alderman. The livery very readily excused Alderman Finnis and Alderman Lawrence upon the ground of their late appointment to the magistracy of the City of London. There were several names of high commercial eminence then put up; but as if by previous arrangement, scarcely a hand was held up until the names of Mr. C. P. Bousfield, citizen and weaver, and Mr. J. R. Mills, citizen and fishmonger, were raised upon the board; and then every one raised his hand and his voice too, and the two unconscious citizens were elected amidst loud applause and laughter." Now, as that statement supposes, I had nothing to do with it. It was quite independent of me and quite unknown to me, and it clearly shows, I think, that there had been some previous contrivance as to the parties who should be so elected. I should say that by an act of the common council which I have in my hand, the aldermen are required to be put up first.

991. Was your colleague an unwilling recipient of this honour as well as yourself?—Equally so, and he also paid the fine. This is the act of the common council in the year 1748, which says, "That every alderman of the City who shall not have actually served the same office," that is, the office of sheriff, "shall, according to his seniority in the said Court of Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and before any commoner of this City, be publicly put in nomination for the said office." That shows that the intention was that the aldermen should be first put in nomination.

992. But nomination is one thing, and election is another?—Yes; it does not require that the livery should elect an alderman; but it says, that an alderman shall always be put up first, evidently with the intention that he shall serve if elected. Certainly, a gentleman who undertakes the office of alderman, must know that the shrievalty is indispensable to his being Lord Mayor, for he cannot be Lord Mayor till he has served the shrievalty. Now, I maintain that that being the enactment by the act of common council, it was not competent to those aldermen to say, "It is not convenient to me to serve, and you go and choose somebody else;" but that having been chosen alderman, with that act of the common council in force, he ought to have submitted to the requirements of that act of the common council.

993. Do you mean that what was done was illegal, or that it was improper and inexpedient?—I mean to say the aldermen ought not to have applied to be excused because they were elected aldermen under this act of the common council in force placing them in that position, and requiring them to be nominated first to the livery. They were so nominated, and excused themselves. But what I particularly call your attention to is this,—that after Mr. Bousfield and myself had refused to give bond to serve the office, other parties were elected, who did the same, and paid the fines; and the parties who actually served were Alderman Finnis, (who was on the list before me, and ought to have been elected instead of me,) and Mr. Goodhart; those two were elected, and served as sheriffs. So that if Alderman Finnis had been elected, instead of me, I should have escaped the fine. I think that the report in the Times newspaper shows that there must have been some contrivance used to induce the livery to pass by that gentleman and to elect me.

994. Supposing there were no system of fines imposed upon those who refused to serve the office of sheriff, do you believe that competent persons would be readily found to serve that office?—It is evident, from a paper I shall lay before you, that they have had no difficulty for several years in finding competent persons.

995. Do you think that those competent persons were at all induced by the fear of the fine to serve the office, or that there were other motives that would have induced them to serve the office of sheriff, if there had been no apprehension of fine?—Undoubtedly there are always persons—at least, there always have been between the years 1829 and 1848, with two exceptions—persons anxious to serve civic offices; and the introduction to civic offices in London is, in many instances, by means of the shrievalty. You will find that several persons who have held civic offices received their introduction to the City through the shrievalty. They began with that. They were then introduced to the Court of Aldermen. They went about and dined at the different companies, and so became known to the citizens; and when an alderman's gown became vacant, they were brought forward and invited to take it. Therefore all persons looking up for the higher offices in the City are willing to begin with the shrievalty, which is an indispensable office if they ever obtain the highest civic offices; and, consequently, many take the shrievalty, in the first instance, as an introduction to the other, instead of having it imposed upon them afterwards.

996. What do you believe to be the great objection on the part of those who refuse to serve the office which induces them rather to pay the fine?—Because of the disturbance to their domestic comfort, and the nuisances connected with it.

997. Do you think it is to be ascribed to the circumstances which you have just mentioned, or is it not rather the expense attendant upon the office which forms the objection?—Of course they look at the expense attending it; but I believe the great inducement to parties to pay the fine is to get rid of all connexion with the City, and of all the trouble of it.

998. Is not the fine paid for non-service of the office less than the ordinary expense of the office?—That I am not competent to say, because, not having served the office, I do not know what the ordinary expense is.

999. Did you make no inquiry as to what the probable expense would be?—I never made any inquiry, because my removal to my present residence was on account of Mrs. Mills' health. My medical man said, "Mrs. Mills cannot live at Stamford Hill; you must take her to a dry soil and to better air;" and that was the reason of my leaving London. It was not with me a question of expense, but it was a question of Mrs. Mills' health, which absolutely required me to live at a distance from London, and therefore I could not be there in the evening. Though I cannot fully develop the plan which has been adopted, I can state generally the system which has been carried on. Parties who wished to be under-sheriff, and to get the emoluments of the under-shrievalty, have had an object in inducing their friends to become sheriff, in order that they might get the under-shrievalty. And if you choose to call for a return of the parties who have served the office of under-sheriff for the last twenty or thirty years, you will find the same names occurring very frequently. It has been the policy of a gentleman in the City, a solicitor wishing to get into practice, to get the appointment of under-sheriff, by inducing one of his own friends to serve the shrievalty, paying also some portion of the sheriff's expenses.

1000. Do you believe that there has been a practice of making appointments of sheriffs, not with the bonâ fide intention of their serving, but for the purpose of inducing the persons so elected to pay the fine?—I think a return which the House of Commons ordered, and which I hold in my hand, proves that distinctly. If you will take the trouble to look over it, you will find that in 1804 thirteen gentlemen were fined.

1001. But, coming down to a later period, do you believe that that has recently been the practice?—No; I think that in modern times they have found persons willing to serve the shrievalty for the sake of some ulterior object.

1002. Do you think that the practice of which you have spoken has diminished?—Yes, it has diminished in the twenty years previous to 1848; but they have revived it again to some extent lately.

1003. I understand you to say that, of late years, persons have not been nominated by the Lord Mayors for the shrievalty for the sake of getting money from them by their refusing to serve?—I think there have been parties desirous to be under-sheriffs who have induced their friends to stand forward to be sheriffs; so that there has been no opportunity of putting forward other persons, because those who were willing to serve have made every effort to induce a sufficient attendance of the livery to vote in their favour. The list of nominees provided by the Lord Mayor is not exclusive. Any liveryman at a common hall for electing sheriff may propose any liveryman he pleases.

1004. But before those persons who were willing to serve were nominated, might they not have nominated half-a-dozen others who they knew were not willing to serve, for the sake of getting the fines from them?—That might have been done; but the parties who wanted to be sheriffs employed corrupt means to secure their election. There are persons called "longshore-men," men connected with the wharfs and the river, who are very well known in the City elections to be persons open to corruption. If you wanted to be sheriff, or to obtain any City office elected to by the livery, you would put yourself in communication with the agent of those parties, and, for some previously agreed pecuniary inducement, he would bring up two or three hundred of those people to the Guildhall who would be sure to carry the election.

1005. The question is this—whether, if there was an intention on the part of the City now to use the election of sheriffs for extortionate purposes, it would not be possible, notwithstanding the arrangement with regard to the under-sheriffs which you have mentioned, to put up persons with regard to whom it was known beforehand that they would refuse to take the office, and afterwards to elect persons who were willing to serve?—I have no doubt that that may have been done, because they have generally two or three aldermen in reserve; so that at any time, when they find it difficult to fill up the office from the list of persons nominated, they have only to recur to the aldermen whom they can require to serve.

1006. But you were understood to state that the practice of having malâ fide elections of sheriffs, for the purpose of exacting fines, has been disused?—It was disused up to 1848. Since that it has been renewed; and a friend of mine, Mr. Peto, the member for Norwich, was nominated and actually elected without his concurrence, and other gentlemen also.

1007. Did he pay the fine?—No; he pleaded privilege of Parliament, and they were very sorry to be obliged to forego the fine.

1008. What was the date of that election?—1849 or 1850, I believe. If you had this return, which was made to the House of Commons, continued, and you were pleased to order also a list of the under-sheriffs for the same period, you would see that the under-sheriffs have been playing into their own hands, being very often the same persons for two or three years, or for alternate years, just as circumstances favoured such arrangement. If you look at this return, you will find that in the years 1814 and 1815 the fines amounted to 16,000*l.*; and it has been often said that that money was wanted to pay the expense of the entertainments to George IV., the Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia, after the peace. As to that I cannot say more than common report. I should also call your attention to that part of the act of common council which authorizes the parties serving the shrievalty, after persons have paid the fine, to receive 100*l.* out of that fine; so that Alderman Finnis, by playing his cards in the way that he did, was entitled to 100*l.* out of my fine towards his own expenses.

1009. Does that 100*l.* appear in the return?—No; it does not, because the return stops in 1848, and he would not get it till after his term of office, ending Michaelmas, 1849. This fact appears in the return as to previous sheriffs.

1010. Does this return show the gross sums paid, or does it show the sums after the deductions?—It shows the whole sum, and the deductions also. The gross sum is 66,000*l.* in half a century, or 64,000*l.* in thirty years, to 1829 inclusive. My father paid the fine for not serving in 1813. My brother was nominated, but after being on the list for five years, his name was struck off and he was not elected, happily for himself

1011. Some of the payments appear to be 413*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and some 613*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* What is the reason of the difference?—The reason is, that the parties who pay the fine immediately after they are nominated are charged only 400*l.*, but if they are elected it is 600*l.*

1012. Is there any other point to which you desire to call the attention of the Commissioners?—I have nothing particular to say upon any other point, except just to call your attention to the fact, that in the return as made to the House of Commons, they were required to insert the residences of the parties who were so nominated and elected, because that would have shown that they chose persons residing at a distance from London, in order that they might get the fine. The note to that is by the chamberlain. He gives this answer: "There is not any record in the chamberlain's books of the addresses of the parties having made the above payments." Now, that may be quite true, but yet it is quite evasive, because the practice is, when any party is nominated by the Lord Mayor, for the town crier to wait upon him personally; and therefore in some one of the offices of the City there must be a record of the addresses of the parties. The town crier came to me; his expenses of course are paid by the corporation, and therefore, though the chamberlain's office did not contain the addresses of the parties, yet they must be in some one of the offices of the City, and of course in making the return they could have supplied that part of the order if they had chosen.

1013. Do you think that if a gentleman resident in Northumberland were elected, the officer of the City would go to Northumberland to inform him of his election?—Yes. He came to me at Englefield Green to communicate to me that I was elected. It is part of his business. I knew a case of a relation of mine in Oxfordshire, to whom he went for the same purpose. That was a very singular case; that was the case of Mr. William Wilson, who was a freeman of the City and a liveryman of the Weavers' Company, but not a liveryman of the City, because the Weavers' Company is an older corporation than the City corporation. They nominated him for sheriff, and the town crier went down to inform him of the fact, and he told the town crier that he had had his journey for nothing; for he was not eligible, as he was not a liveryman of the City. So that the town crier's office could certainly furnish the addresses if necessary.

J. R. Mills, Esq.

15th Nov 1853.

1014. What is the object of sending the town crier to deliver the notice in person?—I suppose it is preparatory to an action against the parties if they refused to pay the fine.

1015. In order to be able to prove personal service?—I suppose so. I do not know of any other reason. There is another point to which I wish to call your attention, and that is the appropriation of the fines. Up to the year 1830 they were paid over to the general funds of the City to be applied to the general expenditure. But it seems from note E to the before-mentioned return, "That on the 10th of December 1830, the Court of Common Council resolved that in future all fines to be recovered or received from persons nominated or chosen to fill the office of sheriff, after payment thereout to the next sheriffs of the sum to which they might become entitled, should form a fund in the hands of the chamberlain, to accumulate at interest, and to be applicable from time to time under the orders and directions of the said court, in aid of objects of public improvement and utility, or of a charitable nature, within the City of London." Now, this always seemed to me to be trying to put a plausible face upon the extortion which they practised, by saying that it was for purposes of public improvements and charity. But so little concerned were they about it, that they received the fine of Sir Charles Price in 1835, and they had not appropriated that fine to any charitable purpose, or to any purpose whatever, till this return was moved for in 1848. It was in the interim between the order being served upon them to make the return and the making of the return, that they had invested the money, as appears upon the face of note E.

1016. Do you understand that a fund, such as is directed in the ordinance of the common council, has been created, or that no such fund has been formed?—I believe it has been subsequently created, as they state, and that these funds were transferred to a separate account for the establishment of a proposed school for the maintenance and education of necessitous orphans of freemen of London, and that they have now established such school at Brixton.

1017. You state that some of the fines have not been carried immediately to the funds?—That appears from their own return, which shows that the fine paid by Sir Charles Price in 1835, was not carried to that fund till 1848, after the order for making the return was issued.

1018. Is that the only instance in which the fine was not carried to the fund?—Yes; but there was only one other fine that they have received within the period.

1019. Is there any other point connected with the corporation that you wish to state?—I hope that if the livery are to continue to exercise their franchise, as to electing sheriffs, there will be some appeal established by which parties who have a right to relief, may obtain it on appeal to one of the chiefs of the law courts, either the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, or the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, or the Chief Baron, so that by an appeal to them the parties might have the same relief which they would have before the Privy Council. It appears to me monstrously unjust that there should be no power of appealing for relief. Besides, I think that if a person is to lose his parliamentary elective franchise by removing seven miles from the City of London, he ought to be exempted from the disagreeable duties in which he might otherwise be involved, and that they ought to be restricted to persons who live within a certain distance of London, seven miles for instance.

1020. But this is a question relating to municipal franchise?—I put the two conjointly. If a person may not exercise the parliamentary franchise because he resides seven miles from the City of London, I think he ought to be exempted from the onerous duties of such citizenship.

1021. Then you would be of opinion that a liveryman who resides more than seven miles from the City of London should have no voice in the affairs of the City?—He has not now.

1022. He has not, with regard to parliamentary elections, but has not he with regard to municipal elections?—The only municipal elections are of the lord mayor and the sheriffs.

1023. And the chamberlain?—Yes.

1024. You are of opinion that all charges and obligations, whatever they are, should go hand in hand with the privileges?—Certainly.

1025. You would relieve a citizen who resides more than seven miles from the metropolis of the obligation of bearing those charges, and you would also deprive him of those privileges?—Certainly; the liverymen in independent circumstances would be very willing to give them up. In the case of liverymen in needy circumstances these privileges have been abused to purposes of corruption, at the expense of candidates for the offices to which the livery have the power of election.

1026. Prior to the Reform Act, was it necessary that a liveryman, in order to vote for members of Parliament for the City, should be resident within a certain distance of the City?—No.

1027. Then the Reform Act operated to cut down the right of the liverymen in that respect?—Certainly, it restricted it.

1028. Leaving the municipal elections as they were before?—Yes, and leaving the burthen of the offices as it was before.

A., There is not any record in the Chamberlain's Books of the addresses of parties having made the above payments.

(B.) In virtue of an Act of Common Council, passed 7th April 1748, in each year wherein two or more persons nominated by the Lord Mayor to the Sheriffalty shall, previous to the 24th June, in any year in which they shall be so nominated, pay to the Chamberlain the sum of 400*l.*, to be exempted and discharged from such nomination, and from serving the office in future, the Chamberlain is, out of the monies so paid to him, to pay to each of the two persons who shall in that year take upon them the office, the sum of 100*l.*, and in the years wherein any one person so nominated shall make that payment, the sum of 50*l.*

(C.) Under Act last quoted, the sum of 20 marks (13*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*) is payable out of each fine paid to be discharged from nomination, towards the maintenance of the Ministers of the several prisons within the City. The Ministers receive larger amounts annually, from which there is not any deduction made when there are not any fines received.

(D.) By orders of the Court of Common Council, fines or parts of fines have been, in some instances, returned to parties, in consequence of heir subsequently serving the office, or for other reasons.

(E.) On the 10th December 1830, the Court of Common Council resolved, that in future all fines to be recovered or received from persons nominated or chosen to fill the office of Sheriff of the City of London and County of Middlesex, after payment thereout to the next Sheriffs of the sums to which they might become entitled under the Act of Court of Common Council before referred to, should form a fund in the hands of the Chamberlain, to accumulate at interest, to be applicable from time to time, under the orders and directions of the said Court, in aid of objects of public improvement and utility, or of a charitable nature, within the City of London. Under the authority of such Resolution, the sum of 400*l.*, portion of the 413*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* received from Thomas Tegg, Esq., in the year 1836, was, by order of a Court of Common Council, held 6th August 1838, invested in the Public Funds, the interest thereof to be, and the same has been, from time to time, applied as an exhibition to a Scholar proceeding from the City of London School to one of the Universities. The said sum of 400*l.* was applied in the purchase of 423*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* 3*l.* per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities; and by order of the Coal and Corn and Finance Committee, dated this 6th day of this instant June, made under an authority given to them by the Court of Common Council on the 26th day of May last, and in reference to the said Resolution of the 10th December 1830, the sum of 300*l.*, being the balance of the sum of 400*l.* paid in 1835 by Sir Charles Price, Bart., and the sum of 1,200*l.*, being the amount of the fines paid by Charles Prichett Bousfield, Esq., and John Remington Mills, Esq., who were, on the 24th day of June 1848, elected to serve the office of Sheriff of the City of London and Sheriff of the County of Middlesex, together with interest on the same sums from the days of payment thereof respectively, have been transferred to a separate account for the establishment of a proposed School for the maintenance and education of necessitous Orphans of Freemen of London.

Chamber of London, 12th June 1849. A. Brown, Chamberlain.

A Return of all the Monies paid to the Chamberlain of the City of London, by persons nominated or elected Sheriff of London and Middlesex, from the 1st January 1848 to the present time, stating the amount received in each Year, and the purposes to which the Money was applied.

JOHN DISTIN POWLES, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows :— J. D. Powles, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1029. You are a merchant in the City of London ?—I am.

1030. What is the nature of the trade in which you are chiefly engaged ?—Chiefly the South American trade.

1031. You are a general merchant ?—Yes ; chiefly in the South American trade.

1032. Are you not also deputy chairman of the London Dock Company ?—Secretary.

1033. How long have you held that office ?—Sixteen years.

1034. Are there any points with regard to the manner in which the commercial interests of the City are affected by the corporation, to which you desire to call the attention of the Commissioners ?—The chief point in which the corporation exercises an influence on the commercial interests of the City of London is the case of the navigation of the river, which is entirely entrusted to them. I do not mean to make any complaint against the way in which the river has been cared for and kept in order by them ; but when I look to the constitution of the body under which that charge is placed, being a navigation committee of no less than forty persons, on going through their names I find that they consist of persons whose previous pursuits in life give them no qualification whatever for the discharge of their duties as members of the navigation committee. I have lately had occasion, within the last three or four months, with one or two other gentlemen, to attend that committee on matters of business, and on looking round the room it was impossible, with all due respect for those gentlemen, not to see that they had no qualifications whatever for the duties they had to discharge. But they have a good harbour master, and therefore the business is well done. Now, many years ago the corporation itself brought a bill into the House of Commons for regulating or improving, in some way, the conservancy of the river. It was proposed in the House of Commons that a clause should be inserted in the bill that the Trinity House, and each of the great dock companies, should appoint a member on that navigation committee. As soon as that clause was propounded in the House the corporation withdrew the bill. I think that in that they showed an exceedingly unwise and narrow policy, because, in the first place, there is no emolument attaching to the performance of those duties ; and, in the next place, the body could not but be improved by introducing into it intelligent men who would be put there, either by the Trinity House or by the dock companies.

1035. Is there any patronage attached to those offices, though there is no emolument ? —Undoubtedly ; the appointment of harbour master, and there may be other persons under him.

1036. Do you imagine the patronage to be considerable or not ?—I dare say not ; the harbour master's is a good appointment, I believe ; probably 500*l.* or 600*l.* a year. I have not a word to say against the manner in which that duty is done ; but one can easily imagine that, if the committee consisted of much fewer individuals,—if, instead of being a body of forty, it was a body of eighteen and if it had about six common councilmen, and the rest were elected by such bodies as the Trinity House and the dock companies, —you would have an efficient committee.

1037. Does that committee now consist exclusively of members of the common council ? —Precisely ; that is the defect in all corporation matters, that unless we, the merchants, can take upon ourselves municipal offices, which we have not time to do, we are wholly excluded ; so that at this moment, with the exception of my friend Mr. Alderman Thompson, there is not, I believe, a merchant in the whole body.

1038. Is Mr. Alderman Thompson a member of the navigation committee ?—I believe he is not. I believe none of the aldermen are members ; but the body is so constructed as to exclude mercantile men.

1039. Speaking generally of the mercantile interests of London, as distinguished from the retail trading interests, are they represented in the corporation ?—In no manner whatever. Certainly not.

1040. What are the powers over the navigation of the river which the corporation of the City exercise ?—They have the entire regulation of the mooring of ships, and the manner in which the channel shall be kept clear for the passage of the commerce of the port ; and, in short, everything appertaining to the river is entirely under them.

1041. Does that extend over the whole of the port of London ?—I believe so ; I am not aware of any exception.

1042. Have they any jurisdiction in the docks ?—No ; the truth is, there is nothing for them to do there. We have never come into collision with them in the slightest way. I am bound to say that, for I asked the principal dock master of the London Docks when I was requested to attend here if he had any complaint to make. He said, "I have no complaint whatever to make ; their harbour master and myself have always understood one another, and I have no complaint." But I am speaking of the constitution of the body, which I consider to be very imperfect, and which might usefully be mended.

1043. You say that practically you have not experienced any inconvenience from this state of things ; but that you think it theoretically objectionable ?—They have a good harbour master, but I do not think they have themselves the qualifications to enable them to judge whether he is so or not. In fact, the whole thing is in the hands of the harbour master.

J. D. Powles, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1044. It appears that there are four harbour masters, the chief of whom has a salary of 500*l.* a year; the second 400*l.*; the third 350*l.*; and the fourth 300*l.* a year; all those salaries are charged upon the tonnage duty fund. What is the amount of the fund?—It is one of the corporation dues.

1045. By whom are those harbour masters appointed?—By the common council; by what is called the navigation committee.

1046. Do you know whether in general they are persons competent to discharge that duty?—I have not a word to say against them. The harbour masters are good.

1047. Does the duty of removing shoals or obstructions in the river, devolve upon this navigation committee?—I have no doubt that if there were any inconvenience complained of, they would direct their harbour master to report to them.

1048. Have you heard of any complaints of inefficient discharge of their duty on the part of the navigation committee?—None whatever; I have no complaint to make against them at all.

1049. Your proposal is to make a compound committee, partly of members of the common council and partly of persons connected with the Trinity House, and other public bodies representing the navigation. You would not take the power entirely out of the hands of the common council, and create some new superintending authority?—I would not take the power out of the hands of the corporation, but I would make it compulsory upon them to admit into that body, persons elected by such commercial bodies as I have indicated; so that, whether we may or may not be members of the common council, we may be represented there. Then the difficulty would be got over of mercantile men not being able to attend to municipal affairs because they might be called into action in cases where they can be of no use.

1050. Do you believe that the mercantile members of the committee being few in number, would have sufficient influence over the non-mercantile members to produce a good administration?—I think the number ought to be so arranged, that they should not be out-voted; but I see no reason to expect that they would not have proper influence in that body, because I am not aware of the slightest improper intention on the part of the body of the common council.

1051. You believe that the men appointed to the post of harbour master have been for the most part, fit men?—Quite so.

1052. Do you think that the amendment proposed to be made in the Act of Parliament to which you have referred, would meet the wants of the case?—Yes, not introducing half-a-dozen men among forty, but I would reduce the navigation committee to eighteen.

1053. Was that part of the amendment proposed in that Act?—The Act did not go to that point; it simply required that the corporation should admit into its committee, whatever the number might be, certain persons nominated by the Trinity House and other bodies. I dare say that persons more conversant with their affairs than I am, will tell you that the notion of 250 common councilmen is altogether out of the question for a working body.

1054. Have you observed whether there is any jealousy of the large mercantile interests of the City on the part of the corporation generally, or the common council in particular?—No; I am not aware of any such feeling. I believe the reason why there are not more merchants amongst them is simply, in the first place, that merchants no longer reside in the City, and therefore their sympathy with the City is more or less diminished; but above all that, the merchants have not time to attend to municipal affairs.

1055. Then to what motive do you attribute the withdrawal of the Bill which you have mentioned on account of the amendment being proposed in it?—The desire on the part of the corporation always has been to retain every privilege and every custom of every kind. They would not allow it to be made compulsory to elect anybody else than common councilmen. Now with respect to the porterage and fellowship dues which are a grievance, they had their origin in a state of times very different from that in which we live. Perhaps there can hardly be a greater absurdity presented to view than this, that a brewer buying his barley down in Norfolk, having it there converted into malt, and then bringing it to his own granary in London, shall be called upon to have it remeasured, it being his own property, which he has no need to re-measure, simply for the purpose of paying dues to the corporation of London.

1056. Do you conceive that the right of metage which was granted to the City of London, was granted to them for the convenience of the public or for their own profit?—I dare say for both.

1057. In the case to which you refer, is not it merely used for the profit of the City; because the wharfinger, says "It is no convenience to me in this instance to have my goods measured, because I know their contents"?—Certainly.

1058. But there might be cases in which it would be convenient to have them measured?—Yes; if they are required to be measured, there is no obligation to it; but to force upon a party an operation which he does not require is unreasonable.

1059. Are you at all acquainted with the operation of the privilege of the City with respect to porterage and metage?—Only that there are certain things which cannot be done, except by certain porters. There are vintner porters for wines, and other porters for corn and other customs of that kind, by which you are required to submit paying more to those persons than to other persons.

1060. Is it done at the London Docks?—No, we are not interfered with at the docks.

1061. The privilege of the City with regard to porterage and metage is not exercised at the docks?—That kind of business is not much done there.

1063. Do you happen to know what is the difference between the charge made by the fellowship porters for unloading and meting a cargo of corn in the docks, and the charge made by ordinary porters?—No, I am not prepared to state that. I understand from persons in the trade that they pay more. It is quite natural that privileged persons should require to be paid more.

1064. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—There is only one thing which might be suggested wherein the corporation might be made useful to the commercial interests of the City. There has long been the want felt of a chamber of commerce in the City of London. I do not mean a tribunal of commerce, which is a law court, but a simple chamber of commerce; so that when persons met with any difficulties in the course of their business, from some custom which is maintained on the part of the City authorities, or from the operation of some law which bears hardly on individuals, or any other grievance of a public nature, they should have a body to go to, who would look into it, and make such representations to the Government, or to any other parties as might be needful, in order to have that particular grievance redressed. That has been talked of I do not know how many times, and many times I have been asked to join in some measure for the purpose; but I have always declined doing so, being quite satisfied that such a thing if got up by private individuals, would go on very well for two or three years, and then would sink for want of subscriptions. Now, here you have all the organization that is wanted. You have a corporation with clerks, offices and funds, and if on the committee of this chamber of commerce there were some half dozen common councilmen, or aldermen fairly representing the City, and about twelve other persons elected from the Bank, the East India and China Association, the West India Association, the Russia Company, and other commercial bodies of that kind, you would have a very effective chamber of commerce, which I believe would be exceedingly useful to the commercial interests, and I should say very important in a national point of view.

1065. Where would be the advantage of connecting such a chamber of commerce with the corporation of London?—The question has been put: how can this corporation, which receives large revenues, be made serviceable to the mercantile body. Some of us have said, "Give us by this means a chamber of commerce. Inasmuch as they take care of various other subjects which are committed to their charge, why should not the interests of this great commercial city be also made part of their care in a way which we can point out so as to be practically useful."

1066. You consider that that would be a mode of utilizing the large revenues of the City?—Certainly. For the purposes of commerce, such a chamber as that, with an efficient and well-paid secretary, would be of very great use to individuals. I have no doubt that by means of such a body, representations would be made to the Government where any inconvenience was suffered in a commercial point of view, and that they would be ready to attend to it. I have no doubt, for instance, that the mass of grievances which have occurred with respect to the Customs, of which we have heard so much during the last two or three years, would never have accumulated to the point to which they did, if there had been such a body in existence; for whenever any man felt that he had a real grievance, he would represent it to the chamber of commerce, saying, "I have met with such an obstruction," and they would look into it in a cool and calm manner, and say, "This is a thing to be remedied," and they would write to the Board of Trade, or whatever the authority might be, and say, "This is a matter deserving of inquiry;" whereas now, when a man meets with a difficulty, he gets out of it as well as he can; but he will not devote time enough to get the cause of the grievance removed, or follow it up with the perseverance often required in Government matters to get a grievance remedied, and so he leaves the pit open for his neighbour to fall into the next month.

1067. Would you propose to give any legal functions to the chamber of commerce beyond that of making representations to the Government?—Not the slightest. It should be simply a representative body.

1068. You would not make it a tribunal in any sense of the word?—Not the slightest, but simply a chamber through which the mercantile body could make communications to the departments of the Government and other public bodies.

1069. Is it your belief that the Bank and the other great bodies to which you have referred, would be willing to unite with a committee of the common council, or any other portion of the municipal body, in order to form a chamber of commerce?—I think that if such a chamber were organized, consisting of the number of eighteen, and you allowed the corporation six members, you would find that each of those other public bodies would most willingly elect members for a chamber.

J. D. Powles, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1070. You believe that there would be no unwillingness on their part to combine with the corporation for that useful purpose?—Not the slightest.

1071. Do you think that it would in any way tend to induce mercantile men to enter into the corporation itself?—It would not be necessary for that purpose. I do not know how you could induce mercantile men to enter into the details of the business of the corporation: I am sorry they do not.

1072. The general view which seems to prevail amongst the principal mercantile persons in the City of London is, that they have not sufficient time to devote to the proper discharge of the duties of the municipal offices; is not that the case?—That is the feeling I believe universally.

1073. Is there any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—I am not aware of any other.

J. H. Elliott, Esq.

JOHN HAWKINS ELLIOTT, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1074. What has been your connexion with the corporation of the City of London?—I have been a member of the Court of Common Council for about five years, and before that time I took great interest in the examination of corporation affairs, having for many years past considered it not so useful a body as it might be.

1075. You are engaged in trade?—I am a wholesale warehouseman in the City.

1076. Do you reside in the City?—I carry on my business in the City, and I also reside in the City.

1077. What are the principal points to which you desire to call the attention of the Commissioners?—The corporation is an ancient institution, and the wants of the metropolis have naturally outgrown it, useful as it no doubt was centuries ago; it now stands an independent knot of authority in the very centre of the metropolis, occupying a small part of it only, and exercising an independent jurisdiction there. It has all the vices of an imperium in imperio. If the corporation be good, there is no reason that the other nineteen-twentieths of the metropolis should be denied the privileges which the City district enjoys. If the corporation be bad, there is every reason why the persons who inhabit the central district should not be at a disadvantage as compared with all the rest of the metropolis. The first evil belonging to the corporation, I take to be this: that it has a vast variety of business, and some of the most important kind to transact, which requires specific qualifications—which business is performed by an indiscriminate number of tradesmen like myself, who, I submit, are quite incompetent to grapple with many great and difficult matters entrusted to them. The habits of London are peculiar; they render the management of local affairs—they render in fact self-government almost impossible. Things may be managed by the people, in almost any other city in the kingdom, which cannot be managed in London. In London the most influential and intelligent men come only for a few hours into the City; they come at ten in the morning, and they are away at five or six in the afternoon. They go home; and their sympathies and affections are at some place ten or twelve miles off; they feel no interest in the municipal affairs of the City; so long as they can find their way to their counting-houses, and so long as their property is safe in their own house, they are unconcerned about all else. During the time they are in London their whole attention is given to their business; the hours of their leisure are spent elsewhere. In a country town a man has a great deal of leisure at the place of his business, for that is the place where he resides, hence he has some opportunity to attend to municipal matters, and his services may be useful. Hence the management of a place like London is not at all suited for municipal arrangements.

1078. In short, your objection to the present system is not so much to any abuses in detail as to the whole system?—The objection which I feel is, as I have stated, to the general system, but there are many abuses in detail.

1079. Would you propose to abolish the entire corporation?—The first and foremost evil which I apprehend exists in the City of London, and which is an evil of immense magnitude, consists in the magistracy: which consists of twenty-six aldermen, who are elected by the citizens, without much regard to their qualifications for being magistrates. They are men of trade; their habits and their ideas have all been formed in the counting-house or the shop. When they become magistrates they are not independent of their business; therefore they bring to the magisterial duties neither the time that is requisite, nor the previous intellectual qualifications. Serious evils are constantly occurring in the administration of justice in consequence of incompetent magistrates; great delays take place because they are not at their place of duty when they should be there. A hundred or two hundred persons are kept waiting a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, or half an hour, in the very middle of the day, because those magistrates are not punctual. It has not unfrequently happened that, in the course of the police business, the magistrates are disturbed by applications, as we infer from appearances, connected with their own private affairs. The great and crying evil of the corporation, I consider, is the Court of Aldermen: composed as it is of twenty-six gentlemen elected for life, and therefore, to a great extent, irresponsible to their fellow-citizens. In addition to the duties which they exercise as magistrates, they are also members of the Court of Common Council; and they are members of various committees of the court, where they have a preponderating influence: as, for example, a committee which consists of forty-one members will include twelve aldermen; therefore they compose nearly one-third of the members of such committee, who are elected for life. Aldermen's deputies are members of those committees; thus the alderman directly and indirectly, through the influence of his deputy, exercises a great influence in any case where he has any interest. Now a magistrate certainly should not be periodically elected; but a gentleman who exercises the many other functions which the aldermen enjoy should be periodically elected. There is therefore this difficulty, either you must strip the aldermen of all the functions which they exercise, or you must elect them periodically; if you elect them periodically, then you have all the vices which attends the system of a magistrate going back continually to seek the suffrages of his fellow-citizens; constrained to shape his course in a way that shall render him popular among the electors. The first reform I suggest, would be to relieve the corporation of London entirely of its alderman-magistracy. I would appoint two paid police magistrates for the two offices of the City. We should then have the same police-magistracy exercised over the whole metropolis, which now obtains (I believe to the satisfaction of the people) over nineteen-twentieths of it. We should have paid, properly educated, and responsible men day by day discharging the most important duties in society as their daily duty, instead of, as in the City of London, and nowhere else, unpaid, irresponsible, and, as I submit with great respect, uneducated men, professionally uneducated for the peculiar duties they have to perform. This same evil obtains at the quarter sessions, and at the Central Criminal Court. These aldermen take their places at the quarter sessions, but they do not conduct the business, that is conducted by a judge, where the presence of the alderman-magistrate, I submit, is a great impertinence. During the process of a trial these men do not understand what is going on; they do not understand law; they soon get tired of giving attention; you will find them writing letters; you will find them restless, running in and out; and, as I must bear testimony of what I have experienced myself, a man will find very considerable disturbance to his attention, being a juryman, in consequence of the incessant mere personal moving about of persons who have in truth no real function to perform. The same applies to the Central Criminal Court. An alderman who has tried a man at the police court, ought not, even in appearance, to go to the Central Criminal Court, and try him over again. There is nothing that an alderman can do at the Central Criminal Court, I would submit, that is at all useful to the public. I am well informed that they cause considerable delay in the course of business there, in consequence of their frequent absence; it being necessary that an alderman, who is after all a mere dummy, should be there to constitute a court. I hope that this Commission will be enabled to make a very searching inquiry, and to obtain much more information than I can give respecting the administration of justice in the City of London. I would strongly recommend that the aldermen should be relieved entirely of these important duties, which they are not competent to perform.

1080. Would you propose that the two magistrates whom you have spoken of should be appointed by the Crown?—I can imagine no authority sufficiently dignified and sufficiently important to have anything to do with the creation of magistrates but the Crown.

1081. Would you then propose that the police magistrates in the City should be appointed by the Crown, as they are in the rest of the metropolis?—As they are in the other nineteen-twentieths of the metropolis.

1082. From what fund would you propose that they should be paid?—That is a matter which, with your permission, subsequently I will explain.

1083. Will you proceed with your statement?—I, perhaps, may give a striking illustration of the evils that have taken place with regard to the administration of justice in the City by aldermen, and the same system continues, the same evils may take place again. I refer to two instances which took place sometime ago, and by so doing, I am not liable to come into collision with persons who are now active in the City. This thing has happened in consequence of having persons who have other affairs in life, besides magisterial duties to perform, that an alderman has taken his seat to adjudicate upon a case, in which his own partner has pleaded before him, for either plaintiff or defendant.

1084. Does an alderman sit in any case where there are plaintiffs and defendants, cases of civil jurisdiction?—The case I allude to was a dispute about a ship's register.

1085. What was the court in which the case was heard?—It was before the police Court, before a magistrate sitting at the Mansion House.

1086. One of those summary cases in which a magistrate would exercise civil jurisdiction in disputes about small sums?—Yes. But an instance occurred, some few years ago, more astounding than that, when the corporation had jurisdiction in the borough of Southwark. An alderman went, day by day, to dispense justice among his fellow-citizens, himself being in custody; going from prison in the custody of an officer, sitting on the judgment-seat in custody, and going away in the same situation. Now, no notice was taken of this by the corporation. One would not like to say that they approved of such a thing, but such an enormity did not call forth any animadversion. I believe, that and some other wrongs were the cause of the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark being at last entirely relieved from aldermen-magistrates. The aldermen of the City of London do not now sit as police magistrates in the borough of Southwark, as they did formerly, but these things may occur again elsewhere. It is true, public opinion may act more strongly than it did some ten or twelve years ago; but while you have the same materials composing the Court of Aldermen, such a scandal may occur again; the administration of justice should be free from suspicion, as well as from any defects which can be established against it. The two police courts of the City are, by the corporation report, carried on at a cost of more than 5,000*l.* a year. The twenty-three paid police magistrates in the metropolis, cost altogether but 45,000*l.* a year. So that actually our neighbours in the surrounding districts of the metropolis have the advantage of paid and professionally educated men, at less cost than the business is conducted for in the City by unpaid gentlemen.

J. H. Elliott, Esq.

1087. In instituting your comparison, do not you include dissimilar elements; do not you include the salary of the recorder, a person who exercises superior criminal jurisdiction?—No. By the 5,000*l.* which I referred to, the cost of the two police courts of the Mansion House and the Guildhall is defrayed quite independently of anything else. The cases, as well as I can obtain information respecting them, are perfectly parallel. There is a staff of officials kept up in our police courts which are not kept up in other places. The adviser and assessor of the Lord Mayor costs 600*l.* a year. We consider that the magistrates are so incompetent, that we have highly paid gentlemen to assist them as legal advisers. It would be much better that those gentlemen should be at once made magistrates; we should then have competent and efficient men, forming a judgment and giving a decision on important cases. The next point of grievance, I submit, is the police of the City. There is one police obtaining over nineteen twentieths of the metropolis, the total cost of which is not more than 400,000*l.* a year. The City district has a police of its own. This central spot of the metropolis has a police jurisdiction independent of all the rest. It has its own commissioner. It is under the control, more or less, of the police committee of the Court of Aldermen. It is also somewhat controlled, but not much, by a police committee of the Court of Common Council. It is conducted at a cost of more than 40,000*l.* a year. Thirteen years ago an attempt was made to institute a uniform police over the whole of the metropolis. It was then estimated that the police of the City might be well managed for 25,000*l.* a year, in addition to the costs of all the rest of the metropolitan police. The City made a great resistance—they raised a strong cry about their rights and privileges, and the Government gave way upon the condition that they should form their police after the model of the metropolitan police. That they did, but in consequence of having a separate jurisdiction, and from other causes, our police, instead of costing us 25,000*l.* a year, costs more than 40,000*l.* a year. Now, supposing that the metropolitan police commissioners, who would be pretty good judges, might be a little wrong in their calculation, it is but fair to say that the citizens of London lose 10,000*l.* a year by their separate police jurisdiction. During the thirteen years we have had it in operation, the citizens of London have lost no less than 130,000*l.*

1088. Do you believe the police in the City to be efficient at present?—The police is as efficient as a police can be, cut off and separated from the larger metropolitan police. The police should be like an army—it should act uniformly, and absolutely under one head. It is quite clear that two separate authorities must weaken its power, and, as we see, cause an enormous extra cost.

1089. You believe that the separation of the City police from the rest of the metropolitan police makes it more expensive and less efficient?—It makes it more expensive and less efficient. I should therefore propose that the citizens of London be relieved from the management of their police, and that it be incorporated with the metropolitan police.

1090. Will you proceed to the next point of your statement?—The commissioners of sewers are a distinct body in the City. Upon the best examination which I can make I think it would not be desirable to disturb them. They are already subordinate to the metropolitan board of commissioners. In all works in which it is necessary to have an united action, the City commissioners are ready and willing to act with the metropolitan commissioners: we have spent an enormous sum of money in bringing our sewers to a great state of perfection. The City is only about one square mile of area, and we have about fifty miles of sewers. We have paving, which is not rivalled in the world. The commissioners of sewers sitting in the City are close at hand, easily accessible to all the citizens, and although there may be objections, I propose that we should be allowed to retain the management of our own district sewers. Having relieved us of those important functions which I think ought to belong only to the imperial authority, I would submit that for all the rest the City of London should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Municipal Act, which governs all towns and cities. The Municipal Act, which has been found a great improvement upon the old corporation system, is now in active operation in Southampton, Bristol, and all other incorporated towns. Its provisions seem clear and fair; they work, if not perfectly, much better than the old system, and I can conceive no reason why there should not be the same law in the City of London, which obtains every where else except there. This will indicate whence the funds are to come to pay for the police magistrates and all other services. The Municipal Act provides that the estates of corporations shall be applied to municipal services, and when that fund is exhausted, the residue is to be made up by a rate from the inhabitants.

1091. The General Municipal Act makes no provision, does it, for the payment of salaries to magistrates; all the stipendiary magistrates in the country are appointed by the Crown, and are paid from some general fund?—I think there is a provision in the Municipal Act that stipendiary magistrates may be appointed by the Crown and paid out of the rates, but if not, we have funds in the City sufficient and available. Our Lord Mayor alone costs, on the report of a committee which searched thoroughly into the matter, 25,000*l.* a year. Therefore, stripping the office a little of its enormous costs, we have funds in abundance to pay for any new services we require.

1092. To what committee do you allude?—There was a committee of the common council appointed in the year 1836 to examine into the expense of all the different portions of the establishment. I have looked over the report prepared with great care; it states that the total cost of the lord mayor's office is 25,000*l.* a year, including, of course, the estimated rental of the Mansion House, and the ground on which it stands; the repairs and additions of furniture, and so on, which have been from time to time purchased; but the cost of the two unpaid magistrates of the City at the Mansion House and Guildhall is sufficient to defray the expense of two paid police magistrates. In the metropolis generally each police court costs less than 2,000*l.* a year. Each of our police courts costs 2,500*l.* a year. By the plan I propose, the reform of the corporation would be very simple; and, that we should not clash, I will not say against the prejudices but against the sympathies of the citizens, by extirpating the corporation entirely,—we should deprive it of those important functions it possesses, which I submit with great respect it exercises to the injury of the public. We should allow it to remain still managing enormous funds which perhaps, ill though they may be managed, we could hardly devise any other authority to manage better. Notwithstanding the expense of the corporation, and I may say its extravagance, I think the management of its estates would bear a fair comparison with the management of the national estates by the Woods and Forests.

1093. Would you propose that the magistrates in the City should stand on the same footing as the recorders in municipal boroughs; namely, that they should be appointed by the Crown, and be paid out of the municipal fund?—I would have the recorder and all the other judges appointed and paid precisely as they are in the other municipal towns.

1094. There are very important charitable trusts in the hands of the City, are there not?—There are.

1095. How do you propose to deal with them?—I should leave them to be administered by the corporation, reformed under the new Municipal Act. I apprehend the Municipal Act would supply us with all the requisite authority and all the machinery for the purpose at once. The funds which are available in the City for useful purposes are very considerable indeed. A return has lately been laid before the Court of Common Council, which tells us that we have 151 officers, of various sorts, beginning with the recorder, whose united salaries are 46,000*l.* a year. This would give us 151 officials, whose average salaries are about 300*l.* a year. By a proper management of the affairs of the City, an enormous amount might be saved from those officials, which could be appropriated to buying old bridges, to the building of new ones, and carrying on important metropolitan improvements to a most unbounded extent. It is within the last few weeks only that the corporation have seriously determined upon the purchase of the Southwark bridge, which can be had for 350,000*l.* The traffic of the City is extremely incommoded by the want of proper thoroughfares; and I think that if the corporation had had a true sympathy with the wants of their fellow-citizens, they would years ago have purchased that bridge. They have not yet purchased it, and they have only now seriously considered the propriety of purchasing it. To show that there would be no lack of funds for the purpose of carrying on any of the reformed institutions in the City, I beg to observe that the expenditure of the City of London for 1852 for municipal purposes, leaving out of the question a large sum of money expended for improvements, amounted to a tax of about 5*s.* in the pound. Reckoning the rental of the City as 1,000,000*l.*, the expenditure for municipal purposes for the year 1852 was equal to a tax of 17*l.* per house.

1096. What proportion of that amount do you conceive arises from taxation, and what proportion from the City property?—Of the money so expended about 146,000*l.* was derived from the City rents, tolls, and various sources of City taxation, and about 120,000*l.* was derived from rates; that is, about 266,000*l.* in the whole.

1097. By rates do you mean the coal dues?—No; 146,000*l.* was contributed by rents and various tolls and taxes upon commodities,—taxes in fact upon the trade and commerce of the City; the rest was raised by rates, as in Marylebone.

1098. Can you distinguish between the rents of the City and the produce of all taxes and tolls levied upon the public?—Yes; an examination of their yearly abstract will show that.

1099. Comparing the amount of rates paid in the City with that paid in other parts of the metropolis, Marylebone for instance, can you state to the Commission whether you consider it higher or lower?—Notwithstanding the advantage which the citizens of London ought to derive from their other sources of revenue, the rates paid in the City are quite as high, or a trifle higher, than in Marylebone, which has no extraordinary sources of relief. In 1852 the rates in Marylebone for paving, lighting, sewers, and police were 2*s.* 3*d.* in the pound. The rates raised in the City of London for the same purposes were a trifle more than 2*s.* 3*d.* in the pound.

1100. Are those rates uniform over all the parishes of the City; are there the same rates for lighting and paving all over the City?—Yes; the corporation authorities make a rate upon the whole City, and each ward contributes according to its assessed rental so much in the pound.

H. Elliott, Esq.
15th Nov. 1853.

1101. Is there any parish rate in the City besides the poor's rate?—Yes; there is the church rate and the tithe, and all other parochial expenses, quite independent of the municipal expenses.

1102. Have the citizens of London any advantages of importance with regard to the means of educating their children in endowed schools?—There are charities in the City. There is the City School, which is a very admirable institution for the education of the children of the middle classes. It is not entirely a charity, but conducted out of funds left some years ago, I think, by a citizen of London, which, with the contributions that the children themselves make, enables them to obtain a first-rate education at a very low price. That fund was in abeyance for a great many years; and it would have remained so to this day, misappropriated by the corporation, had the trust not been unearthed by Lord Brougham's Charity Commission.

1103. Are the schools of that description chiefly under the management of the corporation, or under the management of the different livery companies?—This school is in the hands of the corporation. The corporation have just built and brought into action the Freemen's Orphan School.

1104. Are the advantages of that school available for the whole of the City of London?—For the orphans of freemen until the school is full. They are now about electing them.

1105. Do you know what number of pupils the school will contain?—I do not. The corporation, when a particular tax becomes obnoxious, take care to secure the tax for a particular purpose, and oftentimes a very good purpose. There has been a great outcry made about the tax imposed upon the tradesmen of the City, who are not allowed to commence a retail business unless they take up their freedom. The funds derived from that tax go in part to support this Freemen's Orphan School. The large fines wrung from those gentlemen who do not find it convenient to become sheriffs, also go to this fund; therefore an apology is made for those impositions by the good purpose to which they are applied, when the corporation can resist public opinion no longer.

1106. You mean that they apply their other funds to purposes which may not be so generally esteemed proper?—They have other funds that are abundantly available for extravagant expenditure. There is a toll which is exceedingly obnoxious, imposed upon the transit of commodities into the City. No cart can enter the City, unless it is the cart of a freeman, without paying toll. A few years ago the corporation cunningly laid that fast, to the amount of 5,000*l.* a-year, by the Act of Parliament for the Improvement of Holborn Hill; therefore, when complaint is made of the toll, the answer is, "See for what a good purpose it is used, and more than that, it is appropriated by Act of Parliament, we cannot disturb it;" concealing the fact that they themselves quietly obtained the Act of Parliament. There is another great evil I think exists; namely, the power that the corporation have of interfering with parliamentary business to the extent that they do. I cannot see that the people inhabiting the central district of the metropolis should have a power of parliamentary interference, which people inhabiting all the other districts of the metropolis have not.

1107. That is the result of their large funds, is not it, which enables them to watch the progress of bills in Parliament, and to establish a machinery for that purpose which others have not?—They have a remembrancer, whose business and whose privilege it is to attend the House of Commons and inform the corporation, which he must do officially, of anything in any Act of Parliament which is being proposed, which can be considered as hostile to their interests.

1108. In deciding whether a bill is hostile to the interests of the City, does the remembrancer look to the interests of the metropolis at large, or to the exclusive interest of the City?—To the exclusive rights and privileges of the corporation. For example, the public were astounded some time ago by the discovery that the corporation had been suddenly put in the possession of the power of levying a toll upon coals, to a distance of 20 miles in a straight line from St. Paul's. They introduced a clause into an Act of Parliament which nobody knew anything about till it came into operation. There was no public discussion of any kind, but the coal tax was extended by that clause so as to include the town of Hertford and the town of St. Alban's. I think this is a very great grievance, and by stripping the corporation of all its privileges, except such as it would derive from the Municipal Act, we should be relieved from all those inconsistencies and absurdities.

1109. If a bill were pending in Parliament, which was generally beneficial to the metropolis, but was considered by the corporation to interfere with some of their privileges, would the remembrancer use his best efforts for defeating it?—It is not the function of the remembrancer to do that. It is his business to inform the corporation of it, and then they take their own measures.

1110. What would be the practice of the corporation in a case of that kind?—If the corporation objected to it, if they thought it interfered with their rights and privileges, they would see the officers of the Government, they would see the Home Secretary, and they would put all the machinery which they have in operation to defeat that bill. They have a great deal of parliamentary influence; several of their members are members of Parliament; they have apparatus for a great deal of agitation. They can call public meetings, and can advertise in the newspapers, and make a great deal of noise and agitation, rendering them formidable opponents.

1111. How would you propose to deal with the coal dues?—The coal tax has been rather misrepresented with regard to the corporation. The coal tax of 1*s.* 1*d.* a ton yields pretty nearly 200,000*l.* a year; but the corporation have not the control and expenditure of that large sum of money. The corporation only retain for their own use about as much as is yielded by 4*d.* out of the 1*s.* 1*d.*

1112. You mean that the rest is mortgaged for particular purposes?—The rest is expended, I believe, under the control of the Woods and Forests, for improvements beyond the City. New Oxford Street and other large metropolitan improvements have been carried on out of that fund. The fund was found to be so large, that it was very properly said, that a fund contributed to by a tax inflicted on so large a portion of the population, not only of the metropolis, but of the country around, ought not to be entirely spent for the advantage of the City of London, the whole metropolis ought to have a share of it; but as the City had the apparatus for collecting this tax, the arrangement was, that the City should continue to collect the whole of the tax, and that they should pay, out of the 1*s.* 1*d.*, 9*d.* to the Woods and Forests for metropolitan improvements generally. That seemed to be very reasonable and very proper; and, provided the City made a good use of the 63,000*l.* per annum, which is about their share of the coal duties, there is not much to complain of.

1112 a. Is that part of the fund which is applicable to City purposes, exclusively, for a term of years, or is it perpetual?—I believe it is perpetual.

1113. Do you think it would be desirable, ultimately, to abolish that tax?—In a scheme of municipal reform, I would recommend that the coal tax remain for ten years, and that it be expended as it has hitherto been. It is a tax easily collected; it is a tax which does not press hard upon the consumer. I think there is a great evil in making many things excessively cheap. I think, if you have coal exceedingly cheap, you lead not only to the comfortable but also to the luxurious use of it. The more coals there are the more they are luxuriously used. I believe the excessive cheapness of coal has exceedingly increased the smoke and fog of London, and has tended, so far forth, to make it more unhealthy; therefore those who by their luxurious expenditure tend to create such a mass of smoke, ought not to complain of a small tax, which is to be applied to the widening and straightening of streets, and thus do something to mitigate the evil.

1114. Has not it been alleged that London has suffered and been deprived of some important branches of trade in consequence of the greater dearness of coal in London than in other parts of the country?—It has been so alleged, and I really think it is an advantage to London, instead of the contrary. London is very rich; it has an enormous population; it is of unmanageable size; and I think to do anything which has the slightest tendency to increase the number of fire-using and fuligenous handicrafts which exist already would be an evil to London, instead of a good.

1115. You consider the coal tax, therefore, to be a sumptuary law to prevent London becoming too rich and too prosperous?—The coal tax is so small that it does not produce that effect. Coals are now, on the average, exceedingly cheap, and there is a larger quantity of coal now used, in proportion to the population, than ever was used before.

1116. You do not believe that branches of trade have been banished from London in consequence of the greater cost of coals in London as compared with the country districts?—I do not think that that has been, practically, much the case; and, if it has, I think it is an advantage. Leeds and Wolverhampton had better be where they are than be aggregated to a place already at the bed of a sea of smoke of one hundred square miles in extent.

1117. Do you believe that the coal duty operates exclusively as a sumptuary law; does not it restrain the consumption of the poor and necessitous, as well as the superabundant consumption of the wealthy?—The cheaper things are the more extravagantly all classes use them, and particularly the poor.

1118. At the present moment, for instance, is not the price of coal such as to render it very undesirable that it should be increased by any artificial means which can possibly be avoided?—Coals just now are dear; but in reasoning upon these matters we must take the average price of a necessary of life like coals; we must not reason from the prices of one market day. For some years there has been gradually a decline in the price of coal, which may now be bought for 19*s.* or 18*s.* a ton.

1119. Do you consider it a legitimate object of public policy to increase the price of coals in London by any tax which is not necessary for the purpose of raising revenue?—I think as so small a tax as 1*s.* 1*d.* a ton has for a great many years been imposed, and as I propose the proceeds should be entirely appropriated to metropolitan improvements, which are, in my opinion, quite as much sanitary as ornamental, such a source of revenue need not be disturbed. I cannot imagine how we can obtain 200,000*l.* a year so conveniently as by continuing the tax upon coals. I have no personal interest in the matter. I am quite willing to divest the corporation of every source of revenue which is injurious to the public; and I am only vindicating the coal tax because it is used and intended to be used for the benefit of the metropolis generally, as well as of the City.

1120. Do you know what the application of the 75,000*l.*, which is the amount of the coal tax possessed by the City, is?—It does not appear very plain. Without going to the extent of censure of many persons, I wish that the City accounts were more clearly made out. In the cash abstract for the year 1852, they give the product of the coal tax and the corn tax, the corn tax being about 10,000*l.* of the sum of 73,000*l.* On the other side, they show, as the appropriation of that 73,000*l.*, 20,000*l.* spent for City improvements; and the rest, I believe, is merged in the ordinary expenditure of the City. It is but fair to say that the corporation are now spending more money for really useful alterations in the City than they have done for many years past. There is an item of 20,000*l.* for public improvements, and lower down there is an item of 19,000*l.* for building lodging-houses for the labouring poor. There is an item of 58,000*l.* for the new metropolitan cattle market. That may be referred to as another grievous instance of corporation prejudice and narrow-mindedness. With immense difficulty the old Smithfield market was at last condemned, the corporation year after year resisting the alteration and when the Court of Common Council divided, out of a body of 230 persons you would not find above eight or ten in the minority for the removal of that market. At last, after we had got rid of the market, the corporation had influence enough to prevent its removal to any further distance than Copenhagen Fields. It is not now in the centre of the metropolis, but it is in the neighbourhood of a closely-peopled district. In the course of a few years it will be completely surrounded with houses. In consequence of corporation influence, prejudice, and stupidity, the metropolis has lost the opportunity of being relieved of a crying nuisance—such an opportunity as, perhaps, may not return for half a century.

J. H. Elliott, Esq.

1121. You mentioned the corn tax. By the corn tax are the Commissioners to understand the metage tax?—Yes, the metage dues, out of which they derive a profit of about 10,000*l.*

1122. Do you know anything of the operation of the privilege of the City with respect to porterage and metage?—Only, generally, that it creates a monopoly which is to the disadvantage of the trade. Tradesmen are obliged to employ privileged persons, at a greater charge than others would. It is a serious tax upon the commerce of the City, and one which is not endured by people living in other towns. It tends to make the commerce of the City more expensive, and to make Bristol and other towns powerful and successful rivals of London.

1123. In what manner are the functions of the City with respect to the conservancy of the river exercised?—They are in the hands of a committee called the navigation committee. That committee is composed of the ordinary members of the court, with a certain proportion of aldermen—persons that one would suppose to be very incompetent for such duties. Still we have been told by a preceding and practical witness that he has nothing to complain of; and therefore, perhaps, it would not be worth while to disturb an organization which has existed a great many years, if it works well. It seems, in theory, exceedingly absurd that the conservancy of the Thames for about eighty miles of its course should be in the hands of a small knot of City authorities.

1124. How would you propose to deal with the present borough of Southwark?—I would relieve Southwark from the trifling jurisdiction which the City now has over it, and provide for its wants in the same way as those of Marylebone and any other place are provided for. I do not at all see the way clear for the organization of any new municipalities. Much less do I think it expedient to bring the whole of the metropolis under one municipality. As I said before, the habits of the people of London render their due and efficient attention to public local matters quite impossible.

1125. Does not the size of the metropolis defeat one of the main objects of municipal government, which is, acquaintance with the local circumstances of the place?—Very much so.

1126. Would it, in your opinion, be desirable that several municipal bodies should be constituted in the metropolis; for example, that Finsbury, Marylebone, the Tower Hamlets, Westminster, Lambeth, and Southwark should be constituted distinct boroughs for municipal purposes?—I would rather see the practical result of an improved municipality in the City of London; and at the end of five years, having had that experience, we might then see whether it would be expedient to extend the Municipal Act to those various boroughs.

1127. At the present moment it is in the power of those boroughs to apply to be admitted within the Municipal Act, is not it?—Of course they can petition the legislature for any institution which they think may be of advantage to them.

1128. Must not the application be made by the majority of the ratepayers; and is it not a very elaborate and expensive process to obtain that consent?—I am not aware how that may be, but I think, if practically people cared about it, they would make some agitation. I do not believe there has been any move in any of the metropolitan boroughs for a municipality, except when they have been instigated to it by the corporation. When the corporation have felt themselves in danger, they have been very well disposed to gain strength by creating agitation around them.

1129. The general outline of your proposition is, to extend the provisions of the General Municipal Act to the City of London, placing all judicial functions in the hands of officers appointed by the Crown, and paid out of the City funds?—Yes.

1130. With respect to the police, which is now separate, you would incorporate it with the metropolitan police; with respect to the board of sewers, you would leave it as at present, with exclusive City jurisdiction?—Yes.

1131. The effect of that change would be to abolish the separate Court of Aldermen, would not it?—I apprehend you can do little good unless you completely get rid of the Court of Aldermen, which is a thoroughly anomalous and unconstitutional body, working in defiance of all the ordinary notions which we entertain, that men are to be elected and to give periodically an account to their constituents of their conduct when they vote away their money.

1132. Would you keep up any connexion between the freedom of the City and the livery of the trading companies?—I would not disturb the livery or the trading companies, useless as they may be, except in so far as they interfere with the freedom of trade in the City. Some of the companies will not allow a man to carry on trade in the City unless he be—not free of the City, but free of their company; the butchers, the bakers, the cooks, and other such companies for instance. I would deprive them of that power; I would of course deprive the livery of the power of electing the Lord Mayor and chamberlain, because the City would be brought under the Municipal Act, in which there is a provision for the election of the mayor and other functionaries. All anomalies and absurdities would be removed as a matter of course by the application of the Municipal Act.

1133. You would get rid of all elections in common hall?—Yes; it is notorious that they work ill; that it is too often a privilege used by people who have no business with it. It was a concession some time ago that a liveryman living seven miles off should vote for members of Parliament. I think that might be discontinued with great advantage.

1134. Would you allow a person, who was free of a company, to be free of the City upon paying a fee, without any qualification arising from a residence in the City?—I would abolish altogether the qualification of freedom; I would consider that the whole of the inhabitants of the empire were free. I would make every man free who lives in the City of London, just as every man in Bristol is; and a burgess, by the very fact of his having lived there a certain length of time, and paid the rates and taxes.

1135. You would assimilate the condition of burgesses in the City to that of burgesses under the General Municipal Act?—Without exception.

1136. Would you propose that any officer of the corporation should be elected by the general body of burgesses, or would you prefer that they should all be elected by the common council, or whatever was the body that corresponded to the common council?—I would propose that the burgesses should elect the town council, as they do now everywhere else but in the City, and that the town council should appoint the necessary officers as they do now. I can see no reason whatever for any exception being made in the City of London. The aldermen in the new municipalities have scarcely any function except that of town councillors. They have the title of aldermen, but no separate functions, and I think they should have none if they are not magistrates, and magistrates such men ought not to be.

1137. Is there any other point, connected with this subject, to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—I may say that the City now consists of twenty-five wards, which are very unequal in their extent, some of them not consisting of more than 180 or 200 houses. I should propose that the City should be divided into twelve wards, and that those twelve wards should return altogether 180 councillors; that, I think, would be a sufficiently numerous body. You must have such bodies rather numerous, or you have not a sufficient number to attend, and that gives the opportunity of a good deal of jobbing and petty influence. I think 180 councillors would be a sufficient number. In Marylebone their vestry consists of 120; and, upon the whole, I believe Marylebone is very fairly managed.

1138. Do you know what the usual attendance at the Marylebone vestry is?—I do not; at any rate Marylebone, without the advantage of special sources of revenue, does not pay more in rates than the citizens of London.

1139. You would keep up the division into wards therefore?—You could hardly carry on municipal affairs, I think, without something of the kind 1140. Would you alter the present limits of the wards?—I would have the City re-divided; some wards now contain not above 180 houses, they are extremely unequal.

1141. There are charities which belong to those wards as wards; do you imagine that there would be any difficulty in altering the limits of those wards in regard to such charities?—Parliament is all-powerful, and I think the citizens ought not to raise objections upon the point of the charities, when so much good is to be effected;—there might be some little difficulty, but I think it is to be got over.

1142. Might not the old boundaries of the wards be maintained for the purpose of administering the charities, while they were altered for electoral purposes?—Yes; they might be so. It might be said that there are persons occupying so many houses in such a spot of the City, formerly called the ward of ———, who have a claim to such charity. Let it so remain. But I would rather see a liberal spirit pervading the citizens, and that all such petty matters should be divided among a larger number of people.

1143. Do you know whether there are many charities belonging to the wards as such?—I do not think the number is considerable.

1144. Have you, as a common councilman, taken much part on committees or otherwise, in the business of the common council?—I have taken the ordinary amount of interest. I have been a member of certain committees which have been apportioned to me, and attended them as well as I could; but the business of the corporation is carried on in the very middle of the day. The consequence is, that it prohibits men who have any sort of avocation, from giving due time to it. The corporation is, for the most part, composed of elderly men, persons who are in easy circumstances, or who have sons or junior partners able to take the management of their business, allowing them to be themselves away at the most important period of the day.

J. H Elliott, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1145. Are the ordinary proceedings of the common council orderly?—Yes; the Court of Common Council is pretty well drilled to the conduct of public business. It is hardly so calm and quiet as the House of Commons,—certainly not so dignified as the House of Lords; but, on the whole, I think the usual courtesies and mode of business to be very well observed there.

1146. You do not think the present number of the common council is sufficient to produce disorder in the transaction of their affairs?—It is not the number that would cause disorder, but the materials of which it is composed. It is not so numerous as the House of Commons, it only consists of 232 persons.

1147. It is numerous as compared with ordinary town councils of boroughs, is not it?—Yes; it is about double that of Marylebone.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

FRANCIS BENNOCH, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1148. What connexion have you had with the corporation of the City of London?—I have been a member of the common council since 1845.

1149. Are you engaged in trade?—I am.

1150. What is the nature of your trade?—I am a wholesale warehouseman in Wood Street, Cheapside.

1151. Are you a resident in the City?—I do not reside there, I only have a place of business there; the whole of our premises are occupied by our business and the lodging of the young men employed by us, and we are obliged to find places of residence in the neighbourhood. I reside at Blackheath.

1152. Did you ever reside in the City?—I did twenty years ago, for four or five years.

1153. Have you taken an active part in the business of the corporation as common councilman?—I have, a very active part.

1154. Are there any points in reference to the subject of this inquiry, to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commission?—There are a great number of points, and if I were not afraid of wearying the patience of the Commissioners, I should like to go through them, and state what I know in connexion with them, because in this inquiry I may state that I appear before the Commission in an independent and impartial capacity, not for the purpose of accusing the corporation, but merely to speak to facts which have come within my own knowledge.

1155. Will you have the goodness to advert seriatim to the principal points to which you are desirous of calling our attention?—I may say that I was sent into the common council for the express purpose of endeavouring to effect certain reforms; it happened soon after some prosecutions had been engaged in against wholesale warehousemen of my class, of whom some six or seven hundred were summoned to appear, or told they would be proceeded against at law. They defended themselves by raising a fund sufficient to pay their expenses, and the corporation were defeated.

1156. What was the nature of the point upon which the prosecution turned?—The point at issue was, whether they conducted their business by retail or by wholesale. The corporation attempted to prove that a wholesale dealer who divided perhaps a dozen stockings into three sales, which is sometimes done in high-priced articles, was really carrying on a retail transaction; or if he cut ten yards from a piece of silk to oblige a particular customer, that again was a retail transaction. They employed spies for the purpose of ascertaining the fact.

1157. Were those questions raised for the purpose of seeing whether they could oblige you to take up your freedom as retail dealers?—Expressly with the determination that they would thus be able to find a volume of evidence sufficiently strong to convict us of trading by retail, and thereby oblige us to become free of the City, the object being to get the money.

1158. Has there ever been any attempt in the City of London to oblige traders, who were obviously not retail dealers, but exercising the profession of merchants or bankers, to take up their freedom?—Within the last two years they have recklessly summoned all men who appeared to conduct any business in the City whatsoever, to take up their freedom. As many as 4,000 summonses, I believe, were issued, and some three or four hundred frightened into taking up their freedom.

1159. Those summonses included merchants of all descriptions, both wholesale and retail?—They included merchants of all descriptions. I hold now in my hand a return which I shall place with pleasure at the disposal of the Commissioners, because it contains a statement of the number of freemen made from 1800 to 1849, but I have added the subsequent numbers, bringing it up to the present month.

The same is delivered in, and is as follows :—

1853 Prosecutions threatened—776 in ten months.

Yet the City continues to pay to the lord mayor and others in lieu of the privilege of making twenty-two freemen, 550*l.* instead of 51*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, which is all the income that could be derived from such a source.

(The Witness.) It will be observed from this list, that at certain periods the people became very much offended with the proceedings of the corporation, and declined to take up their freedom. Then the corporation threatened to compel them. That not succeeding, they reduced the amount of money required to be paid for the purpose of making them free; and thus we find in 1836 the numbers rapidly rise, and the amount received is considerably increased in consequence of the reduction of the price. It then goes on, and a gradual diminution occurs till we come to the last prosecution; then the number rose gradually, and I find now in ten months we have 134 more than we had in the whole of the year 1851.

1160. What is the nature of that document; to whom was the return made?—It was made by the clerk of the chamber to the Court of Aldermen.

1161. Has it been published?—Yes; and circulated to the whole of the members of the corporation.

1162. What is the date of that return?—It was made in 1849.

1163. That is since the corporation have admitted freemen without requiring them to go through the companies?—Yes. I shall have to draw the attention of the Commission to one point indicated by that return; namely, that in the statement of the accounts we shall find that there is a sum of 550*l.* received by the lord mayor and others connected with the corporation in lieu of certain freedoms; that is, that there are certain officers of the corporation who have the privilege of making twenty-two freemen; but some years ago the matter was arranged on the footing, that instead of having the privilege of making those free themselves, they should receive a money payment of 25*l.* That continues up to the present moment; 550*l.* is so expended annually, and yet the whole of the money received by the City for making a freeman is 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Thus the gain of making twenty-two freemen to the City of London would be 51*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, whereas they pay to those who have the privilege of making freemen, according to an ancient custom, 550*l.*

1164. Have you any means of knowing whether any considerable number of persons who have taken up their freedom lately were persons who have been sued?—I believe above 300 of those admitted in the present year were induced to take up their freedom by the fear of the law.

1165. Had they been served with notices?—In some cases the people were sold up in consequence of the summons; others petitioned to be excused; there are some cases of considerable enormity in connexion with the proceedings, not many it is true, but several; the resistance of the higher class prevented the corporation going to the extent they otherwise would have done.

1166. Do you know whether any legal proceedings were taken against any of the higher class of merchants?—Not during the late proceedings. On a previous occasion there were; and it was agreed mutually that they should proceed against one firm, Ward and Company, of Wood Street; others agreed to defend that action by raising a joint purse. The City agreed to be governed and guided by the result of that action.

1167. What was the result of that action?—They were entirely defeated. The late recorder, who was the judge, ruled that they had no case; at all events they were obliged to withdraw the action and pay all the expenses.

1168. Was that on the ground that the parties proceeded against were wholesale, and not retail merchants?—Yes.

1169. Yet you state that quite recently they have renewed the attempt against the wholesale merchants?—Yes; by a resolution of the Court of Common Council, which may be characterized as an insane resolution in my opinion; even gentlemen who had been in the habit of considering this an essential element of corporation reform, joined with a great number of others to compel those men to take up their freedom, under, as they say, the persuasion that such a proceeding would draw the attention of the Government, and bring about a reformation which they were unable to effect of themselves; that in fact they would drag the corporation through the dirt for the purpose of having it made respectable. I should say, that so far as reforms have been attempted by the corporation, such attempts have been very numerous; on many occasions they have discussed the matter for days. In 1836 a series of resolutions were agreed to, after a long discussion, and having obtained the private opinion of every member of the Court of Common Council, they are much condensed, and are exceedingly good; and I believe, if it were the opinion that nothing more was to be done than merely reform the corporation, and put it upon a different basis, and permit the whole of the surrounding districts to remain unconnected with the municipal institutions, this might be taken as the basis of such a reformation, although it would require to be considerably modified. The resolutions evinced the sincerity of the corporation, so far as they were themselves concerned, but at the same time they have never been able to carry out their scheme. I have myself been on five or six committees appointed for the express purpose of preparing bills for Parliament, to effect reform; but always when it came to the point we have been defeated, either by a combination of our own officers, or by a combination of the companies claiming the privilege of the liverymen; and reform is as far from us now as it was ten years ago.

The resolutions were read as follow:—

1. That, in the opinion of this committee, the object of all corporate reform should be to place the funds of the citizens, and the election of their representatives and governing officers, under the effectual control of the citizens.

2. That the constituency of this City should be one of uniform description.
3. That the constituency of this City should consist of all freemen householders—that is, occupiers of premises within the City, residing therein, or within seven miles thereof, paying scot and bearing lot, and who have been so for a period of twelve months.
4. That the boundaries of the several wards of this City should be altered, in order to make the wards more equal.
5. That the wards should be more equal as to the number of inhabitants and the amount of rateable property in each.
6. That power should be given to the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and commons of this City in common council assembled, to unite the smaller and divide the larger wards; or, by changing the boundaries thereof, to make them more equal in number of inhabitants and amount of rateable property therein.
7. That the number of wards in the City should be twenty-five.
8. That the time for holding elections should be consolidated, and that there should be in the year two days for nomination, and one day for election; namely, one day for the nomination of persons, to be chosen in an assembly of all the constituency in common hall, and one other day for the nomination of persons to be chosen in the respective wardmotes; the former to take place a few days before the latter; and that in the event of a poll being demanded in either the common hall or wardmote elections, the poll should be taken on the day following the wardmote nomination, in the several wardmotes of the several electors within each ward.
9. That the Lord Mayor should be chosen from those aldermen who have served the office of sheriff.
10. That the election of mayor by the common hall, should be absolute, without any veto.
11. That the aldermen should be elected in the several wardmotes from the general constituency of the City.
12. That the election of aldermen by the wards should be without any veto.
13. That the aldermen should not be justices until they have served the office of sheriff.
14. That the aldermen should be elected periodically.
15. That the period for the election of aldermen should be once in seven years.
16. That no person should be eligible for, or continue in the office of alderman, who has been convicted of fraud by a jury; and that any alderman who shall, during the tenure of his office, become bankrupt or insolvent, or compound with his creditors, and in any such case shall not pay twenty shillings in the pound, should be thereupon removed from his office, but not disqualified for re-election.
17. That the common councilmen should be annually elected in the several wardmotes.
18. That the number of common councilmen should not be less than two hundred.
19. That the vigilance of the electors is sufficient to preserve the respectability and character of the municipal representatives, without requiring any pecuniary qualification, which with bad men is illusory, and with good men is unnecessary; and that every person qualified to vote in the choice of common councilmen should be qualified to be elected to that office.
20. That no person should be eligible for, or continue in the office of common councilman, who has been convicted of fraud by a jury; and that any common councilman who shall, during the tenure of office, become bankrupt or insolvent, or compound with his creditors, and in any such case shall not pay twenty shillings in the pound, should be thereupon removed from his office, but not disqualified from re-election.
21. That the mayor and sheriffs should be elected by the general constituency of the City in common hall.
22. That the chamberlain should be elected by the general constituency in common hall.
23. That the auditors of the accounts of the City should be elected by the general constituency in common hall.
24. That the court of mayor and aldermen should be continued as a separate court, but that for the future, the whole of the City's cash should be under the control, and expended only by the authority of the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and commons in council assembled.
25. That the court of aldermen should be an open court.
26. That the control of the police and nightly watch should be vested in the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled.
27. That by two several charters in Parliament of the 15th of Edward III. and 7th of Richard II., it is granted and confirmed to the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the City of London, that if any customs of the City shall be harsh or defective, or any new emergencies arising therein shall need amendment, for which no remedy had been before provided, the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty may, as often as it shall seem to them expedient, ordain and provide a remedy, according to good faith and consonant to reason, for the common advantage of the citizens and the people resorting thither, provided that such ordinances be useful to the king and his people, agreeable to good faith, and consonant to reason as aforesaid; that such legislative power was with all the other rights and privileges of the citizens of London, confirmed by the statute of the 2d of William and Mary, passed on the completion of the Revolution of 1688; that it has been constantly exercised, and forms the foundation of many of the most useful and important ordinances made by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty, from the earliest possession of the power to the present time; and that it has been established by various decisions of the courts of law during the same period.

28. That this legislative power of remedying defects in the civic constitution is essential to the maintenance of the ancient rights and privileges of the citizens and their adaptation to altered times and circumstances, and should therefore be preserved unimpaired, notwithstanding any change which might be deemed necessary in other respects in the corporate institutions of this City.
29. That a clause to the effect of the 69th section in the Act of the 5th and 6th of William IV. chapter 76, for the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales, should, with the exception of the quorum of the common council being continued at forty, and the omission of the last proviso therein as to the holding of quarterly courts, be introduced into any Bill which may be proposed to Parliament for the reform of the corporation of London.
30. That all officers at present admitted by the Lord Mayor, or by the court of aldermen, should in future be appointed and admitted to their respective offices by the court of Lord Mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, or by any committee or committees to whom they may delegate such appointments.
31. That the commissioners of sewers, &c., the corporation of the Irish Society, and all other commissions or committees appointed by or under Acts of Parliament, or otherwise, and emanating from the court of common council, should be under the direct control of and amenable to that body.
32. That the court of hustings, the court of mayor and aldermen in the outer chamber, and the two sheriffs' courts, should be consolidated into one court, of which the recorder and one or more assistants to him should be judges, and all barristers and attorneys practising in the superior courts should be permitted to practise in such newly constituted court, and that it should be referred to a committee to devise a plan and suggest such other regulations as they may deem best for carrying this resolution into effect.
33. That a great difference of opinion prevails amongst the inhabitants of the City as to the propriety of continuing the law of attachment, which is exercised by the local law courts of this City, and this committee feel themselves unable to express any confident judgment upon the conflicting opinions which appear to prevail on that subject; but if it should be deemed desirable to retain such process for the purpose of compelling the appearance of an absent debtor, its practical operation should be so changed both as regards the taking of bail and the payment of costs, as to increase its efficiency and remove some of the hardships which now attend its operation; and further, the property and monies within the City of London being subjected to the operation of such a law, the citizens have a right to expect that property and monies in other parts of the country belonging to the debtors of the citizens should be subjected to a similar process.
34. That the rights of property and beneficial exemptions to freemen, their wives, widows, and children, should be preserved.
35. That all the present members and officers of the corporation should go out of office on a certain day after the passing of the proposed Bill, to be therein named.
36. That power should be obtained to abolish all useless offices and places, and to consolidate such as may be deemed expedient.
37. That if it shall be considered necessary to the proper administration of the affairs of the corporation, that the members of the various committees should receive any remuneration for their services, the annual sum to be appropriated for such remuneration should in no case exceed 300*l.* to any one committee.
38. That if the Act of the 11th of George I. chapter 18, for regulating elections within this City, should be repealed (as already agreed to be petitioned for by the court of common council), and that subject to the alterations before suggested, all existing rights and privileges consistent with the principles declared by the committee should be preserved."

1170. Was not there a committee of the description you have mentioned appointed a few months ago?—Yes, a committee was appointed six months ago for the same purpose, and we took these resolutions as the basis of our discussion. So soon, however, as the Royal Commission was announced, the committee suspended its meetings.

1171. Have not the committee adopted a report?—They have, recommending a string of resolutions similar to those which are now before you, with some additions and some alterations.

1172. Was that report presented to the common council?—It was brought up to be presented. I am not quite sure whether it was presented.

1173. Could you furnish this Commission with a copy of that report?—Without difficulty.

1174. Was that report agreed to with tolerable unanimity by the committee?—There was a great division of opinion; some points were carried only by one. For example, when they came to the subject of the aldermen, it was considered essential that the aldermen should be elected periodically—that is, every seven years I believe was the time generally agreed on; but when that was about to be confirmed, the aldermen came down to a man, there being a large number on the committee, and with a few deputies, friends of their own, were strong enough to defeat what I believe to have been the better judgment of the committee.

1175. Was it proposed that a certain number should be elected every seven years?—It was.

1176. What was the number of the members of the committee?—If I remember rightly, twenty-six or twenty-eight common councilmen, and all the aldermen then present; I believe there were either eleven or twelve. It was a committee therefore of from thirty-six to forty in number.

1177. Is it part of your proposition that persons should be allowed to trade in London without being freemen?—Yes.

1178. That you say was opposed by the companies?—The bill was altogether opposed by the companies, because it provided that all persons residing and paying rates should have all the privileges of freemen and liverymen—that there should be only one body of electors. The liverymen declared that this was interfering with their privileges, and they to a man opposed it, through the whip of their clerks.

1179. So far as regards the freedom, as distinguished from the livery, the corporation having determined to admit persons as freemen of London without passing through the companies, the companies were defeated altogether?—They were; the principal thing was, that it provided that the officers of every kind should be elected by a common constituency, whereas the livery had the privilege of electing the Lord Mayor, the chamberlain, the bridgemasters, and the auditors.

1180. It has been proposed to the Commission by former witnesses simply to apply the General Municipal Act to the City of London. What is your opinion of the effect of such a proceeding?—My opinion is that it would be perfectly absurd. There are certain principles connected with a great metropolis which places it out of the possibility of being compared with any other city or borough in the kingdom. In the first place, there is its enormous magnitude, and the great variety of interests involved. Those seem to me to require a different arrangement altogether.

1181. You are speaking of the whole metropolis?—Yes; so far as the City of London is concerned merely, I see no objection to the Municipal Reform Bill being applied to it, with certain alterations arising out of its peculiar condition in connexion with the great number of charities left to it for specific purposes. That is not the case I apprehend with many of our other municipalities. With those differences, and certain regulations which ought to be made for the purpose of embracing those, I think the Municipal Act might be safely applied. The City of London has certain historical associations which are different from those of any other municipality. The history of the City of London is the history of the freedom and liberties of the people from the very earliest times. The citizens of London, through the municipality, have always been the earnest advocates of everything calculated to promote the liberty of the people. They have always been disposed, I believe, in all times to succour those who were in distress, and defend the weak against the strong. But it singularly happens, that in all matters in connexion with their self-government, in all matters connected with the institutions with which they are immediately connected, in all matters of popular liberty and the exercise of popular privileges within their own jurisdiction, they have never led, and it has been with great difficulty that they have been dragged at the tail of popular opinion. I dare say in stating this I shall be accused of treachery, or something of that kind; but I feel in a matter like this it is only fair and honest that a man should speak exactly as he feels upon the point, taking care that what he says he is prepared to prove. Probably the best way of showing that the City has always failed of being up to the spirit of the times in which they lived, will be to refer to two or three instances. I would refer to one especially—the New River Company. When Sir Hugh Middleton had ruined himself, he applied to the corporation to assist him. They then had given to them a large jurisdiction over the affairs of the company. By and bye they disposed of their interest in the company, which got into private hands. The shares rose from 100*l.* to 1,700*l.* or 1,800*l.*; and at the present moment not only the citizens of London, but the inhabitants of the whole area supplied by the company, are paying ten times more than they have any business to pay. In those returns you will find a descendant of Sir Hugh Middleton, in consequence of being a descendent, receives from the corporation an annual pension of the sum of 18*l.* a year; whereas Anne Holloway, the widow of a stamper of ale and beer measures, receives 40*l.* a year. That might be taken as a fair sample of how great services are thought of and rewarded. The next case is that of the Gresham College, where we have the greatest merchant of his day, and probably the greatest man of his time of that particular class, bequeathing to the City of London and the Mercers' Company his property in the Royal Exchange, which he had built for the advantage of the merchants, and the whole of his property in the parish of St. Helens, for the purpose of founding a college for the benefit of young men to be trained as merchants. His will is dated as far back as 1575. His widow died in 1596. The property came into the hands of the corporation and the Mercers' Company—lecturers were appointed according to his will, four being appointed by the City and three by the Mercers' Company. It became the most distinguished educational college of the time. Sir Christopher Wren was one of their lecturers, and his rooms were crowded at every lecture, and it became the nucleus for the present Royal Society. The corporation continued for a considerable period in connexion with the college, but by and bye they began to find it was a trouble, and they did not make money out of it. They tried to get rid of it, but Parliament declined. At last, in 1768, the Government requiring some land for the purpose of an excise office, agreed with the corporation and the Mercers' Company, and purchased this land and property for an annual rental or annuity of 500*l.* a year. Now this very plot of ground has been sold this year, realising the sum of 108,000*l.*; so that it is held by some, that in consequence of the negligence of the corporation and the Mercers' Company, and through collusion with the Government at that time, the citizens of London, or the merchants of London, have had alienated from them an amount of money equal to 108,000*l.*, which should have been appropriated to the purposes for which it was left by Sir Thomas Gresham. Being done by Act of Parliament, of course it is no use looking for a return of the money, still it shows how careless the corporation were of the trusts reposed in them. A more serious instance than any was the application of the merchants for more accommodation for the ships arriving in the river Thames. They applied to the Government. The Government referred them to the corporation. They offered the corporation, that, provided they would meet the reasonable demands of the mercantile classes of the metropolis, and provide efficient docks and warehouses, they should have an exclusive privilege as connected with all such buildings and docks from London Bridge as far as Blackwall, or even below that. The corporation as usual declined—they would have nothing to do with it. The merchants, on the other hand, finding it impossible for them to transact their business without such accommodation, associated, formed companies, and provided the accommodation for themselves, and from that day we may consider the great downfall of the corporation to have commenced; because the whole of the mercantile classes in connexion with the shipping, finding that the corporation would not assist them in the matter, they became independent of the corporation, and now spurn them I believe as something loathsome. The same thing occurred in regard to the bridges. There is no bridge which has been built over the Thames for the accommodation of the lateral traffic which has not been opposed by the corporation for years. Again, it will be in the memory of gentlemen present, that the same course was taken in regard to the removal of Smithfield market. The question excited considerable attention. Some members of the corporation formed themselves into a committee and agitated the question thoroughly, and called upon the Government. The Government, following public opinion upon the matter, determined that the centre of the metropolis was an improper place for a market, and the market was in course of time removed. The City took the management of the market, but unfortunately the very persons who had declared over and over again that for the corporation to take the management of such a market would be to cause a great loss to its revenue, and an ultimate loss to the public, are the very persons who are permitted to have the construction of this market; and I have no hesitation in saying that it will cost double the money it ought to have cost, so that the chances are the corporation will be able to fulfil its own prophecy. I believe the market will not be finished for less than 400,000*l.* or 500,000*l.*

F. Bennoch, Esq.

1182. Can you mention any example of a work of general utility which has been voluntarily promoted by the corporation?—I am not aware of any which has been entered into voluntarily. I believe, through some of their members, they endeavoured to remove, and ultimately did remove, Farringdon market from the place where it was formerly held. They have also established one of the finest schools in the whole kingdom—the City schools. But I am not aware of any great public improvement which has ever been suggested or carried out by the corporation of its own accord. The greatest improvement was that of London Bridge; but they were goaded into it by several members of their own body before they gave their consent, and even now there are other bridge proposals into which they are being goaded in the same manner, being very unwilling to give a cordial support to any plan of the kind. The only street which I remember to have been voluntarily made by the City of London, is the new one from the end of London Bridge up to St. Paul's Churchyard, called New Cannon Street, which is one of the last streets that ought to have been constructed. It is a great improvement no doubt, but it is burrowing behind other streets, and only relieving the traffic in Cheapside to bring it into a greater lock in St. Paul's Churchyard. Seeing this difficulty, they have conceived one of the most ridiculous schemes of having a side street from that new street to Blackfriars Bridge, for the purpose of relieving Ludgate Hill. That must either be for the purpose of carrying the traffic down that way, which desires to go over Blackfriars Bridge, and thus avoid Ludgate Hill, or traffic which will go down that street avoiding Ludgate Hill, but which will turn up in the direction of Farringdon Street and create a dead lock again in Fleet Street. This has been shown them over and over again. The City architect and surveyor—a man, who I suppose is unsurpassed by any man in his particular profession—as much as ten or twelve years ago laid down a street, as the one which ought to be first executed in the metropolis, which, I think, seems at once to attach importance to itself, when I name it: it was a continuation of Cheapside straight to the west-end of London; so that we might have three great main lines of street, east and west, without any deviation round St. Paul's Churchyard, and down Ludgate Hill. This seems likely, in all probability, though first in importance, to be the last in execution, if the corporation holds its place. Any great scheme of general importance, seems a thing they are incapable of grasping.

1183. Are you a member of the market committee?—I am not.

1184. Have you any personal knowledge of the arrangements which have been made for the new cattle market?—I know the corporation have bought land, and that they are having it thoroughly drained: the greater portion of it is being walled in. The accommodation for cattle, I believe, will be unexceptionable; and in connexion with that also, they have contracted to construct slaughterhouses, and every other accommodation in connexion with the receipts and sale of cattle, and slaughtering cattle and providing meat.

1185. Did you not express an opinion that the arrangements which have been made are upon an unnecessarily expensive scale?—Yes.

1186. In what respect do you think the expense which has been incurred is unnecessary?—I believe there will be an elaboration of execution, which is totally unnecessary in a place like that. They have bought land for 58,000*l.*, or thereabouts; and when we look at what is required for slaughterhouses and other accommodation, it seems to me to be an enormous amount to swell the sum up to 400,000*l.*

1187. How many acres have they bought?—78 acres.

1188. Does it appear to you that it was necessary to buy 78 acres for the purposes of a cattle market?—It seems to be a very large quantity of land, but I think under all the circumstances it was prudent to buy a sufficient quantity of land, but it was not therefore necessary for them to be extravagant in the construction of other buildings. It was well, I think, to arrange it so as to ensure a space between the market and the houses round about.

1189. Will not a portion of this land be devoted to other purposes than those of a cattle market?—I believe it will be. It will be re-sold on building leases, so as to get the land into a proper shape to accommodate the market itself.

1190. Then the whole of this sum will not be lost to the City?—It will not; but whatever is gained will be a deduction from this 58,000*l.* If they receive 10,000*l.* back, it will only make a difference of 10,000*l.* in the whole expenditure. While referring to the committees, perhaps I had better give the Commission some notion of how the committees themselves are formed, and the inefficiency of the men sometimes appointed to carry out the work referred to them. This has been referred to several times to-day as a grievance. The manner in which they are appointed is this: each member on a committee is appointed for four years. A gentleman may serve two years before he is qualified to become chairman. As one member retires from the committee, another is appointed from among the members of the various wards to supply his place. This being the case, gentlemen are appointed on committees, and have duties to perform, of the nature of which they are altogether ignorant. I need hardly say that the committees have large allowances made to them; some have 400*l.*, some 300*l.*, and some 200*l.*, and so on, to be expended by them. The larger the amount of money to be expended the greater the number of dinners which will be provided; and therefore persons to whom time is of little comparative value have the greatest desire to get into that committee where there is the greatest amount of expenditure. The consequence is, that frequently incompetent men are appointed to committees, and frequently the least competent is appointed to the chairmanship of that particular committee. Because, though the man who has other duties to perform may have time to devote to the public duties of the office of chairman, he has not time, and perhaps he has not the inclination, to devote his evening also, on the occasions of the monthly meetings, to an entertainment at a tavern;—so that a number of gentlemen avoid being in the chair, because of this double call upon them: the call in the day, and the call in the evening as well. Only those whose time is of comparatively little value will consent to be upon the committees; and therefore the least competent will frequently be placed in the most prominent position.

1191. Does it invariably happen that the chairman of a committee for the purposes of business takes the chair at dinners or meetings for convivial purposes?—I believe the gentlemen of the committee would feel themselves greatly slighted if the chairman declined meeting them in the evening also. Indeed, the very fact that there was a possibility of that would prevent his being elected chairman.

1192. Those dinners are paid for out of the corporation funds, are they not?—They are paid for out of the corporation funds.

1193. In what way is the payment managed?—By a vote of the common council. A certain sum of money is placed at the chamberlain's office to the account of a certain committee. All that is required is the signature of the chairman, that so much money has been expended; that document is given to the hall keeper, and he gets the money from the chamberlain's office, and there is an end of the matter.

1194. The tavern bill is of course sent in to some of the officers of the corporation?—The tavern bill, I believe, is generally sent in to the hall keeper.

1195. Is there any audit or examination of those tavern bills?—I think none.

1196. This payment to the committee is considered, is it not, as a sort of remuneration to committee men for their attendance?—At one time they received a certain fee. This was liable to great abuse, because men who desired the money more than to do the duty of the committee, came and had their names entered, as it was called, "above the line," that is, the names were all read over, and then a line drawn. Those who came under the line did not receive any fee. The result was, that men came for the purpose of having their names above the line and then absenting themselves.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1197. Supposing a committee had 300*l.* allotted to it, would it be competent to that committee, instead of spending the money in feasting, to divide it among themselves?—Not exactly that; but if there happens to be a surplus of 25*l.* or 30*l.*, and the chairman has been found to perform his duties well as a man of business, and also in the tavern it is not unlikely he may have a piece of plate presented to him, that piece of plate being paid for by the balance of the money.

1198. Then it is the interest of the members of the committee to see that the charges made at the tavern are moderate, inasmuch as the balance may accrue to themselves?—Yes.

1199. In short, this money is allotted to the committee to spend just as they please?—Yes.

1200. And they might without impropriety divide it among themselves, if they so thought proper?—I do not know that there is any law to prevent their doing so; it is given to them for services rendered.

1201. Do the dinners take place on the days on which they meet for business?—Almost invariably; I might say invariably; and that I take it is the inducement for gentlemen to attend at the monthly meetings of the committee when they hold their great meetings, and go through their most important business, so that they may be able to ensure a full attendance.

1202. The committee receive no other payment except this money, which is in one sum given for the services of the committee?—No other whatever. The argument that it is necessary to give such allowances to induce a sufficient attendance of gentlemen to conduct public business, is an insult to our understandings, and certainly an insult to the citizens of London. I have myself been frequently connected with committees when no remuneration has been allowed, and no allowance has been made for entertainment, and I have invariably found that those have been, if anything, the best attended committees; so that the argument generally used, that it is essential to ensure an attendance, is, I believe, altogether a sham.

1203. When you say they were best attended, do you mean that they were the most numerously attended, or attended by the most competent members?—I would say in both respects they have generally been select committees, and gentlemen have been nominated who were the most competent to give a proper opinion in regard to the question submitted to them, or who had taken a great interest in the question.

1204. What is the total number of committees of the common council in the course of a year?—I think there are about sixteen or eighteen.

1205. So that the whole sum of money paid to those committees is very considerable?—Of the paid committees there are sixteen.

1206. Are you aware what is the total sum of money paid in the nature of an allowance of that kind?—2,900*l.*

1207. Is the practice invariably such as you have described, that this money should be spent mainly in dining together, or are there any committees by whom it is differently disposed of?—I am not aware of its being disposed of in any other manner than for the purpose of entertainment.

1208. Does each committee decide that for itself?—Each committee decides that for itself, but I apprehend it is a question which is never mooted; it is generally understood, and therefore the question is never raised.

1209. How long has this practice prevailed?—The practice has prevailed for a number of years. In connexion with the navigation committee, to which reference has been made to-day, I need hardly say that gentlemen are placed upon the navigation committee who have really scarcely anything else to do. They have perhaps a barge at their command, what is called a shallop, and perhaps another boat or two, and with all the paraphernalia of the harbour master, they go in procession down the Thames, and make a few investigations of a pier here and a rock there; and then, having performed those arduous duties, they retire to Blackwall or Greenwich to enjoy their dinner. The whole thing is a farce. They are men who are utterly incompetent to perform the duties of the office. I have no doubt they desire to perform the duties, but their whole training is of a nature leading to a conclusion that they are of all men the men to whom such duties should not be delegated. For instance, you will find probably a confectioner is chairman, or a gentleman who has been accustomed to sell stockings, or a butcher or a tea dealer,—all very respectable men in their particular professions, and earnestly anxious perhaps to perform their duties; but they have no knowledge practically of the duties which they have to perform.

1210. Have you any reason to doubt the statement made by the preceding witness, that, setting aside the objections that may be raised to the composition of the navigation committee, the practical duties belonging to the conservancy of the Thames are efficiently performed, owing to the judicious selection of the harbour master and other officers?—I believe, under the guidance of the harbour master—who, I believe, though I know nothing of him personally, is a very competent officer—they might perform the duties of the office respectably; but I think it is too much that a mere officer should not only be called upon to declare what should be done, but should have the whole guidance and government of the affair.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1211. It has been suggested that it would be desirable to unite with a certain number of the members of the corporation, members of the Trinity House, and of the different mercantile bodies in London, which would afford the requisite knowledge and experience for superintending a department of this description. Do you think that would be the proper course to follow?—My apprehension is, that the thing could not work for a week, because we should find that the gentlemen thus associated would be of such different habits and dispositions and modes of thought, that they would be unable to work together. With regard to committees, when any gentleman shows himself particularly au fait upon a certain point, the chances are that he will be tabooed and excluded from the committee, because they fancy he has some private interest or some private motive. They are very liable to attribute motives to people who take an independent course; therefore they think it would be improper to have him upon that committee, because he might turn it to his private ends; and they would rather appoint a man who was incompetent than one who should thoroughly understand the question.

1212. Do you mean that it is possible to suppose that a certain number of the members of the corporation, if they were united with gentlemen of knowledge and experience to superintend a department of that kind, could not be brought to act harmoniously with them?—If it could be done independently of the corporation itself, it might do very well; but all the resolutions arrived at in the committee must be reported to the Court of Common Council; so that the recommendations brought up by that committee, even those suggested by gentlemen acquainted with the necessities of the case, might be discussed in the Court of Common Council, and they might be rejected.

1213. You mean that, to carry out such a scheme, it would be necessary to do something more than add to the navigation committee a certain number of members who might be supposed to be acquainted with the subject?—The river Thames, the banks of the river, and its navigation, seem to me to be matters of such great importance, that something, ought to be done to ensure their being referred to a committee who shall be perfectly competent and intimately acquainted with all the necessities of the case.

1214. Does not the regulation of the port of London and of the navigation of the Thames concern the metropolis generally?—Undoubtedly.

1215. Do not you see a difficulty in confiding an interest which concerns the metropolis generally, to the corporation of the City, which is only a small part of the metropolis?—It is most injudicious, in my opinion.

1216. Can any plan, in your opinion, be devised by which the general interests of the metropolis can be safely committed to the corporation of the City?—I do not believe it is in the power of human ingenuity to propose a plan which would give to the corporation of the present City of London a power to conduct its affairs so as to conduce to the advantage of the whole metropolis.

1217. The Commissioners understand your objection to the plan of a mixed committee of the common council, formed partly of members of the common council and partly of representatives of the great mercantile bodies of the metropolis, to be, that its decisions, though they might be right, would be liable to be overruled by the Court of Common Council, which is exclusively a City body?—Just as a committee of the House of Commons may suggest a particular remedy for a particular defect, and it may be overruled in the House of Commons, in consequence of interest.

1218. Your objection resolves itself into this, that the Court of Common Council, as a body, does not adequately represent the interests of the entire metropolis. Is that your meaning?—Quite so. The manner in which their business is conducted would lead any person to the conclusion that they are, as a body, incapable of legislating for the welfare of the whole metropolis.

1219. Would it be possible to form a committee, partly of the members of the common council and partly of representatives of great commercial bodies, which should be independent of the Court of Common Council?—I do not see how that could be done, for this reason, that the members of the Court of Common Council are elected annually, and this committee must be elected annually; so that, at the end of the first year, the whole arrangement might be disturbed.

1220. Would not there be this advantage in keeping up some connexion between the conservancy of the Thames and the corporation, that the improvement of the navigation would be a very proper application of a portion of the funds of the City of London?—I think so; and when I come to give the Commission an outline of the scheme I shall propose, I shall show that, in connexion with the corporation of London as a municipality, and the surrounding municipalities, you may devise a system by which the whole thing might be arranged, and everything accomplished which is desired.

1221. The state of the river is not only a metropolitan but a national concern?—It is. In consequence of some legal difficulties existing at present between the Government and the City, much has been left undone, in connexion with the river, which ought to have been done long ago. I have no doubt it would be discovered by competent surveyors that there are shoals and obstructions in the river which ought to be forthwith removed. But I believe, in consequence of there being some difference of opinion between the corporation and the Government as to whether the bed and soil of the river belong to the City, as conservators of the Thames, or to the Crown, by being exposed at low water, they are now at law upon that point, and the result is that the river is left, to a large extent, to take care of itself. There is another point which is also of importance. Five years ago Blackfriars Bridge was reported to be in a very unsound condition; indeed, it had broken its back. The engineers, Messrs. Walker and Burgess, required that, for the safety of the bridge, large quantities of chalk should be thrown into the water, round the piers, to prevent the bridge falling down. In consequence of throwing so much chalk into the water, the passage of the river was greatly filled up, and sundry accidents arose which the navigation committee had no power to prevent. Thus we have two conflicting jurisdictions—the bridge house committee, to keep up the bridge and fill up the bed of the river, and the navigation committee, to take away that which had been put in for the purpose of sustaining the structure. Now it would unquestionably be better to have the whole of the bridges, and other matters in connexion with the river, under the jurisdiction of a single central committee. As much may be said, and has already been said, in connexion with the money which is expended through the instrumentality of committees, I would advise, above all things, that this Commission should call upon each committee of the corporation to render a faithful account of every item which has been expended for the last ten years. I would call upon the hall keeper to give you an account of every item for which he has paid money during the last ten years; and the Commission should call upon Mr. Scott, the clerk to the chamberlain, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of money which has been so put into the hands of the hall keeper, for purposes in connexion with each committee. You would then have before you, in a tabular form, probably, facts which would lead you to a proper conclusion with regard to the expenditure of each committee; because, in some respects, it is totally impossible to ascertain how the money is expended by the corporation. When you come to the subject of the accounts, I believe I shall bring them before you in a new shape, because I have had associated with me, in endeavouring to make something of these accounts, one of the most intelligent men in the City of London, who has devoted the last two or three weeks to the purpose, in connexion with me; and though we have had great difficulty in coming to a conclusion, we have brought to light things which, I believe, will startle the Commissioners and startle the public. Committees occasionally, under some loose resolution, will come to a determination to adopt some scheme which is undefined, but which is referred to them to carry out. The instance has been referred to by the previous witness of the consolidated committee, in connexion with the Smithfield Market Removal Bill. I happened to be in the opposition in that case, and I desired over and over again to have a return made to the Court of Common Council showing how the money was being expended by that consolidated committee, and under what authority it was being expended, and the amount which had been so expended. I have no hesitation in saying that a very large sum was so expended for which no proper account had ever been rendered to the corporation. No accounts have been before us; we have no clue by which we can arrive at the sum of money expended under a loose authority of this kind. A resolution is made that it shall be referred to a committee to ascertain the best means of giving publicity to the transactions of the corporation. Under this very loose resolution, I discovered that large sums of money were being paid for newspapers which nobody required. Whenever an article appeared in favour of the corporation, that paper was purchased, and distributed freely; but I never found that where an article appeared against the corporation, that paper was purchased; so that they gave us the bane, but not the antidote. You might see the arguments in favour of the corporation, but never those against the corporation. When the return is made which I have suggested, if it be your pleasure to order it, I believe you will discover that in 1849 there was a very large sum of money expended in various ways; some of it in dinners to members of Parliament, to manifest their gratitude for the assistance which the corporation had received in the House of Commons.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1222. To what dinners do you refer?—Certain gentlemen were invited to meet the committee, which was appointed to conduct the opposition to the measure. You will find there were several tavern bills for entertainments of that kind, and at those entertainments several members of Parliament attended.

1223. Was there any such grant made to any committee for the purpose of conducting the opposition to the Smithfield Bill?—I am not aware that there was any special grant. When it is referred to a committee to conduct the opposition to any bill, the remembrancer is then called in, and he appoints some parliamentary agent, who conducts the business; the bill comes in, and is of course paid.

1224. The question does not refer to the expenses of opposing a bill before a committee of the House of Commons, but to a more general opposition which might be conducted by other means. Has there any sum of money been assigned to any committee for the general purposes of opposition?—I think no specific sum has been assigned. It is impossible for me to answer the question. I heard it stated that a sum of money was appropriated to the purpose of conducting the opposition, but I do not believe that any such thing really occurred. What I believe is this, that virtually more than 1,000*l.* must have been expended in conducting the opposition in various ways. Articles were written and sent to newspapers, with a sum of money.

1225. Was that done by any particular committee?—It was done through committees. I have no doubt, or through one of the officers of the corporation.

1226. Do you mean that money was sent with the article to induce the newspaper to insert it?—Probably, instead of its appearing as an advertisement, the newspaper might be induced to allow it to appear as a paragraph.

1227. Do you mean that the money was sent to the newspaper to induce them to do that?—I believe that to be the case.

1228. Can you prove it?—I shall be able to prove it, I have no doubt. I cannot myself, for I did not belong to the committee.

1229. You have no doubt observed a statement which was made at a meeting of the common council, that 150*l.* a year had been the whole of the sum spent in that manner; and that that had been spent merely in purchasing those newspapers which had reported most fully the proceedings of the common council. Do you believe in the accuracy of that statement?—I believe that to be the real fact. I believe it to have been the primary intention of the Court of Common Council to act in the same manner as a large public company would do,—if they find their proceedings are particularly well reported in a paper, they send each of their shareholders a report of those proceedings. It is a thing which is very common in public bodies; and I believe, since attention was called to the fact, that the consolidated committee were extending their authority in regard to this matter; no amount of money has been expended beyond the purchase of those papers.

1230. The statement, which you now make, that you believe money was sent to newspapers to induce them to insert particular articles, is altogether distinct from the one to which I have adverted?—Yes; this must have been three or four years ago, and I think I may say that for three years there has not been a penny expended by that committee in any other way than was described in the Court of Common Council. But I believe they kept back a portion of the truth in regard to the opposition to the removal of Smithfield market. I have called for the items over and over again, but they have been denied to me. We members of the Court of Common Council, though we are presumed to take an equal interest in the affairs of the corporation, unless we belonged to a special committee, have no business to inquire into the proceedings of that committee; if we do, we shall be denied. For instance, with respect to the consolidated committee, I saw a printed paper in the hands of one of the members of the committee, purporting to be a report of the proceedings of this Commission. Desiring to see what occurred day by day, I wrote to the secretary, desiring him to favour me with a copy of those proceedings. I had a very proper reply, stating that when they were printed my request should be laid before the Commission. I then went to the person in whose hands I saw it, and asked how he obtained it. I found it marked "private and confidential," and I found the consolidated committee, to whom is referred the particular object of watching the proceedings of this Commission, had at their own cost, I apprehend, printed them and distributed them merely among the members. I wrote to the chairman, asking him for a copy of those proceedings, to which I received no answer. I then called at the town clerk's office, to ascertain how I could become possessed of them, and was told that they had instructions to deliver them to no one but members of the committee, so that some of the members of the common council have no opportunity of ascertaining really and thoroughly what takes place here.

1231. As a member of the common council have not you a right to move in the Court of Common Council for a return of the proceedings of any one committee, or a return of any other matter affecting the interest of the corporation?—Yes; but if it happens to be a committee which is rather popular, and has a number of people backing it, you might move to all eternity, but would never get an answer.

1232. Still the question would be decided by the common council whether the return should be given or not?—I believe in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a return asked for properly would be granted; but if it is one in which the particular mover is thought to be interested, the spirit of antagonism would be roused, and would prevent the return being made.

1233. Has there been a disposition on the part of the common council to withhold information unduly?—By no means; I believe in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the desire of the common council is to give every information possible to their fellow members; but there are certain circumstances which are anomalous, and which ought to be altered.

1234. Have you any knowledge whether any money was expended under the direction of one of the committees of common council for the purpose of getting up petitions against the removal of Smithfield market?—I have no doubt whatever that a certain sum of money must have been expended, but you have had a gentleman already before you who was then the agent of the corporation, on the subject which was under the particular care of this identical committee. I believe Mr. Acland was engaged by that committee to conduct professionally the opposition to the Government Bill and the generally expressed opinion of the public in reference to that question. I remember, on going into the shed at the top of Cheapside, where there was a model, showing the alterations to be effected in and about Smithfield, Mr. Acland was there as the expounder of the principle, and the expositor of the peculiar plan before us, and the advantages which it would give to the public at large. I have no doubt whatever that that gentleman has the best opportunity of knowing the manner in which the money was expended in connexion with that committee at that particular time.

1235. Have you yourself any knowledge on the subject?—I have no personal knowledge.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1236. Will you proceed with your statement?—I do not know that I need say anything further in regard to the committees. I will now refer to the subject of elections. The elections of common councilmen and aldermen I believe are generally conducted perfectly purely and perfectly honestly. There can be no ground on the part of the common councilmen to expend money to be returned to the court, inasmuch as they are elected annually; but there is occasionally ground for an alderman expending money, because he has been held to be elected for life; and that bribery to a considerable extent has occurred in connexion with those elections there is no manner of doubt. As it is better probably that one case should be taken and substantiated, if possible, I would refer to a case in Bread Street. I refer to it the more readily, because it has been contradicted by some gentleman on the bench while sitting as a magistrate. An election for an alderman took place some fourteen years ago in Bread Street Ward, when the candidates were Mr. Hughes Hughes and Mr. Lawrence, a lawyer, residing in the same ward. There was great competition and great agitation. Men qualified to vote were admitted on the morning of the election in great numbers. A scrutiny was demanded, and ultimately Mr. Hughes Hughes was seated; but a very large sum of money was expended on that election. It was stated by a previous witness here, that Mr. Alderman Lawrence was the candidate; the mistake was simply in the name. It was not Alderman Lawrence, but a Mr. Lawrence, who was a solicitor, and who is since dead. On the death of Mr. Hughes Hughes, Alderman Lawrence was nominated and elected without opposition. I know with respect to the office of Lord Mayor, when Alderman Thomas Wood was a candidate against Sir George Carroll, a very large sum of money was expended on his account, unfortunately for some of his friends, not by himself but by them; and one man with whom I was acquainted became security for a sum of money for the purposes of bribery. Certain money in such cases is put into the hands of gentlemen whose trade it is to be active at elections. They agree to bring up a certain number of voters. Those voters come up and sometimes carry the day, and sometimes they do not. On this occasion Mr. Alderman Wood lost the election by about ten votes only. I know that a large sum of money was expended, and I know one of his securities, in consequence of the amount for which he became responsible, was ruined, being unable to meet the obligations for which he had become liable.

1237. Do you believe that bribery is frequently practised at present in the election of aldermen?—I should think not, further than by means of what has become I suppose now a City peculiarity. There are certain gentlemen who consider that they have, and who probably have, the control of a great number of liverymen, and I must say that the lower class of the livery of London seem to me to be of the very lowest description. The pretence of a certain amount of payment is, that poor men cannot afford to give up their day's work, and they therefore must be paid to attend at the Guildhall; and there are gentlemen who seem to have no other possible means of livelihood than by trading with these men and living on this corruption.

1238. Are you now speaking of elections for aldermen?—No. I am speaking of the elections in common hall.

1239. You say that the elections of aldermen, generally speaking now, are free from bribery?—I think so.

1240. In cases where there is anything objectionable, does it generally take place in the smaller wards or the larger wards?—I apprehend the largeness or smallness of the ward would be of very little importance in reference to that matter; but I am not aware that in recent times bribery to any extent has taken place. The elections in common hall are very anomalous. In the first place, the livery elect the Lord Mayor; the freemen elect the aldermen, but the liverymen elect from among the aldermen the gentleman who is to be the Lord Mayor; so that here we have two descriptions of voters. Again, the livery can elect the sheriff, and to that office as the Commissioners are aware there is a penalty for non-servitude. But the common council can excuse the payment of that fine, though they have nothing to do with the election. Again, the livery elect the chamberlain of London, but he is only accountable to a committee of the corporation. So soon as the election is over the livery have no longer any control whatever over the doings of the chamberlain. In like manner they elect the bridge masters, who also account to the committee of the corporation, and have nothing to do with the livery from the moment of their election. I cannot understand why the livery should be so exceedingly jealous in regard to the election of those officers, because, so soon as they are elected, they are no longer under their control, but under the control of the corporation; it seems to me to be fighting for a shadow.

1241. The livery seem to have nothing to do except that they elect in common hall to certain offices?—That is all; only it happens that those gentlemen are nominally elected every year; they are not elected for life, but they come before the livery every year, and if there be any misdemeanour or anything which is considered to be improper, or contrary to what is expected of them, the livery have the right of rejecting the person whom they previously elected, and bringing forward some one else in his place.

1242. Is that election under the statute of the 11th George I.?—I think it is; it is one which occupies a great number of days.

1243. Do you see any advantage in keeping up the plan of election in common hall?—Not the slightest.

1244. As you would abolish that form of election, in what way would you cause those officers to be elected?—In the first place there should be only one constituent body. In the next place they should elect members to represent them; and all officers who were under the control of the corporation in the common council assembled, should be elected by the common council. That seems to me to be a simple mode of arriving at a good result.

1245 That would have the effect of destroying the common hall elections altogether?—It would have the effect of destroying the common hall, as now understood, altogether. In fact the common hall for a number of years, instead of being a benefit, has been a nuisance. Perhaps, while speaking of the common hall, it may be well that I should refer for a moment to the livery companies. I hope the time is not far distant when either this or some similar Commission will be empowered to go into the question of the companies generally, and examine them in the same manner as you are now inquiring into the corporation of London. For every corruption that you find in the corporation, I believe you would find still more in the companies. The livery connected with the companies assuming to have this power over certain officers connected with the corporation, it would be well to ascertain whether they are what they pretend to be. It is quite within the knowledge of gentlemen present, that the livery companies are no longer what they pretend to be; they are no longer the protectors or guardians of the particular branch of trade under whose name they happen to act. The goldsmiths are no longer goldsmiths. The fishmongers are no longer fishmongers. They have become a private charitable company, with large funds; and instead of those funds being appropriated for the advantage of a particular trade, whose name they bear, they are expended in what they call making themselves comfortable. That is a phrase which was used a short time ago by a gentleman who died and left a sum of money to his company for the purpose, as he said, of making themselves comfortable. The reason I refer to those companies is this: that in consequence of birth and servitude and the payment of very small fines, persons become connected with the companies, and constitute the livery of London, and through them I believe nine-tenths of all the corruption which exists is introduced into the elections.

1246. You propose altogether to cut off the connexion between the companies and the municipal body of the corporation?—Entirely. They should have no independent authority whatever in connexion with these proceedings. I might also suggest that I think it would be desirable and wise that gentlemen who are acknowledged to have been employed by various candidates for office in the corporation, should be examined. I apprehend you have no power to call upon them to criminate themselves; but as there is no likelihood of any criminal proceedings being carried on, it might be well to call upon some of those gentlemen to come before you.

1247. What is the next point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—Here a similar anomaly exists to that which I have shown in regard to elections in common hall. Freemen are capable of electing members of common council, not being liverymen. Then again, persons who are freemen and not on the parliamentary register cannot vote for members of the commo ncouncil. By an Act which was passed about six years ago, it was made an essential element in the qualification of a voter, that he should be on the parliamentary register. So that there are freemen who used to vote who cannot now vote, because they are no longer on the register, and there are people on the register who cannot vote as liverymen. The reason why the constituencies are so exceedingly small, and why gentlemen will not take up their freedom is this, that they do not like to do anything by compulsion; and I believe if the corporation were to bring down the cost of the freedom to a penny, there would be a great many who would oppose it on principle, just as there were gentlemen who opposed the payment of 1*s.* to be put on the register, on the passing of the Parliamentary Reform Bill; so that the only way of getting a proper constituency of electors is to establish some law by which all men of a certain position, paying certain rates and occupying certain premises, should have the right of exercising the franchise I believe there is no other way in which you can by possibility arrive at that result. I would abolish all special rights and privileges, and have only one constituent body.

1248. Do you think the qualification under the General Municipal Reform Act would be a proper one for the City of London?—I do not see any objection to it, though if it can be simplified so much the better. I would not make it necessary that people should appear on the parliamentary register, because the neglect of overseers or parish officers may disfranchise men who have the right to vote. I would require that every man resident and paying rates should be qualified to vote, whether he was on the parliamentary register or not.

1249. Not speaking of the parliamentary register, you think in general that the qualification which prevails in the boroughs, under the Municipal Reform Act, would be a proper one in the City of London?—I think it would.

1250. Is there any point on which you wish to make further remarks to the Commission?—I would abolish all special privileges, such as the privileges claimed by the livery, and all metages which have been purchased by individuals who do no service but receive the pay, hiring certain persons to conduct the duty, and taking advantage of the balance, whatever that may be. An instance of that occurs in the case of the oyster meters, where gentlemen have purchased the right of measuring oysters, who never themselves in their lives measured oysters, and perhaps could not open one. They employ certain persons to do the duty, and their income arising from that is exceedingly large.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

15th Nov. 1853.

1251. Could you abolish offices of that sort, without making compensation to the holders?—I think that all offices which have been purchased, must be compensated for; and one of the wisest things done by the corporation is, that they have abolished, for many years, all offices by purchase.

1252. In the case of these oyster meters, as the appointments fall in, what do the corporation do?—The corporation appoint some person to do the work, and he receives the money. The question of the corn dues has been repeatedly before the corporation. Alderman Muggeridge has taken great interest in that question, and I think his evidence would be exceedingly valuable in connexion with that particular point. The result has been shown to be, that ships are driven from the Thames to the Severn, because, in the one case, they can clear their cargo for 14*l.* or 15*l.*, whereas in the other case it costs 50*l.* or 60*l.*

1253. Do the corporation of the City of London claim the right under their metage privilege of measuring goods, where the party does not wish them to be measured?—They claim the right of measuring all goods which come into the port of London.

1254. Does that right extend to cases where the importer does not wish them to be measured, as well as cases where he does wish it?—I believe it applies to all corn intended for home consumption. I am not aware whether it applies to corn received into this market and again exported.

1255. Do you believe that the grant of metage to the City was originally intended as an accommodation to the public, or was it intended to be used as a right of the City against the public?—I have no doubt it was originally granted to the corporation in the same manner as the stamping of measures and weights, as a defence to the public against the possible deception of other parties. They stood like brokers, as measurers between the seller and the buyer, to prevent any deception and to ensure honesty.

1256. In your view of the case, it was intended as an accommodation to those who wished to have their corn properly measured?—Undoubtedly.

1257. Do you conceive it was intended that the City should force their measurement upon persons who were reluctant?—I think not.

1258. Do you know the manner in which they exercise the right; are they in the habit of requiring persons to submit to their measurements who do not wish that their goods should be measured?—I believe there is no doubt of the fact, that they require all persons to have their goods measured by the measurers, and they receive the dues thereon. Alderman Muggeridge has gone into this question fully, and will be able to answer every question in connexion with the metage on corn.

1259. Is there any other part of the subject upon which you wish to address any remarks to the Commission?—I think the tolls taken by the City should be abolished.

1260. Would you abolish the tolls taken by the City upon carts, and all vehicles entering the City?—Yes; there is an argument frequently raised against the disturbance of those tolls, which, in my opinion, is the strongest argument in favour of their being removed. It is said you will have poor people from Bethnal Green, coming through the City with their donkey carts, causing obstruction to the public thoroughfares, which even now are too narrow. I think, if it be right for the owners of large waggons to take the nearest way through the City, from one point to another, it is still more necessary that poorer men from Bethnal Green should have the same privilege of going through the City, instead of going round it. If a person from Finsbury or Shoreditch desires to go to Covent Garden Market, he must go with a horse and cart round the boundary of the City, and perhaps make a detour of two or three miles.

1261. Is the amount of the toll more than 2*d.*?—I think not; but when people are in the habit of going frequently through the streets, it becomes a very important matter.

1263. Do you think the toll of 2*d.* is likely to deter many carts from entering the City?—It is disliked, chiefly in consequence of the annoying manner in which it is levied. If they had a toll-bar, and men stationed to show you that there was a toll to be paid, people might do as they liked about passing it; but in driving along, to see a man jump out and demand 2*d.* is very annoying. It is not so much the amount of the money, as it is the great interruption which is caused to the traffic of the public streets.

1264. Are those tolls leased out by the City?—I rather think they are leased by the City, but upon that point I am not certain.

1265. Is there a toll upon carriages as well as upon carts?—None; the inconvenience is particularly grievous in this respect. It not unfrequently happens that persons residing beyond the limits of the City, as tradesmen, and driving their own little carts, come as near the City as they possibly can for the goods which they are about to purchase, and keep their carts just outside the gateway, and come into the City to purchase what they require. In consequence of that inconvenience, a number of people have established themselves, in certain trades, just beyond the City bar, and they have, to a great extent, an advantage which is not enjoyed in the City. The exaction therefore, operates to the disadvantage of the City itself, the inhabitants of which are injured, because people are prevented going into the City to buy their goods in consequence of the toll.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M. P., IN THE CHAIR.

JOHN CATTLEY, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows :—

John Cattley, Esq.
16th Nov. 1853.

1266. You are a merchant of the City of London, are you not?—I am.

1267. In what branch of trade?—I am a general merchant; formerly chiefly in the Russian trade; latterly I have been more in the East India trade.

1268. Do you reside in the City?—I have a house in the City, but I have not resided in the City for many years, I should say for nearly thirty years.

1269. Are you not also chairman of the London Dock Company?—I am; I still hold that office.

1270. How long have you held that office?—Nearly twenty years.

1271. Have you ever been connected with the corporation?—Never in any way connected with it. I was twice elected a member of the Court of Common Council, but I declined to serve. I have been twice in my life pressed to accept an alderman's gown, but I have also declined to accept that on both occasions.

1272. Have you any objection to state what was your motive in declining?—My motive was that I was really too busy, I could not spare the time; I should otherwise have had no objection. It is flattering to be selected by your neighbours for those offices; but the fact is, I was too much engaged, and could not spare the time.

1273. Have you paid any attention to the affairs of the corporation?—Only the ordinary attention of an old inhabitant taking a considerable interest in what was going on.

1274. Have you any observations which you are desirous of addressing to the Commissioners in regard to the corporation generally?—My impression is rather favourable to the corporation as it is constituted, particularly as respects the magistracy. I think we merchants, who are not freemen, are fortunate in having such a body who take upon themselves the charge of the protection of the very large class who benefit by that protection, without being subjected to many of the duties which might be imposed upon us.

1275. Have you had any means of forming a judgment of the manner in which the aldermen discharge their duties as magistrates?—Yes, I have; and I think from long observation that the way in which they have discharged those duties is exceedingly favourable. I think they would bear a favourable comparison with any set of magistrates, either with county magistrates or paid magistrates, or any others. They are assisted by a very able assessor at both of the courts in the City; and I think any gentleman who is in the habit of reading the examinations there, would say generally they are conducted with great shrewdness and skill. I believe, perhaps, a very fair test would be this: the convictions are greater, in proportion to the commitments, than from any other jurisdiction. I think magistrates who have so much practice, and especially their assessors, are very good judges of petty larcenies, and those kind of things, which come before them.

1276. Do you think the manner in which the aldermen of the City administer justice is equally satisfactory to that in which it is administered by the paid police magistrates, who have had professional education, employed in the rest of the metropolis?—I really do think so. I think it will bear a very favourable comparison with it. I do not mean to say that the aldermen have any particular talent for the office, but they have the benefit of such good clerks, or assessors, that substantial justice is done.

1277. Is it your view that they principally act upon the advice of their assessors?—I think they must do so chiefly. Of course nine-tenths of the cases are cases of common sense, in which they are as shrewd as other people. I myself have acted as a county magistrate for a great many years; and I think I should almost be flattered by being put in comparison with a good many magistrates in the City, fashionable as it is to run them down. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, that there is an attempt got up, by those who who would very much like their offices, to laugh them down if they can.

1278. Do you think there is any practical advantage in the system adopted in the City, of justice being administered by aldermen with competent assessors, over the system that prevails in the rest of the metropolis, of paid magistrates of acknowledged fitness?—I think they are better because they are unpaid; and I think their decisions are quite as good. I should be sorry to see unpaid magistrates dispensed with. I think the same observation might apply to the county magistrates.

1279. Are not the assessors you speak of in the City paid?—The assessors are paid.

1280. On the whole, is the system of the unpaid magistracy in the City more economical than that of paid magistrates in the rest of the metropolis?—I should think it is. I think it is more economical at all events to persons who, like nine-tenths of the inhabitants who live there, get the full benefit of it and do not contribute to it. All the expense is paid from the corporation funds. I think we merchants who reside there, and do not take upon ourselves the duties, are very much benefited.

1281. Do you think it would be desirable that the corporation should be connected more closely with the higher class of merchants than it is at present?—Undoubtedly, it would be better; but I have not myself been able to discover any way by which we can induce the higher classes to take upon themselves the duty; they cannot spare the time. I am sure that gentlemen in the highest stations are so busy that they will not make the sacrifice; perhaps they ought to do so; I think we ought to bear our share of the burdens of the City.

1282. At all events it would imply a very considerable sacrifice to the leading merchants in the way of business to accept a municipal office?—Quite so; it is quite out of the question; there have been a few exceptions, and in the case of busy men too, but I suppose they have a little liking for it—our friend Alderman Thompson is one; I do not know but he is as regular as others; he has been for a great many years a magistrate of the City, and I suppose takes his share of the duties.

1283. As a merchant have you ever had reason to complain of the corporation, or of any vexation which they have caused you?—No, I have not much; there are some few little complaints made; I am very much connected with the docks; the fellowship porters, and some of those institutions, are complained of by other parties, but we do not suffer from them. We tried the question some time ago, and we do not allow them to enter into our docks. We use the City meters and the City gaugers in the docks, or rather the public use them; the dock company cares nothing about them, they have nothing to do with it; they do the work for the merchant, but the merchant is glad to avail himself of a third check on his measurements and his gaugings. There are only a few articles on which they are employed. If I bring in a cargo of olive-oil, and sell it to a buyer, I am glad to have the benefit of the City gauger as to the quantity. The charge is very small, and we willingly pay it; he is a sworn officer, and may be depended on.

1284. Is that employment of the City gaugers compulsory or optional?—It is optional with us; they do not make any charge unless we ask for them.

1285. You might do without them if you pleased?—Yes; we could do as they do at most of the outports. I will instance the case of oil: that is weighed at almost every port in England except London—in London the old fashion of gauging prevails. I should say it is an absurd fashion, but that is not the fault of the corporation, it is the doing of the buyers of the article very much. At Hull and Liverpool the article is weighed, and it is all calculated by weight and tare, instead of being measured by gauge.

1286. It has been suggested to the Commission, by some of the witnesses, that it would be desirable that what is called a chamber of commerce should be established in London, in some degree connected with the corporation, but having upon it members who might more thoroughly represent the great mercantile interests of London. Do you think it would be useful that some such body should be constituted?—I think it would be useful on many occasions. I think there have been many plans got up for chambers of commerce within a few years, by adventurers, which have never succeeded; and I do not wonder that they have not succeeded. The fact is, we cannot help seeing that if they were established there would be some job of their own; and we should be very soon forced, I have no doubt, for want of the necessary funds, to give up such an establishment. I think if in the corporation there were a chamber established, and skilled officers appointed, it might be beneficial, because it would ensure something like stability and perpetuity. I merely want the chamber of commerce as a medium of communication with the Government on grievances; not to teach us our trade, or anything of that kind.

1287. You do not mean a chamber of commerce in the sense of a tribunal, but a chamber of commerce in the form of a representation of the commerce of London, which might communicate with the Government and other parties?—Yes; if I had a grievance, or what I considered was one, it would be a great convenience to me to be able to go to an authorized chamber of that kind, who would represent it calmly and properly to the Government, so that justice might ultimately be done. It would be the accredited medium of such communications.

1288. Do you think a plan might be devised by which the corporation might furnish the funds, and be represented in such a chamber, while the necessary knowledge of trade might be provided for by appointing members derived from the great mercantile bodies connected with the metropolis?—Yes, you might add many members in that way. I think if the corporation would find the funds, it would be a very useful application of them to that extent. I do not think it would necessarily be costly.

1289. Do you think the corporation have in general shown a disposition to stand forward for the purpose of promoting measures which were generally useful either to trade or to the public?—I think they have. I have resided in the City fifty years, and I cannot help, every day that I am walking the streets, contrasting the City as it is with what I have known it. They may be occasionally slow, but I think they do their work well. I would instance the paving; I think that is unequalled. I wish they had the jurisdiction of Whitehall, for in getting here to-day, one was in danger of breaking one's neck. I think there is nothing to compare with their pavements. I think their sewerage is very good; and I would as soon live, in point of health, in the very heart of the City, at the end of Moorgate Street, where I have an office, as anywhere in London, on account of the perfect ventilation, the good sewerage and pavement, and efficient cleansing in every way.

1290. The City has natural advantages in point of soil and elevation over the river, has not it?—It has.

1291. How do the corporation manage the conservancy of the river?—I think pretty well. The only way in which I have had to do with them has been in connexion with the docks; we of course have intercourse with them about buoys and so on. I think they have generally met us fairly. They take care of their own interests. If we have a buoy to put down at the entrance of the dock, it is generally a matter of negotiation who shall pay the cost, and I am bound to say that I think they have met us pretty fairly. Sometimes we think we pay too much, but we have not much cause to complain. Their object is directed to keep the river clear, and so on. I have sometimes heard of little obstructions produced by projections into the river by wharfs; they are charged sometimes with favouritism to persons making applications to them, but I am not aware that there is any foundation for it.

1292. Do you know anything of the fitness of the harbour masters?—Yes. In the last session of Parliament we obtained an Act for enlarging our docks, and it was our business to negotiate with the corporation, and I saw the harbour masters; there had been considerable difficulties; the Admiralty raised some difficulty; but when we came face to face, we settled everything quickly and amicably. Their opposition to our Bill was withdrawn when they came to understand what we wanted, and they gave us every reasonable facility.

1293. Do you think it is desirable that the body which superintends the navigation of the river Thames should contain within it some members of professional knowledge more competent to understand the subject than a committee of the common council can possibly be?—I think so; it might be improved. The members of the committee, which is a very large one, cannot really know anything about the navigation of the river. They are generally taken from the class of small tradesmen, and cannot know at any rate much about it. The proper persons to appoint in connexion with the harbour masters—who, I am bound to say, are intelligent painstaking men—I think would be such men as the dock masters of the different docks, who are very much interested; they are sailors to begin with, and they are interested in getting ships up the river to their different establishments in the best way. That I think would be a class of men who would be very beneficial.

1294. Have you had any experience of the proceedings of the navigation committee of the common council?—The negotiation I refer to was with them. I met a very large committee, and after the necessary explanations had been given, we got through very satisfactorily.

1295. Do you contemplate the formation of a mixed committee?—If I am asked what would be the best committee, I think it would be one composed of a certain number of harbour masters, and some members probably of the common council, including others connected with the shipping interests of London. I mention the dock masters because they are as a whole a remarkably intelligent class of men; we have had the benefit in the London docks, for the last twenty years, of a man who I think could not be surpassed in point of intelligence—Captain Maugham. I think if I wanted to ask a question on any point connected with the river, I should regard him as the highest authority in London. I would pledge myself sooner to his opinion than to that of any man I know.

1296. Do you think a mixed committee so formed would act harmoniously together?—I see no reason why they should not. I think, in general, some one man would soon display the talent which would lead to his being chairman, and having the largest share of influence. I think the committee, of their own accord, would generally choose those who knew most on the subject, and were the most intelligent.

1297. Upon whose advice does the committee for navigation mainly rely at present?—I should think on that of the harbour master.

1298. In truth, they themselves can have no knowledge on the subject, and they must resort to professional men?—It must be so.

1299. You stated that the harbour masters you believed to be efficient officers, and very well selected?—Very much so.

1300. You have stated that the fellowship porters are excluded from the London docks?—Yes; by our Act we do all the labour within the dock; we have various reasons for that; we do not choose to admit persons who are not responsible to us, and for whom we should be answerable in case of pilferage, and so on, within our docks. Another reason is, that we have done so much for the public, that we think we are entitled to what little profit there is on the labour ourselves.

1301. The corporation have submitted to your claim to supervise your own porterage?—We have no trouble with them on that subject. In fact, as we have our own labourers, it would be hardly possible that they could divide the labour done on board a ship in the dock from that done on shore.

1302. Does your exemption rest upon a special Act of Parliament?—Yes; I think we have some clause in our Act of the kind, but I am not quite certain.

1303. You stated that the City meters were persons skilled in meting, and that it was a convenience to employ them?—I rather applied that answer to the City gaugers. The metage is done in this way: it applies to fruit and onions and roots. A large portion of the fuit is not landed in the docks, and therefore we do not see it. As to what there is, I think the City meters in connexion with us are almost nominal. We take the quantities with the Custom-house officers, and I believe in practice they receive our account. With the gaugers it is different; the gauger must measure and guage every cask, and we are glad to have his check in addition to the two which we have. We know if a Custom-house officer and our officer take it together, they are rather apt to copy each other's numbers; and I, as a merchant, am glad to have a third perfectly disinterested party to check them.

John Cattley, Esq.

16th Nov. 1853.

1304. Does not the City privilege of metage apply to corn as well as to fruit?—It does.

1305. Would a corn ship unloading in the London docks be subject to be meted by the City?—Yes; but it is a very small matter. We apply for a licence, which costs 4*s.* or 5*s.*, and which is obtained from the Mansion House. We then get a meter. It is a somewhat clumsy operation, but still the buyer and the seller are content to abide by it, and we are glad to pay it to get rid of the cargo as fast as we can.

1306. Does the City meter actually measure the corn?—He does.

1307. And the gauger actually gauges?—He does.

1308. Your view is, that the City meters and gaugers are an accommodation and an advantage to the public, on account of their skill and their probity where the importer wishes to avail himself of their services?—Yes, I say so; particularly as to the gaugers. There is no skill exercised by the meters, and it is a matter almost of indifference. As to the fellowship porters, they are rather in the way of improvements out of the docks.

1309. The Commission has been informed that in some cases the City enforce their claim as meters where an importer does not wish his goods to be measured?—That would be surplusage. I have no doubt if I were to communicate with the City and say, "These are my own goods, I will not call upon you for the labour of measuring them"—they would acquiesce. I apprehend the City only claim the privilege because they believe they have a right to claim it.

1310. Do you think it desirable that they should retain that right of forcing themselves upon an unwilling importer?—Certainly not. We who import cargoes for sale want them measured; the case referred to can only apply to one case out of a thousand. I think I recollect the case of the brewers who had a malting at Ipswich, and imported for themselves. I do not know whether the City is right or the brewers are right, but it is a very disagreeable thing to have 1,000*l.* a year to pay, which I see they estimate it at. I do not think, however, that would be an answer to the City if they believe they have the right.

1311. Is it the case, that in the Act which constitutes your dock there is a clause providing compensation for the fellowship porters?—I am not sure whether the original Act does provide compensation. I think we gave almost every one compensation; that Act is forty-five years old.

1312. Have you had any dispute with the porters on the subject of compensation?—Not for the last twenty years, since I was chairman.

1313. What do you think of the separation of the City police from the general metropolitan police?—Some ten years ago I myself took the trouble to write a letter on the subject of the police. The City was then properly called a city of refuge for thieves out of the City; they ran into the City, where they were safe. I do not mean to say that my application did any good; but about six or seven years ago the system was altered to this extent: they gave the police out of the City and the police in the City concurrent jurisdiction, so that they now pursue them. The evil, therefore, is very much lessened at all events. The only objection that I should have, living in the City, to the whole being put under one jurisdiction would be this: the City is of small area—there is an enormous property to be protected—people do not very much live in the City as they do in the outskirts—and I am afraid, if we were all under the metropolitan police, we should only get as many men to a square mile as they do in other directions. I believe at present we get twice as many as is given in the other directions, and I think we have not too many. If we had to pay for them all we might find it a hardship, but I believe we are not taxed more than they are out of the City, the City funds going to make up the difference.

1314. The watching which you mentioned would be required principally at night, would not it?—Very much at night.

1315. During the day are not the great thoroughfares in the City more thronged than those in other parts of the town?—Very much more. At dividend times there are thieves always on the watch, and we require a very much larger number of police than would be required in any other part.

1316. Would not it be possible to retain the present proportions and at the same time bring them all under one central authority?—I think a central authority would be good. I have myself spoken privately to the present commissioner of police for the City, and I think he would not differ with me on that subject. I told him once that I thought they ought all to be under one head. I know there are difficulties, one of them being what I have stated, that we wanted in the City a much greater proportion than is required in other parts. I cannot say too much in favour of the metropolitan police, for it was my duty within the last twenty years to make an arrangement of this kind: the system of watchmen prevailed at one time all over the docks, and I applied to the metropolitan commissioners to allow us to have the metropolitan police. On certain conditions they allowed it, and they allotted us about thirty men. We have had these thirty men now for something like fourteen or fifteen years, and it is impossible for any class of men to give greater satisfaction than they have done.

John Cattley, Esq.

1317. Are the London docks within the City?—No; without the City. The ground we took was this: they said, "We have no jurisdiction, it being a private establishment." I said, "There is a public road through it." On that ground they took us in. I believe they would not have done so if we had not shown that you might walk in at one gate and out at the other, saving a mile perhaps. Yesterday, in fact, we passed a resolution at the London dock recommending that certain small gratuities should be presented to the police in our establishment, and that a letter should be written to the commissioners, mentioning the remarkably good conduct of the police during the strike that we have had.

1318. Do not you think that it is probable that the separation of the City police from the rest of the metropolitan police must tend on the whole to increase the expense of the establishment?—I think there would be economy produced by consolidation; but still if we lost our present protection we should not like it.

1319. Would there not be some saving from a diminution of the expense of the staff attached to the separate office, supposing the number of men who watched the streets remained the same?—The chief commissioner might be dispensed with, and so perhaps might a clerk or two. I doubt whether they would be able to save much from a reduction in the number of inspectors.

1320. Is there anything else to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—No; I do not think there is anything else. We who do not contribute to the funds think, at least I think, that we are indebted to the City for laying out the funds of their large estates in improvements by which we are benefited.

1321. You are not a freeman, are you?—No.

1322. Did you ever receive a summons to take up your freedom?—I have received many.

1323. What did you do with them?—At first I knew I was one of thousands, and I did nothing. I said, "When you take up the whole you will have a good large body, and we shall make the best fight we can." I think this occurred soon after one of those occasions when they pressed me to take the alderman's gown. I was then living in the City, and they said, "We must make an example of a few persons who are notoriously doing a large business. It is hard to compel poor people to take up their freedom while you escape." I said, "Well, you must do what you please. I decline to take up my freedom." I did not wish to be liable to the office of sheriff, and I did not wish to be an alderman; in fact, I was too busy. There was an old book published at a place called the Steel Yard, which was a sort of guide for foreign merchants, and I said, "I consider myself, in the sense in which the word is used, a foreigner in London. I am not a freeman." After that the matter dropped.

1324. When did this take place?—Within the last seven years, I think.

1325. Then, in fact, you have received numerous summonses, but they have never been enforced?—They have never been enforced. I do not myself think they could have enforced them. I took some pains about it at the time, and my impression was that I should have stood a trial, even if I did so alone.

1326. You think they could not have enforced it upon you as a wholesale merchant?—Certainly, I have no shop, I import cargoes, and I merely have my counting-house. I had a dwelling-house then to be sure, but nothing but a counting-house for the purpose of trade.

J. C. Gooden, Esq.

James C. Gooden, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1327. You are desirous of appearing before this Commission in connexion with the conservancy of the Medway by the corporation of the City of London?—I am.

1328.—Will you have the goodness to state to the Commission what has induced you to pay particular attention to that subject?—I have been a yachtsman and a sketcher for many years. During that time continually one has heard of vast devastations upon the land being committed by the water, in those districts which are submitted to the conservancy of the City of London in the Medway. The constant repetition of these at length induced me to address Sir Francis Beaufort on the subject. He, in consequence of my letter, ordered an examination of the river between 1850 and 1851, and the conclusions resulting from those surveys are, I believe, of the greatest importance to this kingdom, as I believe they involve possibly the future existence of Chatham Dockyard. I believe that the powers of the conservancy of the City of London are entirely misunderstood. If we go back to Stowe, in the edition of 1618, we have there detailed the duties of the conservancy as laid down by the common serjeant at a sessions of the conservancy held at Gravesend in 1616. It is there specially rehearsed, that the care of the sea walls was a most important point of their business—the sustentation of the embankments and walls. Going back again to Dugdale, we find several appointments of commissioners for these districts. It was a most solemn charge given to the City of London from the earliest times, that the sea walls should be sustained, in order that the navigation of the river should be kept in a state of perfection. I am perfectly competent, from the Admiralty charts, to show that this district was walled or embanked. There was a committee of the House of Commons in 1820 to consider the subject of the rapid shoaling of the reach as you approach Chatham Dockyard.

J. C. Gooden, Esq.

1329. Will you have the goodness to state, in as general terms as you can, what you believe to be the existing grievance, and what you would point out as the remedy?—I believe, in consequence of neglecting the embankments, very great disasters will ensue.

1330. Your charge is, that the City, as conservators of the river Thames and the river Medway, have not properly maintained the embankments of the Medway?—They have not properly maintained the embankments in either river, and in the Medway that is producing great disasters. The expansion of the water causes the tide to cease, and that results in stuffing the upper reaches with mud, which is disintegrated from the City lands.

1331. You are not a civil engineer, are you?—No; but I have attended to this subject for some years.

1332. Have the City ever done anything for the maintenance of the banks of the Medway?—I am not aware that they ever did anything of the kind.

1333. Was there ever a time when they appear to have applied any part of their funds to the embankment of the Medway?—I have been quite unable to trace anything of the kind.

1334. It is clear that they are under an obligation to do so?—I think it is clear from that charge of the common serjeant in 1616.

1335. By whom were the embankments originally made?—That is too difficult a question to go into. I think they have existed as far back as we can trace. In Edward III.'s time, he owned embankment marshes there, and the rehearsal in Dugdale occurs, that the whole of this district was governed by the law of Romney Marsh, which presupposes that there was embanked land.

1336. Do you consider the banks of the Thames, within the jurisdiction of the City, to be out of repair?—There has been a considerable waste of land in Gravesend Reach; about eighty acres appear to have been lost in a single parish since the reign of Elizabeth.

1337. When did you first call the attention of the Admiralty to the injurious consequences of the neglect of the banks of the Medway?—In 1850.

1339. If necessary, therefore, the Commission can obtain from the Admiralty most authentic and complete information as to what occurred?—Yes, I think so.

1340. Supposing the reparations of the banks of the Thames and the Medway, which you consider desirable, were made, would it be necessary to expend a large sum of money?—The basin of the Medway here is utterly lost. The whole lands of the Medway are utterly disintegrated. It only exists as an archipelago of marsh islands now.

1341. What is it you think the City ought to do?—I do not think it is competent to do anything,—it is principally as to what they have not done that I come forward.

1342. Your object is to show that they had certain duties, as to the embankment of the Thames and the Medway, which were not performed, and, not having been performed, irreparable mischief has been done?—And that serious consequences are threatening the dockyard.

1343. But now nothing can be done to repair the injury to the lands?—My impression is, that it is quite hopeless, and I speak also the impression of Captain Bullock at the same time.

1344. You have no practical measure to suggest which the City could now adopt?—None which the City would adopt. It is quite hopeless, I believe.

G. A. Wallis, Esq.

GEORGE APPLETON WALLIS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1345. You are one of the sheriffs of the City of London?—I am.

1346. How long have you been connected with the corporation?—I have only been connected with the corporation as the sheriff of London, but I have been a citizen of London all my life, at least from the age of twenty-one years.

1347. Are you a member of the common council?—I am not.

1348. Are you a freeman of the City?—A freeman and a liveryman.

1349. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commissioners any point to which you desire to call their attention?—I am placed in a very peculiar position, and I would rather that the Commissioners should put such questions as they may think fit, and I will, if they please, answer them to the best of my knowledge. Having been a confidential agent in election matters, I think it would ill become me to make a statement, unless that statement were drawn forth by questions from the Commissioners.

1350. Is there any information which you can give the Commissioners as to the circumstances under which you were elected to your present office?—The circumstances under which I was elected were these: The office, for some number of years, has fallen into disrepute, in consequence of certain jobbing transactions by the under-sheriffs, who have selected the sheriffs, and those gentlemen have served but reluctantly. This year there was no sheriff who would serve, and several of the leading gentlemen of London desired me, in a case of emergency, to take upon myself the duties of the office. I took the duties very unwillingly indeed. In fact, I may call myself a stop-gap, rather than the Queen's authority should be lost in the City of London.

G. A. Wallis, Esq

1351. What was the cause of the difficulty of obtaining two persons to serve in the office of sheriff?—First of all, the great expense attendant upon the office,—next, that the office is shorn of almost all its responsibilities; for instance, in the Court of Common Council the sheriff has no voice unless he be an alderman. In the Court of Aldermen he has no voice, and he sits there, if I may use the expression, a perfect dummy—merely a decked-out official, without having the slightest power whatever, beyond that of keeping the keys, or being supposed to keep the keys of the City prisons; there, even, his power is very limited, inasmuch as the sheriff has no power to give an order for any one to visit those prisons, though he is responsible for all that takes place within them. It is the visiting magistrates, the aldermen of London, who claim to themselves the exclusive privilege of granting orders for any person to visit a prison.

1352. Are there any powers which the sheriff does not now possess, which you think, advantageously to the public, he might be intrusted with?—Yes.

1353. Will you state what they are?—I think he ought for the year to be an ex-officio member of the Court of Aldermen,—he takes his seat there, and I think he should be an ex-officio member of the court. The same with respect to the Court of Common Council.

1354. Are there any duties which the sheriff in fact performs?—There are very few indeed, except the most unpleasant of all, that is, to carry out the law in hurrying his fellow-creature into eternity.

1355. Are not all the substantial duties of the office discharged by the under sheriff?—They are discharged by the under sheriff's deputy. My under sheriff has little whatever to do, except to attend upon me. There is an under sheriff or an officer appointed at the time the sheriffs are elected, who is to have the general routine of the management of that particular business for the year. Some arrangement is made between the under sheriff and this under sheriff's deputy, by which I believe they divide the fees, or something of the kind, so that neither the sheriff nor his under sheriff has much to do except to attend to the judges at the Old Bailey, and to see that every provision for their comfort is made, and to attend the lord mayor upon state and other occasions.

1356. Are there not considerable expenses connected with the office of sheriff?—There are. I have known as much as 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* expended by a sheriff in a year, but there is no occasion to go to that extent. I do not think a sheriff could pass through his year of office without expending something like 2,000*l.* or 2,500*l.*

1357. You consider that 2,000*l.* or 2,500*l.* is the least which it would be possible for the sheriff to spend?—It is the least.

1358. Is there any allowance made to him by the City in respect to his expenses?—There are some trifling allowances made, but the account is very nearly balanced between the receipts of the sheriff personally, and the amount he receives under a bill of craving at the end of his year of office.

1359. Does not it sometimes happen that persons elected to the office of sheriff prefer paying a fine to serving?—In many cases; in the course of perhaps ten or twelve years the fines have amounted to a very large sum of money.

1360. It has been stated to the Commissioners that persons, who it is known beforehand will not serve the office, are sometimes elected in order to obtain from them a fine, there being, in the background a person ready to serve the office; do you believe the statement to be true?—As an election agent I have had but little to do with sheriffs; but there are parties in London who, if the Commissioners think fit to call them, could give every information upon the point.

1361. To what parties do you refer?—I think Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Wire knows more about the sheriffs than any one else. I have been frequently concerned for aldermen and other corporate officers, but not for sheriffs.

1362. Is not it considered necessary, before any alderman is elected to the office of lord mayor, that he should have served the shrievalty?—Decidedly.

1363. Is not that an inducement to many aldermen and persons in the corporation to accept the office of sheriff?—I think not. I think the sheriff being the Queen's officer, he is far higher than either of the aldermen or even the lord mayor of London as at present constituted.

1364. That may be your individual opinion, but looking to the general opinion entertained in the City, do not you believe it to be the fact that persons are sometimes, and not unfrequently, induced to accept the office of sheriff in order that they may be qualified to serve the office of lord mayor?—I have myself known of two or three cases in which parties have served the office of sheriff with a view to becoming aldermen. Among my clients I have persons who are now anxious to become aldermen of London, they having served the office of sheriff; but aldermen live to very great ages, and it is not very often that there is a vacancy; when there is a vacancy there are generally four or five candidates anxious to take upon themselves the duties of the office.

1365. You stated that you were an election agent?—Yes.

1366. What do you mean by that; do you mean in cases of elections for members to serve in Parliament?—And for City offices.

1367. Is that your profession?—It is.

1368. Have you no other?—None other except private continental agencies. Agencies of a private nature with merchants in London and also merchants abroad.

G. A. Wallis, Esq.

16th Nov. 1853.

1369. Have you had much experience of elections to civic offices?—Yes; for the last twenty years I have been engaged in almost every election.

1370. Without asking you to go into personal details, which you might naturally dislike to do, should you object to state to the Commissioners what your general impression is upon the question whether the elections to civic offices are conducted with purity or otherwise?—I think I may go so far as to say that they are not conducted with purity.

1371. To what elections do you refer; to elections in common council?—Not to the elections of common councilmen, because I believe, as far as the franchise goes, the elections to the common council are pure. I refer to the elections of aldermen, lord mayor, chamberlain, and sheriffs, though I cannot myself speak particularly to the sheriffs.

1372. It has been stated to the Commission that very large sums have been spent in contests for those offices. Is that your belief?—It is.

1373. To what amount have the expenses of any of those elections gone?—It depends entirely upon circumstances. If the election is for an office of valuable emolument, such as an office of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* a year, I have known as much as 10,000*l.* spent on both sides to attain it.

1374. Do you mean 5,000*l.* on each side?—No; perhaps 7,000*l.* on one side and 3,000*l.* on the other, and 6,000*l.* on one side and 4,000*l.* on the other. I cannot say that the expenses are equally divided.

1375. To what particular office do you allude?—I should be very sorry placed as I am to name it; if at any future time the Commissioners think that they ought to place me in that position, I shall be bound to attend them.

1376. Our object is not to constitute ourselves an election committee, or to go into the details of any particular election; but we desire to ascertain whether purity or the contrary is the characteristic of civic elections?—Corruption does not exist in all cases, but in a great many cases it does.

1377. Take first the elections of aldermen in the wards. How would you describe them?—I have been engaged for certain aldermen, and I have caused to be paid a certain amount of money for the purpose of obtaining their magisterial gowns.

1378. How is that money expended; is it given to the voters?—Some of it is given to voters; some is spent in giving dinners and suppers; treating in fact.

1379. Is any of it expended in agency for canvassing?—Yes.

1380. To what extent have you ever known the expenses of a candidate for an alderman's gown to go?—1,500*l.*

1381. Do you think that the system of elections in the City of late years is more or less corrupt than it used to be?—I think it is pretty much the same since the contest of Sir Peter Laurie and Sir John Key. I believe at the time of the Reform Bill the great contests which took place commenced the system of bribery and treating and so on, which has since existed.

1382. Do you mean that there has been more money spent in bribery and treating since that time than the period before it?—I think so.

1383. To what do you attribute that?—A new class of people were introduced at that time. A worthy alderman, since deceased, assumed a power along the water-side of exercising a control over certain parties, and those parties used to come in great numbers.

1384. You mean, that what is called the system of 'longshore-men has come more into operation since that time.?—You can hardly call them 'longshore-men.

1385. They have nothing to do with the election of aldermen?—Nothing whatever.

1386. You are now speaking of elections to other City offices?—Yes.

1387. Have you observed that there is more abuse in the conduct of elections in the small wards than in the large wards?—Where there is a low-rated class of occupants, I have generally found it more difficult to obtain an alderman's gown. In the out wards more expense is incurred than in the inner wards of London; the commercial wards.

1388. Is that without reference to the number of inhabitants?—In the commercial or centre wards of the City now, there are only a certain number of people, of the class of servants, who sleep there to take charge of the property; the merchants and traders and professional men leave London and reside in a purer atmosphere.

1389. Of what class do the voters in those inner wards consist?—I will take the ward of Bread Street, which is perhaps one of the most important wards in London, from the importance of the buildings it contains, and also the wealth generally of the inhabitants: it pays, I believe, more to the land tax and sewers' rate and to the property and income tax than any ward in London. Up to within the last three years I think the number of voters in that ward would not be greater than about 140. Out of that 140 not more than eighty or ninety ever exercised the franchise; sometimes, if a very popular candidate came out, the number might reach 100, but very rarely indeed. The deputy generally speaking is returned at the head of the poll, and very many out of respect to him go and vote what may be called a plumper, and place high on the poll, in order that he may occupy his position next to the alderman in the ward, he being the deputy.

1390. Are there any improprieties take place in the election of common councilmen?—I am inclined to think not, it is not much to fight for. There are no magisterial duties connected with the office; there is a seat in the common council for one year, and a chance of getting upon a committee.

1391. The situation of chamberlain is the most valuable office in the gift of any constituency in the City, is not it?—No; I think the office of lord mayor is the most valuable.

1392. Is the office of Lord Mayor as lucrative as the office of chamberlain?—More so I think.

1393. It only lasts for a year, and contrasting the expense with the receipts, is the office of Lord Mayor a very lucrative office?—For the year I think there is something like 10,000*l.* allowed to the Lord Mayor, besides other things.

1394. Do you suppose that the Lord Mayor makes money by his mayoralty generally?—He can if he pleases; many have done so.

1395. Is it not more usually the case that the lord mayor spends more than he gets?—I think it may be so.

1396. Whereas the office of chamberlain is an office for life, and a lucrative one?—It is an annual office.

1397. It is annual in point of form, but not in practice is it?—Suppose I chose the 24th of next June to demand a poll against the present chamberlain, I could do so.

1398. Has there ever been an instance of a chamberlain once elected being opposed?—I am not prepared to say.

1399. Do you believe that for the office of chamberlain the elections have occasionally been influenced by money?—I believe that has been the case in every election that has taken place for the office of chamberlain in my time.

1400. What do you consider to be the great inducements to obtain the office of alderman?—I can hardly speak of the inducement beyond this, that a man for his life is elected a magistrate, and has, jointly with his brethren of the same court, an unlimited power over the funds and the affairs of the corporation of London.

1401. Has an alderman much patronage?—He has patronage, I believe, in all the public hospitals, Christ's Hospital, and the hospitals generally throughout the City.

1402. Do you believe that practically an alderman has considerable power of providing for his relations by various City appointments?—There is no doubt about it, if he thinks fit to exercise it. I believe the present way of electing aldermen and common councilmen is very imperfect; the wards are not arranged in due proportion; some wards are very large and others very small. I should suggest also that an extension of the suffrage should certainly take place to the extent of admitting occupiers, that is, scot and lot.

1403. Would you alter the limits of the wards?—Decidedly.

1404. Would you have any objection to the franchise of the Municipal Corporation Act being introduced into the City of London?—I think it would be advantageous as applied to the City of London.

1405. You think that that would furnish a good franchise?—I do; the most important and the most pure franchise in the City of London is that exercised by the livery of London; it is the most pure, with the exception of some inconsiderable number; but that inconsiderable number attends the common hall, and the great body of the livery are lukewarm except upon matters which create public excitement, when they turn out in a body. The livery of London have to pass through a particular ordeal, different from any other persons holding the franchise in England. They obtain their livery in three ways, by patrimony, by servitude, and by redemption. By patrimony the parent takes care that the child, if he is not a fit and proper person, shall not associate with him in the livery of his company. In the case of servitude, that is by seven years' apprenticeship, first of all the master must swear that he has faithfully served him; he then applies to be taken on to the guild, and the guild make inquiries before they admit him; then, before he can get upon the court, he has to show that he is a man of wealth and of character; so that a liveryman of London has to pass through a very severe ordeal before he attains to that position. I think, unquestionably, the livery is the most perfect franchise in London, generally speaking, that is to say, 12,500 out of 13,000.

1406. Do not the different guilds vary very much in that respect; in some guilds the liverymen are very easily admitted, and are of a very different class to what they are in others, are they not?—The more respectable companies pursue the course which I have mentioned; there are companies I know which compel parties to take up their livery. That, I think, is very wrong. If they compel a man to take up his livery who cannot afford it, they are admitting into the body of the livery a man who will be open to temptation.

1407. Do you think it would be desirable for municipal purposes that there should be more than one constituent body in the City of London?—I am of opinion that the livery of London ought to be taken as the basis of any future constituency, because it is a body which has been tested. I would take the livery of London and the occupiers of property within the City of London, and amalgamate the two; there should be an electoral list of those men, and then let them elect to all offices.

1408. Would you require any condition of residence for a liveryman?—I do not know how you can fix that now. A merchant who lives at Brighton is as near London in point of time as a merchant who lives at Walthamstow; the one has a railway direct; the other no railway at all; and if a man can reach the metropolis in one hour by rail, I do not see why he should be deprived of his franchise, when his neighbours, living only seven miles from the metropolis, can come and exercise the franchise.

1409. Still, if you desire to avoid the evils of out-voters, you must draw the line somewhere?—That would be a difficult thing; I must leave that to other parties to do. You might take the railway time tables, and define it by the amount of time necessary to reach the metropolis.

1410. You would object to any condition of residence being imposed upon liverymen?

G. A. Wallis, Esq.

16th Nov. 1853.

—I think so; except that I would limit it to England. Now, in whatever part of the world a liveryman may reside, he may appear.

1411. In the case of a contested election, it would be necessary to bring up non-resident voters?—They are parties who will not be brought up; they are too respectable for that. If they see there is an important question at stake, and they think they ought to come and exercise their franchise upon it, they do so upon the ordinary circular being sent down.

1412. Do not you think that the existence of a large body of non-resident voters necessarily increases the expense of a contested election?—I do not find it so in regard to the livery of London.

1413. Have you ever had any experience of the payment of the expenses of non-resident voters in the case of a contest?—For members of Parliament only, and that not of late years.

1414. Have you found the great majority of such non-resident voters refuse to take the payment of their expenses?—No; those were principally freemen of boroughs, and places in the country.

1415. Do you believe the case would be different in regard to the outskirts of the City of London?—With regard to the livery, I do. They are principally retired merchants, bankers, and tradesmen, and men of affluence and influence in their respective localities; it would be an insult almost to offer expenses to such parties as those. I can positively say that I have never had an application from parties of that kind for the payment of their expenses for years.

1416. Would you propose to diminish the number of wards?—No; I do not think there is any occasion to diminish the number if you equalize them. Some of the wards are very large indeed; Farringdon Without, for example, is almost a city of itself. In the case of Cripplegate Within and Without, one alderman presides over the constituencies of the two wards. Then we have another ward without an inhabitant at all, which is the ward of Bridge Without.

1417. Do you think it desirable that the number of the common council should be diminished?—My notion is this, that the Court of Aldermen ought to be swept away; that there should be substituted a lord lieutenant of the City of London, who should be elected by the citizens generally.

1418. What advantage would there be in calling him the lord lieutenant, instead of calling him the Lord Mayor?—The fact is, that from the ridiculous absurdities attached to the office, which are not consistent with the spirit of the times in which we live, you will never get a first-class man to occupy the Mansion House under that title.

1419. Do you think he would like better to be called the lord lieutenant?—I think so.

1420. You would have him elected by the citizens generally?—Yes.

1421. Whom would you characterize as citizens?—Those who might be on the register or electoral list. I have suggested taking the livery as the basis, and applying the ordinary municipal franchise.

1422. Is there any body of liverymen of the City of London who are not liverymen of the companies?—No.

1423. Then to be a liveryman a person must of necessity be a member of a company Just so.

1424. Whereas it then need not be so?—No; I would extend the present franchise of the common hall, and apply the municipal franchise in addition, so as to form one register of the two bodies. The liveryman is in this position: he purchases his livery just as a man does a piece of ground, and it would be a very unfair thing to dispossess a man of his livery, which he has paid for, without giving him a quid pro quo. I would only allow him, however, to exercise the privilege for his life.

1425. In giving the franchise to the liverymen, you necessarily perpetuate the connection between the companies and the City, do you not?—I think that that is a very desirable thing.

1426. The plan which you propose is as follows: that there should be a burgess roll, formed of occupiers fulfilling certain conditions, together with all the existing liverymen?—Yes

1427. But that when the existing liverymen have died off, the burgess roll should be composed exclusively of occupiers?—Yes.

1428. With respect to the elections in common hall, how would you describe them?—The elections in common hall are badly taken. There is a desk at which sit the poll clerks; those poll clerks have no official register, or electoral list before them, by which they can detect whether a man is a liveryman or whether he is not; they come and pass, as I have seen them, in troops of fifty or sixty at a time, taking the oath that they are liverymen of such a company. The officers cannot detect the features of every man, and therefore very many poll merely to get the fees or bribes which are allowed for the day.

1429. That may be considered as a compensation for the loss of labour for the day?—I do not object to payment for loss of labour for the day. If a poor man comes away from his work, I do not think there is any great harm in his being paid for it; it has been the custom for a great many years to do that, as long as London has been a city perhaps; but it goes, unfortunately, to great lengths, and the moment the premium gets up beyond a certain amount, very many men, who are starving, are anxious to come and avail themselves of the fund.

1430. Has there ever been any expensive contest for the office of Lord Mayor?—Yes; several.

1431. How much money do you suppose has been spent in any such contest?—I should say in two contests which have immediately come under my own observation something like 15,000*l.* has been spent.

1432. That is to say, that the expenses of both candidates have together amounted to that sum?—Yes; and perhaps more.

1433. How was that money spent?—It was spent first of all in the usual paraphernalia of committees and sub-committees, and out-district committees, to which committees power was given to obtain voters.

1434. Was any part of that money do you suppose spent in direct bribery, and payments of sums to voters?—There is no doubt about it.

1435. Was much of it spent in treating?—No doubt of it.

1436. For how many days can the poll be kept open at the common hall?—Eight days; that is, seven days and the afternoon, or the evening, of the day of the nomination.

1437. Is it desirable that the poll should be kept open so many days?—I think not. Under proper regulations I think it ought to terminate in one day, in the same way as parliamentary elections do.

1438. The poll for the parliamentary election in the City would be taken in one day?—Yes; but then they have out-districts.

1439. There are several polling places?—Yes.

1440. There is only one polling place at the elections in the common hall?—Only one.

1441. Has the election for the office of sheriff ever been expensive?—It has been expensive, merely as regards the necessary expenses for supporting the dignity of the office. I had rather not say anything about the sheriffs, because I have never made one. I have only known, from my general movements about the City at such times, that money has been spent.

1442. You stated that there had been considerable difficulty to induce persons to serve the office of sheriff?—Yes.

1443. Is it likely therefore that any one would stand an expensive contest in order to obtain the office?—That would depend upon circumstances. I believe now, that if the Court of Aldermen fancied that a clear course was open, and if I was a candidate to-morrow, they would go to any expense in order to thwart my election as an individual.

1444. You think when there is a general feeling against a candidate, some other person may come forward for the purpose of keeping him out?—No doubt about it. I was an anti-corporate candidate; I told them so from the first, but they neglected to demand a poll at the proper time, and I was declared duly elected.

1445. Has there been any expensive election for the office of chamberlain?—Yes; every such election has been a great expense.

1446. The office is virtually an office for life, is it not?—I cannot say that; because I do not imagine if the chamberlain's office were abolished, and provision were to be made for him, it would be so considered.

1447. In law it is an annual office, but has not it in practice been generally held for life?—Yes; I believe so.

1448. Are there any duties attached to it?—Yes.

1449. Are they performed by the chamberlain himself?—He signs documents in his private room, and adjudicates upon apprenticeship generally; but Mr. Benjamin Scott is the first clerk of the chamber, and upon him the main duties devolve.

1450. The paucity of the duties probably may be one of the inducements to seek the office?—I apprehend it is so. It is an office which has been held by an alderman after he has attained a certain age. It is understood that the senior alderman in rotation should obtain it.

1451. Do you know what the emoluments of the office are?—No; I know it is stated that the income is about 2,500*l.* a year.

1452. What do you consider to have been the greatest sum expended in a contest for the office of chamberlain?—£10,000 for both candidates. It is impossible to speak with exactness on the subject.

1453. Have you been personally engaged as agent in the elections for chamberlain?—In all such elections for the last twenty years.

1454. Probably such money may have been spent in the same way as in the contest for the office of lord mayor?—There was one very important contest for the office of lord mayor that the press took up; the citizens thought that the press were quite right in rejecting the individual, and he was rejected, and he subsequently resigned his aldermanic gown; that was a very expensive election.

1455. How have the funds for defraying the expenses of those contests been obtained; have they been found by the parties themselves?—I think I must not answer that question at present.

1456. Have you any reason to believe that any portion of the corporation funds have been used in those contests?—That is a like question that I would rather not answer at present If you insist upon my answering it at a future time, I will obtain the data and do so.

G. A. Wollis, Esq.

1457. Can you state to us your belief that no portion of the corporation funds have been used for purposes of corruption in contests for civic offices?—I cannot say that.

1458. You cannot state your negative belief?—I would rather not state one way or the other; the inference would be drawn that I had betrayed a trust, and I should be very sorry in any way to do that.

1459. Can you point out to the Commission any means by which they could obtain information upon this point, as to whether any portion of the funds of the corporation had been applied to purposes of corruption in contests for civic offices?—No; I could not. Where the funds come from in the first instance I am not prepared to say.

1460. You are not prepared to state your belief to the Commission that no funds of the corporation have ever been applied to that purpose?—Not knowing, I cannot say.

1461. Are the Commission to understand that you have no knowledge on the subject?—I have a certain amount of knowledge, which I think I ought not to be called on to impart.

1462. The Commissioners do not ask you to state to them any specific fact as to whether you know that a certain sum was so applied; they only ask you to state generally, whether you have any knowledge as to the application of the corporation funds to the purposes of corruption?—Not from the corporation themselves; but I was informed by a candidate in an election that I once conducted, that a sum of 1,900*l.* had been subscribed among the aldermen at the Mansion House, in order to secure a brother alderman's election.

1463. You do not consider a subscription from the private funds of the aldermen a payment from the corporate funds of the City, do you?—I cannot say; I do not consider it so, generally speaking.

1464. Is that the fact to which you referred when you seemed to imply that you had some knowledge of the corporate funds being used?—That is one instance to which I referred. Whenever an agent is intrusted with such matters, they come through perhaps two or three parties; they never come direct from the fountain head.

1465. Are there any other points to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commission?—I think not.

1466. It was stated by a former witness, to the Commission, that the practice prevailed of taking money for the admission of the public to seats at the Old Bailey during criminal trials, and that when the trials were of an interesting nature the sum received was very considerable; have you any knowledge of that?—I believe what was stated is perfectly true; I have set my face entirely against it. I hope with the assistance of the learned recorder we shall be able to put a stop to it; he is as much opposed to the practice as I can possibly be.

1467. You believe that the practice may be considered as at an end?—I think so; at least, I hope so.

1468. You propose that the Court of Alderman should be abolished, and that the town council should be the only governing body of the corporation?—Not exactly the only governing body; I would suggest, whatever name the future chief magistrate may assume, he should have 20 deputy lieutenants appointed by the Crown to assist him in all matters of public interest; that they should have no individual duty, but should merely be the advisers of the lord lieutenant; that the Court of Common Council should remain pretty much as it is, with the exception of a reduction in the numbers, and that they should render to those City deputy lieutenants, or the court of lieutenancy, a statement of their accounts; the Court of Common Council still performing the various duties with respect to sewerage and lighting; but not with regard to police. I think the police ought to be amalgamated with the metropolitan police; I think it would be far less expensive to the citizens of London, and far more efficient.

1469. Do you think any inconvenience results from the separate system on which the sewerage is conducted in the City of London to the sewerage of the whole metropolis?—I think not; you will have some difficulty, if the governing body is shorn of all their powers, to obtain men to go into the court to do any duty at all. It is the duty, and the trust reposed in them, which induces them to take upon themselves the office of common councilmen, and thus serve their fellow-citizens.

1470. Do you think it desirable that any of the officers of the City should be elected by the general body of burgesses or freemen, or whatever they may be called, instead of being elected by the common council?—I think they ought to be elected by the Court of Common Council, subject to the revision of the court of lieutenancy and the lord lieutenant; that is, that they should have a veto just as the Crown reserves a veto upon the office of lord mayor and sheriffs.

1471. The title of lord lieutenant is generally understood to signify the representative of the Sovereign?—I think the chief magistrate of London should be the representative of the Sovereign.

1472. Still you would make it an elective office?—He should be elected for three years.

1473. Do not you think, that if an officer is to be the representative of the Crown, it is reasonable that the Crown should choose its own representative; would there not be some anomaly in an officer bearing the name of lord lieutenant being elected by the people?—I would have the deputy lieutenants elected by the Crown. The lord lieutenant of London should be elected by the citizens of London.

1474. Is it not generally understood that the lord lieutenant of a county, or the lord lieutenant of Ireland, is the representative of the Crown; that he stands in the place of the Crown?—Yes.

1475. The representative of the Crown is always appointed by the Crown, is he not?—Yes.

1476. What you propose is, that there should be a lord lieutenant of London, who should not be appointed by the Crown, but should be elected by the citizens?—Yes.

1477. Would not that create an inaccurate impression; namely, that the lord lieutenant was a representative of the Crown, whereas he would be elected by the citizens of London?—I think not; he might be called royal high commissioner.

1478. Would you propose that the chamberlain should be appointed by the common council, or by the general body of the citizens?—I think, having the charge of the City cash, it would be better that he should be appointed by the same franchise as that which elected chief magistrate; it would be a check.

1479. Would it not be a more simple arrangement to adopt the system which prevails in municipal boroughs, under the Municipal Act namely, that the town council should themselves elect the officers?—I think, with regard to the officers generally speaking, it would be better that the council should elect, subject, of course, to the veto of the lieutenants and the chief magistrate.

1480. How would you propose to provide for the magisterial duties in the City, if the office of alderman were abolished?—By appointing four stipendary magistrates, two for the Mansion House and two for Guildhall. It is a notorious fact, that the having to sit in the justice room, together with the other duties which the Lord Mayor has to perform, is injurious to his health; and, at the end of the year of office, you find that the Lord Mayor is prostrated from his excess of duty.

1481. Would you propose that those stipendiary magistrates should be appointed by the Crown?—Yes.

1482. How would you propose that they should be paid?—Out of the City funds.

1483. You would propose the same regulation in respect to the City, which exists under the Municipal Act, by which the town council can petition the Crown to appoint stipendiary magistrates upon their finding the salary?—Yes.

1484. Have you paid any attention to the accounts of the City?—Not a great deal; it is not a matter that comes within my knowledge.

1485. Have you ever examined them, with a view to seeing the form in which they are kept?—I have; I have many times asked for a correct account of the income of the City of London, but I have been told, by one, that it is about 100,000*l.* a year, and by another 130,000*l.* There is no means of getting at it I believe, unless the Court of Aldermen themselves give it.

1486. Is it possible to understand, from the accounts as they are now presented and published, what is the total revenue, and what is the total expenditure of the City of London within a year?—I think not; I have not looked into the accounts minutely for the purpose of giving evidence upon them.

1487. You have never been a merchant in the City of London?—No.

1488. Have you any knowledge on the subject of the trading privileges of the City?—None whatever.

1489. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—No; I think not. I would rather answer any question which the Commissioners may have to put to me, than suggest anything.

1490. Have you ever considered the question of the connexion of Southwark with the City?—Yes; I have.

1491. What do you think is the best mode of dealing with that question?—You must either go to the relief of Southwark, and allow her to apply for a corporation herself, or you must incorporate her with the City of London.

1492. Which, in your opinion, would be the better of those alternatives?—I am hardly able to give an opinion, because I do not know the constituency of Southwark sufficiently well. There is one point which should be guarded against, and that is, that a large influx of men, active in election pursuits, should not come in and inundate the burgess-roll of the City; there is a great deal of apathy on the part of the livery; it might, perhaps, lead to some amount of good, inasmuch as it might stir up that apathy and make them active citizens instead of inactive. I should feel inclined not to extend the limits of the corporation.

1493. You think it would be better to sever whatever connexion may exist between Southwark and London, leaving Southwark to be provided for in other ways?—I think so; Southwark would be a formidable rival of the City. Having the advantage of the water-side, competition would go on between the City of London and Southwark, who should deliver goods the cheapest on the wharf; and I think that that rivalry would be productive of great advantage to the citizens. I would rather see Southwark in the position of a rival, than I would see her allied to the City.

1494. You have no means of judging what the opinion of the inhabitants of Southwark is upon the point?—Not at all.

Mr. George Hyde.

16th Nov. 1853.

Mr. GEORGE HYDE, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1495. You are a citizen of London?—I have been so for seventeen years.

1496. Are you in trade?—I am in trade, as a sealing-wax maker and stationer.

1497. Where do you reside?—At 61, Fleet Street.

1498. Are you connected with the corporation?—I am totally unconnected with the corporation.

1499. Have you taken up your freedom?—I was compelled to do so in 1846. I resisted it as long as possible, till, being a young man, I got frightened at a lawyer's letter, and I then paid 12*l.* 10*s.*, in conjunction with my brother, who has paid the same amount.

1500. You have never been a common councilman?—Never. From my knowledge of the working of the constituency of London, having taken a very active part in all municipal elections and in all parliamentary elections, which have some connexion with them, I should not feel honoured by being asked to take the office of common councilman.

1501. Have you paid particular attention to the working of the corporation system in the City of London?—I do not mean to say I have to the working of the corporation system in detail, as connected with the various duties which they levy, or as connected with the corporate accounts; but I have as connected with the working of the constituency upon the common council, the aldermen, the Lord Mayor, and the chamberlain.

1502. What do you mean by the working of the constituency?—I have seen the defects of the constituent body in the City of London. I think there are very many defects indeed.

1503. Will you state to the Commissioners any points to which you desire to advert?—I think almost all matters are decidedly imperfect. For instance, the wards are too large; the constituency is much too narrow; its composition, also, is not that which I think is at all worthy of the City of London.

1504. Is not the size of the wards so small that it would be difficult to increase the constituency?—I do not think there would be any difficulty in enlarging the constituency. I think there would be as little difficulty in doing so as there would be in approximating the size of the wards towards equality—making them bear a better proportion to one another. The ward of Farringdon Without is one-fourth of the City of London, returning only one alderman; whereas you may see a dozen small wards, each returning one alderman, although the combined constituency is not equal to that of the ward of Farringdon Without.

1505. You propose to equalize the size of the wards?—Yes. I think their inequality is one of the glaring defects now existing in the corporation of London.

1506. What alteration would you make in the franchise of the freemen?—I would certainly not take the liverymen as the basis for the franchise. I would go back to times somewhat remote in search of a constituent body. I would take as the freemen those who have a decided interest in the City of London—an interest as great as that of Mr. Baring himself, who comes there in the morning and goes away at night.

1507. Would you select occupiers paying rates as the constituency?—Yes.

1508. Would you preserve the franchise of the liverymen?—Only as occupiers.

1509. Not as liverymen?—Not as liverymen. I think it is a most defective body. It is only within the last 200 years that the liverymen have been an exclusive body, and I think that that exclusiveness has worked a great deal of evil. It has tended very materially to corrupt the representation—I do not mean in a pecuniary point of view—but it has tended to militate against the interests of the corporation of the City. I think the consequence has been that the corporation has become more and more exclusive, and their management is much less in keeping with the wants and wishes of the whole of the constituency.

1510. Would you propose to make any alteration in the Court of Aldermen?—I would certainly make the aldermen as responsible as it is possible for them to be.

1511. Would you propose that they should hold their office for life?—Unquestionably not. They should be elected every three years.

1512. You would maintain a separate Court of Aldermen?—Decidedly. I do not see, if you have aldermen in Liverpool, why London, a city so ancient, should be without them.

1513. Do they form a separate court at Liverpool?—No; but they are the magistrates for the time being; therefore they are for that time the same as aldermen of the City of London.

1514. Would you propose to keep up the magisterial powers of the aldermen?—Decidedly.

1515. Is there any other remark which you wish to make?—With respect to the division of the wards, my idea is this: the present number of wards is twenty-six; I would reduce that number to twelve, retaining the present names, or adopting others.

1516. You would combine some of the wards together?—Yes; such wards as Bassishaw and Cordwainers. I would combine three or four wards, in order to make a ward equal to half of the ward of Farringdon Without. I would divide the ward of Farringdon Without into two.

1517. Are there any other changes in the corporation which you desire to effect?—I think the radical defect in the corporation of London is its constituent body. I think you should go back to the old custom of the City, which is, that every occupier of a year and a day should be able to vote for the common councilmen, the Lord Mayor, the aldermen, and every corporate officer. I think the liverymen should have no exclusive privileges. As an instance of that, I may say that I had an apprentice who served seven years with me. I can only vote for the aldermen and the common councilmen; but my apprentice, serving seven years, gets his freedom by servitude. He expends 30*l.* to take up his livery; he then can vote for those officers, from the power of voting for which I am illegally and unjustly excluded. There is one grave objection to the livery being the exclusive possessors of the constituent power, which is, that a man in Glasgow can usurp my functions. He can vote in elections for offices which I cannot vote in.

Mr. George Hyde.

1518. Would you abolish the elections in common hall altogether?—No; I would retain them, taking for the constituency the basis I have mentioned. I would retain everything which I think is useful in the corporation.

1519. You would not propose that the officers now elected in common hall should be elected by the common council?—No; I would propose that every corporate officer should be elected in common hall by the whole constituent body of the corporation.

1520. You think it desirable to make a difference in that respect from the system laid down in the Municipal Corporations Act?—Yes. I think there should be some difference between the City of London and the other towns of the kingdom.

1521. Are there any other points to which you desire to call the attention of the Commissioners?—I think the principle of taking the parliamentary constituency as the municipal one is open to very grave defects. The present municipal constituency is 7,000; the parliamentary constituency is 19,000. The paucity of the municipal constituency arises, in my opinion, from the defects which have crept into the corporation for the last 200 years. If you were to make an occupier of a year and a day a citizen of London, you would arrive at something like an approximation to a knowledge of the wants of the City. You do not do so now. There is sometimes very little responsibility attaching to a member of the common council. About two years ago we agitated the question of gas. We found that one of our common council was totally irresponsible. He opposed us, though we were unanimous on the subject, and brought us into print. I certainly thought, as a citizen, he misrepresented us, and I attempted to see whether it was not possible to prevent his re-election; but I found the numbers were so small (i. e., the municipal electors), and ticket porters and publicans forming a large proportion of such constituency, that such men as myself were completely swamped.

1522. Would you make any alteration in the office of Lord Mayor?—I would preserve the title of Lord Mayor. I would do away with the tinsel of the mayoralty.

1523. And diminish the expense probably?—Yes; I would diminish the expense and increase the utility, thereby increasing the respect of the City for the office of Lord Mayor. I believe the aldermen as magistrates to be a very intelligent body of men; and I believe, looking to their opportunities and experience, you could get no better magistrates. Their opportunities of knowing the wants and wishes of the citizens are very great, and they have great means of obtaining magisterial knowledge from their lengthened experience. With reference to Southwark, I would certainly disunite it from London. Southwark was only united to London in consequence of the thieves of Southwark coming over the bridge, just as it has been stated they came from the metropolitan boroughs into London. I would make Southwark a municipal body, totally independent of the City of London. I may say with respect to the livery, that they exclude the great body of the municipal electors, that is, the citizens, from voting for the offices I have named. They are very rich, and they feed very well indeed. I wish that the constituent body of the City should have no connexion with the livery of the companies. If a man took up his livery, and was not an occupier, and had not an interest in the City, he should be excluded from the franchise. Those exclusive privileges, I would observe, are only of recent date. Prior to the 11th of George I. every man who occupied a year and a day was a citizen of London, and he voted for every office. That ancient law, which has stood for hundreds of years, was illegally abrogated at the instance of some half-dozen aldermen of the City of London, totally in the face of the protest of the municipality of the City, and in the face of the protest of members of the House of Lords.

1524. You propose to restore the law to the state in which it was before the Act of George I.?—Yes, unquestionably. I think you would then arrive at something like a pure government of the City of London. You would certainly destroy the present glaring defects in its management. The common law of the country has always presumed that all occupiers are freemen by right.

1525. Has your attention been directed to accounts of the City of London?—I have not examined the accounts, but I have been an inquest-man, and it is the duty of all inquest-men, by the ancient law, to do certain things: that is, to inquire into the state of the various houses in their wards; to see that the roll of freemen is perfect; recently to report any parties who may not have taken up their freedom. As an inquest-man, I went to the Guildhall, and reported certain parties who had not taken up their freedom—that is, who had not purchased their freedom. We found that the same parties had for three years consecutively been reported by our predecessors, but that nothing had been done, and that our presentation had not even been entered on the minutes of the corporation. I certainly thought that a very slovenly mode of doing business. From parties I have mixed with, I think that the accounts of the corporation are not kept in that business-like manner in which they ought to be kept.

Mr. George Hyde.

1526. To the financial accounts you have not paid particular attention?—I know nothing of them except from conversation with some of the members of the Court of Common Council.

1527. Is there any other point to which you particularly wish to advert?—The common council should have in my opinion the command of the corporate funds. The aldermen should not have anything to do with votes of money.

1528. You mean that the power of voting money should be exclusively confined to the common council?—Precisely. I have already adverted to the paucity of numbers of the municipality of London. In my opinion, the effect of a return to the ancient constituency would be to render the corporation much more efficient than it is. I think the payment to the various corporate officers very high. There are too many corporate officers, and the payment in the aggregate is much too large. With reference to the office of chamberlain, it is a responsible office, and one of which the duties are not very hard. The emoluments of the chamberlain are about 3,200*l.* a year. The various contests for chamberlain have been very expensive, not only to the candidates themselves, but to the liverymen, who live at great distances, from 200 to 400 miles apart. The same remark applies to the election of Lord Mayor. The contest with Alderman Harmer cost a very large sum, and the liverymen must of course have expended considerable sums in coming long distances to vote.

1529. How is the money expended in expensive contests in the City?—I do not believe there is any direct money payment out of the corporate funds for any contest.

1530. To what purposes is the expenditure of the candidates directed?—The election of chamberlain is virtually for life; it is therefore worth his while to spend from 5,000*l.* to 10,000*l.* if he thinks he shall have a long life.

1531. Have you any acquaintance with this subject except from common rumour?—As a citizen of the standing I have mentioned, I have an intimate acquaintance with it.

1532. Have you taken any part in an election?—In the election in which Mr. Alderman Harmer was a candidate I took a considerable part.

1533. What was the nature of the expenses which were incurred in that election; to what purposes were the payments directed?—Indirectly, there was a great deal of what you may call bribery.

1534. Were you upon the committee of either candidate?—No.

1535. Were you a voter?—No. I have stated why I am not a voter; it is because am only a freeman by purchase.

1536. Have you a personal knowledge of what took place at the election to which you refer?—I have stated my general belief as to the expenditure of money.

1537. You believe that, generally, contested elections in the City are expensive to the candidates?—Unquestionably; very expensive indeed.

1538. Do you think that that expenditure could be diminished?—Very materially.

1539. In what way?—By creating a constituency which should be a wholesome one, not the narrow constituency which we have at present.

1540. You think if the constituency were larger, the expenses of the elections would be smaller?—I have no doubt about it.

1541. How are the expenses caused?—I think, if you were to bring the whole body of citizens to bear upon those elections, you would have much less expenditure, and you would diminish any corruption which may now exist.

1542. Is it your belief that at present there is much corruption in the City elections?—I think not; I think they are better than they were. I do not think the late election for chamberlain was such an election as would have taken place if you had had the whole body of citizens to have taken part in it. With reference to the constituency of the City, I desire to state that by the Act of the 2d of William and Mary, it is recited that the object of the Act was "for the restoring of the said mayor and commonalty and citizens to their ancient liberties, of which they had been deprived." That Act has never been repealed, so that I am supported by that Act in the assertion I made just now, that I had a right as a citizen to vote for all corporate offices; that the only constitutional body at the present time is the lord mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, and that the livery as a body, whether having exclusive privileges or not, is a usurpation.

1543. Is there anything else which you desire to bring before the Commissioners?—I am not aware that there is anything further.

Mr. John Jones.

Mr. JOHN JONES, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1544. What is your connexion with the City of London?—I am a liveryman of the Turners' Company.

1545. Are you in trade?—Yes; not in the City.

1546. Have you ever resided in the City?—Never.

1547. Have you ever directed your attention to the concerns of the City?—Not to the general concerns of the City. I am a member of the court of my company. I was one of a committee appointed during the last parliamentary attempt on the part of some of the members of the corporation to reform the City by certain measures. I happened to be deputed from my company to attend the general committee to oppose that parliamentary measure.

Mr. John Jones.

16th Nov. 1853.

1548. Are you a common councilman?—I am not.

1549. Are there any points to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—My desire is this. I wish to see the companies brought into greater activity.

1550. In what way do you propose to bring them into greater activity?—By giving more attention to the education of the apprentices of those respective trades which the companies represent.

1551. Would you propose to connect the companies more closely with the corporation?—Quite so. Of late it has been the design of the corporation to throw the companies out, and they have not elected men, or allowed men to buy their freedom, who are not members of the City. I think that is a great injustice to the City itself.

1552. When you say they are not members of the City, you mean they are not members of a company?—Yes; any man may go and pay so much money and obtain the freedom of the City.

1553. Would you prevent any person being on the list of freemen who is not a member of one of the companies?—Quite so.

1554. You would restore the law to the same state in which it was before the year 1835? I do not know much of the law. My impression is that the City of London is a combination of trades.

1555. What is your objection to allow any person who occupies a house in the City and is not a liveryman of a company, to be a freeman of the City?—If he has no trade, I would just as little allow him to have a voice in the City as I would allow an ignorant man to be a member of the colleges in Oxford or Cambridge.

1556. Supposing he exercises a trade, resides in the City, and pays rates, but is not a liveryman of a company, what would you say then?—I should have no objection to people who reside in the City, and carry on business there, voting for common councilmen. But for aldermen, and for all the higher offices, I think the livery alone ought to be called into requisition.

1557. Why do you make that distinction?—Because I think the livery is the most valuable body in the kingdom. They are the very choice men of all trades, and when the livery meet together and give their opinions in common hall, I do not think the Government of the country can get a better opinion as to what the respectable and intelligent public want, than by hearing what the livery of London say.

1558. Do you believe that the elections in common hall are conducted in a satisfactory manner?—When there is any public interest at stake they are, but otherwise not.

1559. It has been stated to the Commission, that in contested elections in common hall there is considerable corruption of voters: do you believe that to be the fact?—It is not so to my own knowledge. I have never been applied to, to be bribed.

1560. What is your belief as to the fact?—I have no belief upon it, because I have no knowledge. As far as my own observation goes, I should say there is no bribery. I have heard there is, but I do not think that that is worth listening to, unless it is stated on authority.

1561. Is it your belief that the elections in common hall are conducted in a satisfactory manner?—When there is any interest in the case, I think they are. With regard to the sheriffs, the liverymen do not seem to have cared about them. A man of any money, who desires to get into power, uses certain means of bringing a few supporters around him and so obtains the show of hands. I know that as a fact. I was at one time in the Guildhall at the election of the sheriff, and I saw a number of men come into the hall, and when they came in they applied to a tall stout man, I do not know his name, and he gave them all tickets. I offered one or two of these men 5*s.* for their ticket, and then I offered 10*s.* I did not like offering any more. I asked them if they knew anybody who had a ticket such as had been given to them. They said, "No." Then I said, "It was a great shame for men who were entrusted with the livery to be selling their votes in this manner." One or two came round me; we had a little conversation together. They justified it by saying they were no worse than other people higher in station.

1562. Those tickets must, from your statement, have been worth more than the 10*s.*; do you know at all what their value was, or how much they entitled the holder to obtain?—No.

1563. What was the election of which you speak?—It was the election of sheriff.

1564. In what year?—I do not know the year, it is but a short time ago; Mr. Croll was the sheriff.

1565. Was there a very small number of liverymen there?—Barely 150 or from that to 200.

1566. Including those ticket men?—All together.

1567. Do you believe that the elections of chamberlain have in general been conducted in a satisfactory manner?—Yes.

1568. At that election to which you allude, was not there a great neglect of duty on the part of the liverymen; ought they not to have attended?—Undoubtedly; but the office of late has fallen into dishonour. I do not know much of the elections. My wish is to maintain the connexion between the companies and the City, because I think that those companies are very valuable organizations for the purpose of promoting trade. I think the courts of the companies might exercise a very great and beneficial influence in causing apprentices in the respective trades to be well taught. I think that the courts of the companies themselves, and the whole system of the City, have fallen into a sleep, through the courts electing their own members. I think the members of the courts of the different companies ought to be elected by the livery. I believe that would put new life into them. The funds which the courts have at their command would then be more applied for the purpose of instructing the apprentices in all sorts of scientific acquirements connected with their respective trades.

1569. In point of fact, is it the case now, that those companies are connected very closely with the trades they profess to represent?—No; but they might be made so.

1570. What is the company to which you belong?—The Turners' Company.

1571. You are yourself a watchmaker?—Yes; there is some connexion between them.

1572. Do you believe that the watchmaking trade is closely connected with the corporation of Turners?—I do not.

1573. Is the same the case with regard to the other companies; are the Fishmongers closely connected with those who sell fish?—No; that is what I lament; it is what I would try and alter.

1574. You wish those companies to be brought back more nearly to what they were in former times?—And that all the members of the company should be carrying on the business of which the company is nominally the head.

1575. A barrister gave evidence before the Commissioners the other day, who is a member of the Spectacle Makers' Company?—Yes; the reason of that is, that he buys his freedom into the Company of Spectacle Makers, because it is a cheap company to buy into.

1576. You would not allow that to be done?—No. I would make the admission fee very small, so that a working man of good character could gain admission into those companies. The fees at present, in many companies, are very high for a man to take up his livery, but the reason of that certainly is, that he becomes a member of a benefit society. There are certain pecuniary advantages in the case of distress and old age, that lead to the admission fee being so high.

1577. Do you know anything of the trade privileges of the City of London considered as a corporation?—I know nothing beyond what may be found in books.

1578. You consider that the whole body of the citizens of London was originally a combination of a number of trades?—Yes.

1579. Have you turned your attention to the time during which those companies have existed; it is said the corporation of London existed hundreds of years before any company was established at all?—The companies are very ancient.

1580. The oldest company in London, it is stated in the report of the Commissioners, is the Mercers' Company, which was established in the reign of Richard II., whereas the corporation of London existed in Saxon times?—I do not know under what form it existed.

Adjourned to to-morrow, at 12 o'clock

Thursday, 17th November, 1853.

The RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P. IN THE CHAIR.

J. Acland, Esq.
17th Nov. 1853.

JAMES ACLAND, Esq., made the following statement:—

Will you allow me to hand in to the Commission a memorial from the only resident magistrate, the churchwardens, six of the resident guardians, and 200 of the inhabitant householders of Croydon, calling your attention to what they deem the heavy and unjust coal duties levied by the City of London upon them, and in common with all the inhabitants of a circle of twenty miles, as the crow flies, round London; and begging that you will have the kindness to give that subject your consideration.

H.L. Keeling, Esq.

HENRY LEVY KEELING, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—, 1581. Are you an inhabitant of the City of London?—I am.

1582. What trade do you carry on?—Fruit and general produce broker.

1583. What is the firm to which you belong?—Keeling and Hunt.

1584. Where do you carry on your trade?—In Monument Yard, in the City of London.

1585. Are there any points connected with your trade which you are desirous of bringing before the Commissioners?—My purpose is more particularly to direct the attention of the Commissioners to the exaction levied by the City meters upon the article of fruit.

1586. Do you mean fruit imported from abroad?—Fruit imported from abroad. The meters are not applied for by the importers of the article, but they claim the right of attending and superintending the cargoes, and making their claim for payment accordingly, which amounts to a considerable sum. For instance: we may have a cargo of nuts, consisting of 2,000 bags. Those bags are all of one measurement and weight. They are landed under the superintendence of the Customs authorities, who take the average of two bags in a parcel to levy the duty for the Crown, and upon those two bags the duty is charged.

1587. Do you mean that the Customs authorities are satisfied with that, without any other measurement?—Perfectly. But the City meters, by virtue of their office, attend unsolicited; and although two bags are measured by the Crown, who are satisfied to rate the duty upon the rest of the 2,000, upon those they claim a metage of twopence for each bag; and all the work they do for that amount is simply to look on with the Customs authorities. The amount that is claimed by the City meters of 16*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, is so much money taken from the importer without any benefit to him, inasmuch as their services are not required either by the Crown, or by the importer, or by the buyer or the seller.

1588. Do they invariably enforce that claim of measuring?—Invariably. We commenced to resist it some eighteen months ago; but finding that the case was being investigated by the committee of general purposes of the City of London, we could not interfere with it; but we were content to have the investigation properly gone through, confiding in the wisdom of the City of London, or the committee, to give us that redress that we consider we are entitled to.

1589. Has any decision been come to by that committee?—Not any that we have heard of. We have not heard of any report from it. It is now eighteen months ago that that committee was sitting, to which I was summoned, and gave my evidence. What I have stated may apply to every other article in the shape of fruit, with respect to which the City meters are never required, and, in fact, never applied for. But still they insist upon claiming that rate of payment, and the amount of charge becomes a very large sum.

1590. Does the same system apply to the trade in oranges and lemons?—They claim it upon all articles which are measured. With regard to the duty upon oranges and lemons, the duty was levied in a different manner before the reduction by the late tariff. When we were consulted by the Customs authorities, in their anxiety to levy a duty that would be satisfactory to the trade, we suggested that it should be levied by the bushel, the same as upon nuts, and we were met by an objection by the landing officers, as to whether that would not bring the City meters in contact with us, if it were measured in the same way as nuts. We requested them not to take that into their consideration, for we should feel ourselves in a position to resist it if it were claimed. In consequence of which, when the duty was carried into effect by the new tariff, the duty was levied by the bushel. The first measurement took place in our establishment, and the landing officers stated that they thought it was an act of courtesy to send for the City meters to attend as usual. Our reply was, "You may send for them on your own account, but with the distinct understanding that we shall resist any charge that may be made by them." They attended, and we then mentioned to the City meters who attended, that they were called upon by the Crown, and not by ourselves. But in the interim the matter was represented to the City, and they got a clause introduced into the Customs Act, subsequent to the passing of the tariff, that the City meters should not interfere with any produce that required measurement by the new system of duties, but should confine themselves simply to those which were secured to them by the City charters; consequently they have never attended with respect to those kinds of produce. The Customs authorities now became the meters. They attend with their own officers as meters, and we are saved the charge.

1591. What are the articles of fruit with respect to which the City claim to have their own meters employed, or at least paid if not employed?—They claim upon nuts, and there is this anomaly, that they claim it upon all articles of nuts except one, which are imported from Brazil in very large quantities, and upon which they never claim metage. When we ask why they do not insist upon their rights in that case, they cannot tell us.

1592. What is the name of that article?—Para nuts, which we imported from Brazil. The only way to account for that is simply that that was an article upon which the Customs levied the duty by the value, and not by measurement, and therefore it escaped them. But we contend that if they are entitled to claim the metage upon other articles which are sold by measurement, this ought not to escape; and that if this is entitled to escape, the claim cannot be enforced upon the others. The articles upon which they claim are nuts of all kinds, onions, apples, and pears.

1593. Potatoes?—That is a distinct trade, in which we do not interfere. We confine ourselves to fruit.

1594. The effect of the course which the City took upon the subject of oranges was, that they gave up their right to measure oranges and lemons under the new duty; but at the same time it did not weaken their claim with respect to articles which they had before been in the habit of measuring?—Decidedly not.

H. L. Keeling, Esq.

17th Nov. 1853.

1595. Do you believe that the clause in question emanated from the City or from the Government?—It emanated from the City, from representations that I myself made to several parties connected with the trade; and one gentleman, being a common councilman, who is interested in the trade himself, took the matter in hand, and I believe, through his means, a deputation having waited upon the common council, this clause became introduced into the Customs Act, which of course excludes the City now from any claim upon fruits of any kind, upon which the duty is levied by measurement, by an act of the Crown.

1596. In levying the duties, the Customs proceed by measuring a small portion which serves as a sample, and then estimating for the rest according to the amount of the sample?—Precisely.

1597. Do the City meters, in fact, measure the whole of the cargo, or do they merely charge you for it, and spare you the trouble of measuring?—At this moment they superintend the measurement of all cargoes brought in bulk; and up to the present period the meters interfering on behalf of the Crown take a report of their measurements; they measure so many barrels out of a cargo. The Crown keep a check upon the landing, and when the measurements are made up they agree with the meters, and upon their return the duty is levied.

1598. Do the City meters compel you to submit to actual measurement as well as to payment?—They do.

1599. If it were not for the existence of the metage would you require that the whole of your cargo should be measured?—Decidedly.

1600. The Customs would be content with measuring only a portion of it?—The Customs would employ their own officers, who are bound to do it, provided the meters were not in existence, as is done in the outports. At Liverpool no metage is required, and consequently the Crown have to do the work for which they are paid.

1601. The landing waiters would measure a few barrels to serve as samples of the whole cargo?—If it were levied by the bushel they would have to measure every barrel which represents three bushels. But at the outports the officers of the Crown take the place of the meters, as they would do in the City of London if the meters were not in existence.

1602. Would the Crown measure the whole cargo?—Decidedly, if it came in bulk. I will give an instance in the article of chestnuts. During the famine year, the Government judiciously thought proper to remove the entire duty on chestnuts, thinking that by that means they would become an article of food, as they are on the Continent. In consequence, we should have been content to land them without the Customs measurement, because no duty was levied. All that the Customs would require would be a return made out for the statistical account. But though no duty is levied upon that article, the meters still asserted a right to levy a tax of 2*d.* upon every bushel when it was not required to be measured.

1603. Then if the duty were altogether abolished on nuts, or any of those articles, the City would still claim the right of measuring them?—They do.

1604. Do those articles pay any City dues?—There are dues connected with the metage. For instance, in the nine months from the 1st of October 1851, to the 30th of June 1852, it appears, according to a statement which was drawn out for the guidance of the City authorities in their investigation by the committee of general purposes, that we paid 208*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, without any value being received, or any assistance to us.

1605. Was that for metage, or in the shape of dues?—£183 13*s.* 5*d.* was paid for metage, 22*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* for Lord Mayor's dues, and 3*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* for corporation dues. Now with regard to the Lord Mayor's dues, we neve could ascertain why that amount was levied. Formerly the Lord Mayor used to claim the right of taking a sample upon every cargo of fruit or parcel of fruit and vegetables coming to the port of London. Two men used to come, the one with a sack and the other a measure, and take their sample from the cargo or parcel. But finding that for the sake of getting that sample great injury was done to the package which they might select to draw it from, a compromise was made, and we preferred giving money instead of kind; that is, half-a-crown upon each parcel, which is regularly collected, called lord mayor's dues. We never could ascertain when that custom originated, or to what account this amount is paid, but it is regularly applied for and paid. The great objection to those small items arises in this way: that in making our sales to our correspondents we are obliged to add these different charges which are paid, and when they are compared with the charges in the outports, the discrepancy is so great that it is constantly calling for explanation. For instance, I will give you a case in point: a client of ours sends an article of chestnuts from France by means of railway conveyance, say the South Coast Railway or the South Western, and he sends also a small cargo by vessel to London. The cargo that is brought to the port of London becomes subject to all the charges of metage, corporation dues, and lord mayor's dues. Upon the cargo that is brought by railway to Monument Yard, in waggons, no metage is charged or claimed; no lord mayor's dues or corporation dues. Our consignor receives the separate accounts of sales, perhaps by the same post. He sees an account of sales with all these items charged, because it has come to the port of London, and he sees the other exempt from them because it has come by railway conveyance, and he questions it because they are both sent to the City of London, and we have great difficulty in making our foreign friends understand it. Again, if he sends a similar cargo to one of the outports, there he is exempt from all those charges, and we have constant complaints of the discrepancy arising from the vexatious charges, as they call them, in one port, while they are exempt in another. It is those points that we complain of, and consider that they require redressing.

1606. Has not the difference a tendency to drive importations of this kind from the port of London?—It has. In these days, when profits are calculated almost to a fraction, the saving of 10*l.* upon a cargo of nuts by that means would be taken into consideration as to the sale, because if you sent it to Liverpool you would have 10*l.* less to pay than in the port of London. I speak more positively as to fruit, because we suffer from this claim with respect to fruit, and the grievance is greater in our trade than it may be in others. When we came to consider the question of the right of the fruit meters, we understood that three of them have purchased the right from the City, and hold the office in perpetuity. The fourth has been appointed recently. The City purchased the right of the fourth, and have appointed this party in his place, with a fixed salary. The residue is to go to a fund, that it may accumulate to purchase out the other three. I believe that can be established as a fact. Then this grievance must go on until the City have a sufficient fund collected to pay the other three out, or to compensate them and get rid of the grievance altogether.

1607. Do the City meters attend personally, or do they perform the duty by deputy?—They could not do it entirely, and therefore they appoint deputies;—for instance, in consequence of the increased importation of French fruit from France, from Holland, and from other parts, which is brought by steamers twice or thrice a week: those steamers arrive frequently after business hours, but being a perishable article, a board's order has been passed at the Customs to allow the fruit to be landed before the regular time of business, or over the regular business hours, in order that every facility may be given to perishable articles that they may be worked round to the different markets for sale the next morning. The consequence is that a great portion of the packages which pass the Customs arrive in the absence of the meters. The meters come down quietly the following day, and collect the statistical account from the Customs officers, and levy the duty without rendering any assistance to the article in question.

1608. Do you happen to know what amount of purchase money was paid for the office?—I never could ascertain that; but the City officers of course have the means of ascertaining it, but I know that the revenue which those same gentlemen have from the metage of fruit and potatoes is stated to be about or upwards of 5,000*l.* per annum.

1609. You mean the four meters together?—The four together.

1610. Do you mean the gross receipts?—Yes; from the taxation levied upon those particular articles.

1611. Then they have to pay the deputies out of that?—I expect they have, but that can be a very small proportion of the sum; but upon that particular article of metage their revenue is supposed to be about, if not quite, 5,000*l.* per annum, divided amongst the four, upon fruit and potatoes, because they are retained for this specific duty.

1612. The same meters that measure fruit measure potatoes?—Yes; they do not interfere with corn, but fruit and potatoes only 1613. Does the inconvenience which you suffer from the metage limit itself to the money payment, or are you ever compelled to submit to measurement when it is inconvenient to you to do so?—We are compelled on all occasions to submit to it, because in our business the buyers seldom buy from the ship. The goods arrive, and the Customs themselves, for their own protection, would see that everything was properly delivered, and levy their duty without the interference of a second party. Then the goods are deposited in warehouses, and when they are sold they are all re-measured.

1614. Does it ever happen that in consequence of the City regulations with respect to metage, you are compelled to have your goods measured by meters when otherwise they would not be measured?—They claim the right to measure.

1615. Do they exercise the right?—They do, thoroughly.

1616. In cases in which you are unwilling they should exercise it?—Yes; supposing now to-day I was going to land a cargo of chestnuts at the quay, and I were to say, "These chestnuts do not pay duty, and we do not require them measured; we shall have them landed in bulk;" they would compel us to have them measured by their officers, and charge us for it.

1617. Would they go through the actual process of measurement, or would they merely make an estimate?—They would go through the process of measurement.

1618. Then in the case of a cargo of chestnuts you would be subject to a double inconvenience; you would have to pay for the metage when it was not required, and you would be compelled to suffer the delay of having your cargo measured?—Yes; it would not be any particular delay, because we could not land more in a package than the porter would be able to carry, but we should not require meters to interfere with the operation.

1619. Does the measurement never cause delay when you would wish to land rapidly?—No; I do not think it would affect that.

1620. Then the inconvenience reduces itself to the payment?—Precisely. That is an unnecessary charge, and not required.

H.L. Keeling, Esq.

17th Nov. 1853.

1621. Do you know anything about the measurement of corn?—No. That is a distinct trade.

1622. Is there anything else that you wish to state to the Commission?—The only point I have to mention is, that at one time we threatened resistance to the claim of the meters, and in fact withheld the payment for a period. But we felt averse to take the law into our own hands, and preferred to agitate the question to get it redressed generally, not individually. And we were acquainted with the instance of Combe and Delafield's opposition to the claim in the case of their corn, which bore something like a resemblance to our own case, inasmuch as they did not require their corn to be measured. And they brought us a copy of the charter of James II. (I think it was), to which I have always given a very different reading to what the City meters have done, inasmuch as at that period many of the articles upon which they levy duty at the present day were unknown, and were never likely to be brought to this country. I have always read the charter as giving a right to levy it only upon those articles of production that were the growth of our own country, having no reference to any importation, inasmuch as at that period several articles which are enumerated, and which form part of the claim, were not in existence, or not known in this country.

1623. You consider that it applied only to the coasting trade?—Yes; for keeping up the wharf property. I may mention with regard to the wharves, that when they all became private property, the proprietors took the labour of the fellowship porters into their own hands. We pay them to a large amount. In nine months we paid them 2,000*l.* In the case of the fruit, which now goes to St. Katharine's Wharf and Blackwall, and other places, the proprietors of those different places take the labour of the fellowship in their own hands, and do it at a consolidated rate; whereas if the same description of fruit were brought to the legal quays, we should be subject to the charge that the fellowship now make. It becomes identified with the metage question.

1624. Were you rightly understood to say that you paid so much as 2,000*l.* in nine months to fellowship porters of the City of London?—Yes; 1,939*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*

1625. Are their charges higher than those of ordinary porters?—With regard to fruit I do not think their claim is of an exorbitant character; but what we have to complain of is, that we should not exercise our own right of employing the men that we thought proper.

1626. You do not mean to say that you were losers to the amount of 2,000*l.*, but that that was the whole amount that you paid to those men?—Just so. But we should like to exercise the right of employing such men as we thought proper.

1627. Do you believe that you were losers, in a pecuniary point of view, to any amount by employing the fellowship porters instead of employing others, if you had been at liberty to do so?—I think labour, like any other article, should be a subject of competition, and if we could employ such men as we liked, and either pay them a regular fixed salary, or pay them so much a day, we could get the labour accomplished at a cheaper rate.

1628. Can you make an estimate of what your pecuniary loss may be by the difference between the two systems?—I could not at the moment.

1629. Do you believe it to be considerable or insignificant?—As far as the fruit trade is concerned, I think it is well managed, because we take it into our own hands and get it well done. Therefore, with regard to our trade, we do not consider it to be overpaid.

E. Hales, Esq.

EDWARD HALES, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

1630. (Chairman.) You are engaged in the corn trade?—I am.

1631. Where do you carry on your business?—At the Corn Exchange. My office is in Bush Lane, Cannon Street.

1632. How long have you been engaged in that business?—Twenty-five years in London.

1633. Do you reside in the City?—I do not.

1634. You were a member of the committee appointed recently at a meeting of the corn trade, for the purpose of supporting a memorial presented to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the City of London, on the subject of the charge for metage on corn?—I was.

1635. Are there any points, with reference to that memorial and the subjects to which it refers, to which you desire to call the attention of the Commissioners?—I have a few copies of the memorial, which I will hand in (the same was delivered in), and if you will allow me to elucidate the position of the matter, I will read the memorial seriatim, because I think these documents which I have here contain all the grievances which we have to complain of. This committee was appointed about eighteen months ago by the corn trade, on account of the grievances we felt we were under, in paying a heavy charge for metage and porterage.—(The witness read the memorial, as follows):—

E. Hales, Esq.

"To the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London.

"We, the undersigned merchants and factors interested in the corn trade of the City of London, think it due to ourselves and to the public to draw your serious attention at this time to the very heavy charges on all corn delivered within the City, arising from old municipal privileges, and comprised under the heads of 'Metage, Tillage, Porterage, Holdage, and Lastage.' These charges are not only out of all proportion to the amount of actual labour performed, and of actual benefit derived from such labour, but are in all cases much heavier, and in many nearly double the rates charged for the same description of labour at most of the other ports in the United Kingdom.

"The increase of railway communication, the advancement of commerce, and the competition in trade all over the kingdom, fostered by the facilities of intercourse, and the swelling population of this country, have all tended to equalize business throughout the realm, and consequently to interfere more or less with metropolitan dealers. Of this interference we do not complain; but we desire that in the new, and we trust improved, state of things, brought about by these means, aided by modern intelligence and enlightened views, these old-fashioned burthens and restraints should be revised and adapted to the existing position of our commercial relations.

"It is wished that the supervision of the measuring and delivering of grain should remain with your honourable court; and there is not any desire on the part of your memorialists to escape payment of a fair price for the labour performed.

"What we suggest is, that in lieu of the present complicated system of charges, comprising no less than twenty-five distinct rates or heads of charge, and which causes great expense and confusion in the collection, a uniform and more direct and simple mode of charges should be substituted, and that such charges should be paid by the sellers or importers.

"Your memorialists have no doubt that if a proper charge were made, a large proportion of the grain delivered from granaries in the port of London, and from railway termini, and which now pays nothing, would, in that event, be metered by sworn meters, and paid for at a fair labour price, as the trade would obviously in all cases prefer the certificate of a sworn meter, a security which they are now obliged to forego, owing to the heavy expense; and many cargoes of grain now diverted altogether from this port, would be brought here, to the benefit of the trade, and metered in like manner.

"Your memorialists therefore respectfully submit to the consideration of your court, whether the time is not now passed when such charges can be fairly enforced (they have become obsolete). They fall oppressively on the merchant, and unjustly on the consumer; and owing to the increased competition in business, and the diminished profits under the operation of causes we have already partially referred to, they now form an item of impost in the corn trade within this City, which cannot longer be borne without a firm and determined attempt at its removal.

"Your memorialists therefore trust that you will be pleased to take this matter into your earnest and immediate consideration; and they are prepared to form a committee from their body, to meet and communicate with a like number of gentlemen appointed by your honourable court, to discuss the subject, and to arrange and carry out a plan for alleviating the grievances in question, against which they feel they have so just and such unanswerable grounds of complaint.

"And your memorialists will ever pray, &c."

1636. Do you consider that that committee fairly represented the corn trade of the City of London?—Undoubtedly so; and we decided upon drawing up this memorial, drawing the attention of the City and the corporation to our grievances, and asking them to relieve us.

1637. What is the prayer of the memorial?—We complain in the memorial of the heavy rate of charge for metage and porterage, and the way in which it is collected.

1638. What do you ask the City to do?—To reduce the charge, and to collect it in one uniform way. There are now twenty-five different modes of charge. We wanted them to make it uniform, and to make one, or at the most, two modes of charge, that is to say: one for heavy corn, and one for light corn, and to levy the charge upon the seller. In some instances it is levied upon the seller, and in some upon both seller and buyer.

1639. Do you name any rate to which you propose that the charge should be reduced?—We did in our report. When the City received this memorial, we received a communication from them, inviting us to embody our views in a report, and that report states very fully what we require.

1640. Will you have the kindness to read the report?—(The same was read as follows):—

"REPORT of the Committee appointed at a general meeting of CORN FACTORS of the City of London, held at Jack's Coffee House, Mark Lane, on the 21st day of October, 1852, for the purpose of supporting the memorial presented to the right honourable the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the City of London, on the subject of the charges for metage, &c., and complying with the invitation contained in the letter of Mr. Serjeant Merewether, dated 16th October, 1852, relative to the objects specified therein.

E. Hales, Esq.

" The committee, having taken the subject into their serious consideration, find as follows :—

" That the corporation of the City of London have for a long period of time, and by virtue of several charters granted to the said corporation, particularly a charter of James I., dated 20th August (3d James I.), 1604, claimed the exclusive right of measuring all corn delivered within the City and port of London, and of charging for such admeasurement.

" That an order or byelaw, emanating from the common council of the City, and dated 5th October, 1620, created a body called the fellowship porters, which body claim to perform all the porterage work connected with the loading and unloading of cargoes of corn, &c., within the port of London, and of charging for the same.

" That the total amount of the said two classes of charges for such measurement and porterage since the reduction was made on the 3d day of May, 1852, average 4*d.* per quarter ex ship, and $2\frac{3}{4}d.$ per quarter ex granary.

" That on the arrival of a cargo of corn in the port of London, the consignee of the said cargo gives to his lighterman, granary keeper, or purchaser, as the case may require, an order on the captain for the delivery of the corn, and the holder of such order then proceeds to the meter's office to procure a sworn meter, upon receipt of which intimation the meter summons to his aid and proceeds with six, seven, and sometimes eight fellowship porters on board the vessel to perform the work of unloading the cargo, which is done by three of the porters descending into the hold of the vessel with the meter. The meter stands with a shovel in his hand. Two porters hold the bushel and force it into the bulk of corn, the meter filling it simultaneously with his shovel. A third porter holds the sack whilst the first two porters fill it, one of them strikes the bushel, the meter at the same time taking tally with a chalk mark on his shovel. Three, four, or five other porters are on deck to hoist the sack up out of the hold of the ship into the barge.

" That in cases where corn is delivered out of granary, and a City admeasurement is required, an order is given to the buyer, who applies for and proceeds with a meter and three or more porters to the granary. The meter and porters merely fill and strike the bushel and fill the sacks, leaving the remainder of the labour and the delivery to be performed by the granary keeper, and for this metage ex granary a charge of about $2\frac{3}{4}d.$ per quarter is made.

" That the following are the rates of charge for metage, &c., in several of the outports of the United Kingdom. No doubt in many instances the same objectionable system prevails as in the port of London, for it must be apparent that corn can be measured for 1*d.* per quarter, as well at most if not at all the other ports of the United Kingdom, as at Wakefield, Bristol, Plymouth, Portsmouth, or Lynn :—

" That it is the duty of the master and crew of every vessel, arriving at any port of the United Kingdom, pursuant to the ordinary terms of the charterparties and bills of lading in use amongst merchants, to assist in the delivery of all cargoes entrusted to their care ; and in the port of London all goods (including even flour) except corn are delivered by or at the expense of the captain ; and it is obvious from this that the practice which has prevailed (however originating) with respect to corn has imposed upon the merchants and consignees of the City of London a burthen and expense which does not of right belong to them, and which has tended and is continuing to divert business from this port, and in fact a very large quantity of corn is now brought to London by railways chiefly to avoid the heavy charge of metage.

" That as evidence of the result of the charge for metage in granary, and in support of the general views of the trade on the entire effect of the system complained of, it should be added that from 20,000 to 30,000 quarters of grain were, only a few years since, measured weekly, ex granary, in the port of London by sworn meters, whilst not more than 2,000 quarters are now so measured.

" That there is no doubt that if the merchants and factors engaged in the corn trade of the City of London were left quite unfettered to make their own arrangements with respect to the measuring and delivering of corn, they could procure responsible parties to perform the whole for $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ per quarter ex ship, and $1d.$ per quarter ex granary. The committee, however, desiring to take an extremely liberal view of the remuneration to be paid for the work done, and having regard to the guarantee afforded by the superintendence of the City of London, recommend that the present numerous charges, amounting in the whole to the before-mentioned sum of about $4d.$ per quarter ex ship, and $2\frac{3}{4}d.$ ex granary, should be reduced to $2d.$ per quarter on heavy grain, and $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ on light grain ex ship; and $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ on heavy grain, and $1d.$ on light grain ex granary, to be paid by the importer or seller, thus avoiding the great expense and trouble of collection from buyers in all parts of the country.

" That as the result of the elaborate and expensive manner in which the privileges claimed are carried into effect, a profit income, as the committee are assured, of from 15,000*l.* to 20,000*l.* a year is derived by the corporation; and, however meritoriously this annual sum may be applied, it is submitted that the levying of any such impost, even if sustainable in point of law, is wrong in principle and prejudicial in effect, amounting in fact to a tax on the consumers of grain throughout the most populous part of the United Kingdom; and further, it is submitted that the charge complained of can only be sustained as a reasonable compensation for the measuring, to perform which the corporation claim the exclusive right, and that any charge beyond such reasonable amount could not be enforced in a court of justice.

" This committee, however, wish to express in the strongest manner their confident hope that the corporation, by voluntarily reducing the charge to the amount above suggested, as enough and more than enough amply to pay for the services rendered, will themselves do justice to all parties concerned.

1641. Has any step been taken by the corporation in consequence of that memorial?—If you will allow me, I will read the substance of the correspondence which took place between us upon it. With that memorial was transmitted a letter by me (I being appointed to manage this thing for the corn trade) to Mr. Alderman Finnis, who was the alderman of the ward in which the Corn Exchange stands. I stated to him, "I now transmit " to you a memorial, signed by the principal merchants and all the factors engaged in " or connected with the corn trade of the port and City of London. In so doing, I beg " leave to request your valuable and cordial assistance towards the promotion of the " object which it embraces. I may observe, that on my part, and on the part of the " gentlemen with whom I act, I should wish to be clearly understood that there is no " desire to infringe or affect the ancient municipal institutions of the City of London; " but that our views are, that these institutions will be best and most effectually sup- " ported by timely concessions to the active spirit of progressive improvement which " distinguishes the age in which we live. It will be apparent to you that so large a " body of gentlemen of experience and property would not have moved in this matter, " had not a change been (in their opinion at least) imperatively called for. For " that opinion, so expressed, I would solicit your careful attention and consideration, " being well assured that the City authorities cannot fail to perceive that the true " interests of this great commercial metropolis, and its ancient corporation, will be well " consulted by an enlightened, liberal, and wise adjustment of the question we have " deemed it our duty to agitate.—I have the honour to be," &c. That was presented to the common council, by Mr. Alderman Finnis, on the 26th of July, 1852, according to the minute I have of the common council. On the 15th of October I received a note from Mr. Serjeant Merewether, the town clerk, in which he states, " I am directed by " the general purposes committee of the common council to communicate with you (on " behalf of the members of the corn trade, who have memorialized the corporation upon " the subject of metage and porterage), and to invite a proposal, embodying the views of " the trade upon the question submitted, at as early a period as may be convenient; " which proposal will receive the earnest consideration of the committee."

1642. Then, was the memorial in consequence of the letter of Mr. Serjeant Merewether?—No, the report was. That letter invited us to make a report, and that report was the consequence. We had a meeting, which appointed a committee to draw up this report, and then came a letter from Mr. Serjeant Merewether, expressing the desire of the City committee (as I believe they were very desirous themselves) that this matter should be settled. He wrote to me, "10th November 1852.—I am directed by the "general purposes committee to draw your attention (on behalf of the corn trade) to "their letter of the 15th ultimo, relative to the pending inquiry in respect of metage, "&c., and also to the invitation therein expressed." I replied to him, saying that the gentlemen engaged in drawing up the report were engaged in business, and that it would require some time to get the documents together, but that we would let him have it as soon as possible. We received another letter on the 6th of December, urging us to give in that report. On the 21st of January I addressed the following letter to Mr. Serjeant Merewether:—"I now beg leave to enclose you a copy of the report of a committee "appointed by a meeting held at Jack's Coffee House, on the 21st of October last, on the "subject of the metage of corn, &c., at this port. This report has been adopted by a "meeting of the trade, held at the London Tavern yesterday, and presided over by John "Masterman, Esq., M.P., and is forwarded to you to be submitted to the general "purposes committee, and by way of reply to the intimation conveyed in your letter to "me of the 15th of October, 1852. It may be proper for the original report to be "presented by the committee of corn factors to the general purposes committee of "the corporation, and if this be thought desirable, the gentlemen constituting the "former committee will attend at the Guildhall at any time you may appiont for "that purpose. I annex you a copy of the resolutions passed at the meeting yester-"day." Mr. Masterman attended at that meeting, which consisted, I believe, of about 100 or 120 merchants and factors connected with the corn trade of London, and if you will allow me I will read the resolutions:—"At a meeting of the merchants and "factors interested in the corn trade of the City of London, held the 20th day of January, "1853, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate Street, London, John Masterman, Esq., M.P., "in the chair; it was moved by Mr. Edward Hales, seconded by Mr. Garford, and carried "unanimously: That the report of the committee appointed by the meeting held at Jack's "Coffee House on the 21st day of October last, having been read, shall be adopted by this "meeting, and forthwith presented by the committee to the corporation through its proper "officer. It was moved by F. W. Russell, Esq., M.P., seconded by Mr. Waugh, and carried "unanimously: That the thanks of the meeting be given to the committee for the care "taken, and the time devoted by them to the preparation of the report which has been "adopted by this meeting. It was moved by Mr. Hales, seconded by Mr. John Woodley, "and carried unanimously: That the resolutions be printed and advertised in one or two "of the leading public journals. It was moved by Mr. Moore, seconded by Mr. Birkett, "and resolved unanimously: That the thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. Masterman "for his kindness in presiding as chairman on this occasion." I received from Mr. Serjeant Merewether an acknowledgment of the report on the 25th of January, in which he says, "I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, together with "a copy of a report of a committee of the corn trade, and to assure you that the same shall "be submitted to the proper authority at the earliest opportunity." A few days afterwards we received another letter, stating, "I am directed by the committee for general "purposes of the Court of Common Council to request that you would be good enough "to furnish them with about twenty copies of the Report of the Committee of the Corn "Trade, in respect of the charges for metage and porterage of corn." That is dated the 1st of March. Not hearing anything from the general purposes committee, I wrote a letter to Mr. Serjeant Merewether on the 11th of April, stating, "The committee of the "corn trade request me to remind you that they are anxiously awaiting a communication "from the committee for general purposes on the subject of the charges for metage and "porterage of corn, and they trust it will be in your power to inform me what steps have "been taken with reference to the report submitted." On the 14th, I received Mr Serjeant Merewether's reply, stating, "I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the "11th instant, and to inform you that the report of the corn trade has been laid before "the committee for general purposes, and will receive from them due consideration; and "so soon as the important inquiries instituted by the committee have been proceeded with, "so as to enable the committee to confer with the corn trade upon the subject, you will "have proper notice, to give the trade an opportunity to attend the committee for the "purpose mentioned." That is the last communication we have received from the City, dated the 14th of April, and the reason why the corn trade has not moved further in the matter up to the present time, has been this: knowing that this Commission was appointed to inquire into these matters, we thought it was better to have this thing settled amicably if possible, and we desired to delay pushing the matter to extremities; but we are fully determined to take the same position exactly as Messrs. Combe, Delafield, and Company have taken. We shall refuse to pay the charge for metage, at least we shall not refuse to pay it altogether; but we shall tender a proper sufficient payment for the work done. We shall refuse to pay the exorbitant charge which the City have hitherto insisted upon, and let them show their right to levy it,—a right which we believe they cannot maintain. And as regards the fellowship porters, they themselves are almost falling to pieces in consequence of the peculiar nature of their institution, being an exclusive body. I believe they used to number about 3,000. They were always liable to be called upon to do this work whether work existed for them to do or not. The consequence was, that a great many of those men, not being able to get sufficient to keep them, got into great distress; that is a notorious fact. But in consequence of the improved demand which has taken place for labour during the last twelve months, I believe many of those fellowship porters have left the fellowship, and are not to be found. The dock companies, when they obtained their acts, obtained power to shut out the fellowship porters from claiming the privilege of doing the porterage in the docks, and they have completely succeeded in shutting them out; but they themselves created as great a monopoly as the City had, and we have the docks to settle with as well as the City, because while they shut out the fellowship porters, they charge the same rate for doing the work that the fellowship porters did. For instance, I know as a fact that the great dock companies have been in the habit of paying men for the porterage of corn a penny per quarter, whilst they have charged 3*d.* per quarter, and that has brought an enormous income to the West India Docks and to the London Docks.

1643. In the paper which you have read the rates of charge for metage and porterage at Liverpool and other ports are given. Are those rates of charge connected with the corporations of those places?—I should say not generally. In some instances they probably are.

1644. Do you think there is any advantage in the corporation of the City of London having anything to do with the work of metage?—I think that the trade in the port of London would be satisfied to have the supervision of the City corporation, provided they had it at a moderate cost.

1645. What are the advantages of that supervision?—The advantages are, that with the immense trade now carried on in London in corn, some protection is required, both for buyer and seller. I may say that the quantity imported into London is equal to the whole consumption of England 150 years ago, for I think it would amount to four millions of quarters a year. The numerous transactions growing out of these large imports render it necessary for buyers and sellers to have a protection upon the sale of what they sell; and I think the certificate of a corporation standing so high as the City of London would be a great satisfaction to the public, even if they had to pay something more for it than they would have to pay otherwise.

1646. You think it is a great advantage to have the metage performed by some independent authority?—I think it is. That is the result of my experience.

1647. Independently of the charge for metage and porterage, is there not a City due levied upon corn imported into the City of London?—The City have very ingeniously contrived to amalgamate those charges together. I have been twenty-five years in the City of London, and I have not been able to unravel all those charges. There are no less than twenty-five charges made.

1648. How do you manage that upon such an article as corn?—Here are the charges (producing a paper). That is their own statement.

1649. Do you believe that that complexity is intentional?—I believe it was so originally. I think the City authorities now are anxious to set the whole of this thing to rights, but such a number of abuses have crept in under this system, that there are some persons who might be injured by the alteration, and it is natural that they should wish to keep the system as it is. For instance, the buyers on wheat pay a large portion of the metage, &c., but not upon any other grain, and upon barley and not upon oats. Now supposing a buyer comes from Cornwall or from Leith, the City have to send to this man to get the charge, and I believe they lose a very large portion of it, that the people will not pay it.

1650. That is a system by which the City are losers?—Yes; I think it is to their advantage to have this system altered.

1651. In one of the papers which you have put in, there is a charge of so much for metage, so much for fillage, and so much for porterage. Are those charges for service performed?—The porterage is, but not the fillage. I think I may say that the meters in the City of London get three farthings for the work performed, and the City of London get three farthings or rather more for doing nothing.

1652. As dues?—Yes; it is a due.

1653. Besides metage, fillage, and porterage, there is a distinct item charged as dues; what is that?—That belongs to the corn market.

1654. It is collected by the City collector, but not paid to the City funds?—No; it belongs to the Corn Exchange. The charges of the fellowship porters have been reduced about twelve months ago about a halfpenny a quarter.

1655. Is that the reduction referred to in the report which was made on the 3d of May, 1852?—Yes; and the London Docks, the St. Katharine's Docks, and West India Docks have reduced their charge in the same proportion about the same time.

1656. Then if the charge for metage by the City were further reduced, is it probable that a similar reduction would take place in the charges of the docks?—I presume that the docks find it to their own interest to follow that precedent, but I think the docks cannot maintain it. That subject is referred to in the report, inasmuch as all our charterparties are made out, saying that the captain shall receive from alongside and shall deliver from alongside any corn that he may take in. Now, in consequence of the City having established these fellowship porters about 200 years ago, they stepped in between the captain and the merchant, and

London, buyers finding that they can buy five, or ten, or twenty quarters on board ship buy those small quantities in retail; and they go to the meters' office, and the meters are obliged to send six or seven men at an expense double the amount which they receive for measuring that small quantity. I think the alteration of the system would do away with that, and prevent great delay in the discharge of ships, because a person buying such a small quantity can hardly expect that the work should be done at the same price as it would be done for a person who buys a large quantity. In ordinary cases if you ask for eight men to work five quarters of oats for you, we know there would be a charge made sufficient to pay them for the labour. Instead of that, the City have introduced this anomaly, that they feel themselves called on to measure even the smallest quantity, as low down as Gravesend. Hence they hold up as an evil what, I say, has been brought about by themselves. If a man wants to measure a small quantity of corn he ought to pay such a charge for it as would amply remunerate the man sent to do it.

1674. Supposing the power of meting corn brought into the port of London were confirmed to the corporation upon the grounds which you have stated, how do you think it would be possible to obviate the occurrence of such cases as that of Messrs. Combe and Delafield?—I would say, if English corn comes to London (foreign corn must be measured for the purpose of the Customs), and is not sold, I would advise the City to give the parties to whom it belongs the right of having it measured or not, as they may prefer; if sold, I would insist upon the right.

1675. Supposing anybody who wished to have his corn measured might have it done, but anybody who did not wish it, might be free to do without it: how would that act?—That would act very well if buyers and sellers choose to agree to that arrangement; but I think the charge should be so low that it would be to the interest of all parties to have it done. If a miller receiving a cargo of wheat from Boston, coming to his own mill, does not require it measured, it ought not to be so.

1676. Might not the whole be left to the operation of individual interest, so that there might be public meters provided by the corporation, and the trade left free to resort to them as they think fit?—Yes; and I am satisfied, even though the charge were higher than it ought to be, the trade would, in 99 cases out of a 100, resort to them. I would beg to read to the Commissioners a letter from Mr. Stead, who was forty years established in the corn trade in Norfolk. He used to malt very largely for Barclay and Co. It is dated June 28th, 1852. He states: "Dear Sir,—I understand that some inquiry is about "to be instituted as to the inconvenient modes and charges upon the importation of corn, "malt, &c., through the river Thames. I need not assure you, as you know, that those "matters militate much against the London trade, and divert it to other ports and "harbours where antiquated charges and distinctions have disappeared. Railroads have "altered the feature of the trade, whilst, protection being removed, profits become less, "and losses more frequent. People did not formerly stop to inquire what were the "charges of porterage, workage, metage, lord mayor's farthings, and such other trifles. "But the time has arrived, that if they be not altered, the trade of London is now and "will become more and more limited; and I submit good reasons there for. Of late "years I have used Hull and Yarmouth in preference to London for the importation of "grain from the Baltic ports, which are nearer. At Hull the finest granaries in the world "have been lately built, and many more are now building; the facilities are greater, "charges less, restrictions extinguished. Great Grimsby Docks have now been opened, "and that port will tread upon the heels of Hull; it is allied with the great arterial rail-"ways, leading to the great district of consumption; inquire where can there be a greater "inlet for importation. Lowestoft is likewise treading upon the heels of Great Yarmouth; "that harbour is attached to the Norfolk railway; it belongs to, and under the wing of "Mr. Peto, with granaries now building. Railways, as you know, have altered the "feature of the entire kingdom. Navigable rivers, subject to detention by floods, winds, "and frost, were formerly the means of transit; railways, subject to neither, have "removed all such obstructions; they will not admit of restriction; the transit through "air offers less resistance than the transit through water. London brewers make, per-"haps, nearly a million quarters of malt per annum in Hertfordshire, Suffolk, and "Norfolk, where they purchase their barley,—the malt does not require to be measured "or sold. From Hertfordshire the malt is transmitted in sacks from the malt-"house there to the brewery in London, without breakage, by the river Lea, and "it is not subject to the intrusion of the fellowship porters, and pays no dues, work-"age, or metage. From Suffolk and Norfolk I have sent my malt in sacks to "Wapping; the sacks must be emptied out by the fellowship porters, thus losing one "and a half to two per cent. breakage amongst the porters' feet, &c.; heavy dues are "imposed; and I have sent ships into the river Lea, not subject to dues or intrusion, the "consequence of such charges and trouble; the most of the malt goes from Norfolk and "Suffolk by railway. As Barclays use 100,000 quarters of malt per annum, if 2,000 "quarters are lost, as above, it makes more than 5,000*l.* yearly loss, besides vexatious "intrusion, restriction, detention, and charge, not likely to encourage trade. Combe and "Company have beaten the corporation and paid no dues for many years. The corporation "are required by the Lord Chancellor's injunctions to produce their charters; till their "charters are produced, Combe and Co.'s suit is sent by the corporation to sleep at Win-

"chester for many years past. I would inquire why Norfolk maltsters pay, and not "Hertfordshire maltsters; and why inflict an imposition on Barclays and not on Combes; "such matters surely require inquiry; and one of the corporation bills were stopped in the "Commons, five years ago, by the petition from the brewers to inquire before the Com- "mons passed the bill." That letter is from a very practical man, who has taken a great deal of trouble about the matter. Here is also a letter from Plymouth, from very intelligent merchants there, Messrs. Treeby and Co., who say: "Sir,—We are in receipt of your "favour of yesterday, and trust you may prevail on the corporation of London to reduce "their exorbitant charge for metage on grain. In the event of success, all the world "will be indebted to you for the removal, in part, of a great piece of injustice and "oppression." The charges on corn in London are so high, that we seldom think of "Mark Lane for purchases; and the metage in general is very short, and the lighterage "and wharfage oppressive." This is a letter from Wakefield:—After giving the charges. the writer says, "If I can assist you in reforming the charges made by the London "corporation, I shall be very willing to do so." This is a very important letter from Boston, from which place we received enormous quantities of corn into London a few years ago:—The writer says, "I send you particulars of charges for working grain at this "port; your charges have been a great bar to our sending more grain to London by "ships, particularly oats; and now the railway gives us such facilities, that I may say "the whole now is sent by that route; but should your extravagant charge of metage and "porterage be reduced to something like that of ours, we may then send a great portion "again by water." If the Commission require it, I can leave an actual account sale of corn shipped to Glasgow, Liverpool, and Wakefield, showing the actual charges made for this very work. I mentioned a short time ago that we had a difference with the Commercial Docks respecting the question of porterage, which resolves itself into the question of metage. In order to test it, I made an engagement with a respectable granary keeper in London to do the work of this vessel, for which the Commercial Docks and the fellowship porters required 3*d.* a quarter, for 1½*d.* a quarter, and I have his letter to that effect. That letter I intend to keep, in case the Commercial Docks should go on with the action. It shows that it could be done for half the price by respectable people; and I have no doubt that responsible parties might be found to do the whole work performed by the fellowship porters and meters of London at the rates mentioned in that report, if not lower. The reason I state that it would be more desirable for the City merely to undertake the charge of the metage is, that supposing you were to fix any charge for the porterage as well as the metage, we know very well that the City rates of labour, like everything else, vary; therefore if you fix the rate this year, it might be too much or too little next year; so that it would be desirable to have it free, in the way I have suggested.

1677. Your suggestion is, that there should be a metage establishment connected with the corporation of London, but that it should be at the option of the parties to resort to it or not, as they might think fit?—I would make it compulsory with regard to foreign corn, because the Customs would require all foreign corn to be metered by a sufficient authority that they might depend on.

1678. Do the Customs measure foreign corn?—No; they take the meters' bills in London; they supervise it in the outports, but it is wretchedly done. I have no hesitation in saying that if the meters' charges were reduced in the same proportion that the granary charges have been reduced since 1828, which is to the extent of 50 per cent., I believe a very large proportion of the corn imported by the great merchants, who are a very influential and wealthy body of men, would be brought to London, merely for the satisfaction of having it measured here, and then transhipped from here to other ports, because we can generally get freights so low that the satisfaction they would get by having it measured in London would induce them to pay some extra charges.

1679. Must not the Customs measure the corn which comes into the port of London for their own purposes?—No; they trust to the City measure; the duty of course is very low.

1680. What do they do in the case of Indian corn, on which there is no duty at all?—They take the same trouble as they do with the other; a tide-waiter goes down once or twice a day to see the work going on, and if there was anything wrong they would soon discover it.

1681. Is the mode of selling corn in London uniform; is it invariably sold by measurement?—No; during the last few years we have sold a great deal by weight, and my opinion is that ultimately almost all corn will be sold by weight.

1682. Is not it sometimes sold both by weight and measurement?—Yes; and that is the best mode in my opinion.

1683. If the element of weight is introduced in the sale of corn, a metage alone by the City meter would not be sufficient, would it, for buyer and seller?—It would be a very simple system; it would work in this way: you have 1,000 quarters of wheat on board a ship. You have nothing to do but to take a small scale, prepared for the purpose, put it on deck, and as the sack was hoisted out of the hold place it on the scale. A meter in good work would not make a difference of a pound a sack in his weight in six hours' work; therefore you can weigh as fast as you can measure. It would only entail the expense of another man, for which one halfpenny a quarter would be ample.

E. Hales, Esq.

1684. There is a great difference between the weight of good wheat and bad wheat, is not there?—Very great; 10 lbs. a bushel often.

1685. Is it the common practice to put the wheat into sacks when taken out of the ship, and afterwards to distribute it in bulk in the granary?—In large quantities we cannot do that; we endeavour to get as much in the sacks as we can, for the sake of saving a second measurement. The City have taken a great deal of trouble in the matter latterly, and one of the gentlemen who has lately been elected an alderman has, much to his credit, been giving a great deal of information before the general purposes committee, Mr. Alderman Muggeridge; I think he could give the Commission a great deal of information if he were so inclined. Another party, who has been the collector of the metage for the last fifty years, could also give you a great deal of information. I speak of Mr. William Ruston, of the City Meters' Office. His office is in doubt, in the prospective alterations, and therefore he might be unwilling to communicate the information in his power. To show the interest which is felt in this matter in the country, I was talking to one of the Gloucester merchants the other day; he said he hoped sincerely we should not get the metage charges reduced, for it would interfere with the trade of Gloucester. I was asked just now if the Customs exercised any supervision over the metage on board ships in the river; I think I replied, "No"; the fact is, they always put an officer on board.

T. Hankey, jun., Esq.

THOMSON HANKEY, Jun., Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

1686. You are a merchant of the City of London?—I am.

1687. Did you not fill the office of Governor of the Bank of England last year?—I did.

1688. How long have you been engaged in trade?—I have been a merchant upwards of twenty-five years.

1689. You have never resided in the City, have you?—Not regularly. I have rooms n the City, where I occasionally sleep.

1690. Have you ever been connected with the corporation of the City of London?—Never, in any way.

1691. Have any of your partners been connected with the corporation?—None.

1692. It is notoriously the case, is it not, that the leading merchants of the City of London are not generally connected with the corporation?—They are not. There are scarcely any of the leading merchants who take any part in the corporation.

1693. To what do you ascribe that indisposition on their part?—It has arisen partly from the merchants of London having withdrawn their residences from the City of London, and partly from the very onerous nature of the duties which attach to the members of the corporation; at least, that part of the body with which they would probably be connected—the aldermen of the City. Their duties are so heavy, and are so much mixed up with magisterial duties and other duties which occupy so large a portion of their time, that I think there is a general indisposition on the part of the merchants to undertake the office.

1694. Do you think it would be desirable that any attempt should be made to connect more closely the great branches of the commerce of London with the corporation?—It has always appeared to me very undesirable that the merchants, as a body, should have no voice and take no part whatever in the corporate affairs of a town with which they are so intimately connected, and in which they carry on the whole affairs of their business.

1695. Can you suggest any means by which it would be rendered more likely that the great merchants should take part in the municipal affairs of London?—I do not think the merchants of the City of London would consent to take any part in the corporation duties of the City of London willingly, while the corporation is conducted as it is at present. I think they consider that there are a great many abuses connected with it. As long as there are a great many persons who are connected with the inferior branches of trade in London, and not with the wholesale departments of trade, who are ready and anxious, for the sake of the honour connected with it, of undertaking those duties, so long the merchants of London will not consider it a matter of duty to undertake them themselves. It has appeared to me with respect to that part of the duties which could be better done by other parties than by those who at present undertake them, that the merchants would not be more unwilling to take their share of the duties of the corporation then they are now in their several capacities to act as income tax commissioners, and to perform the other duties which devolve upon them in their respective positions as private individuals.

1696. Do the great merchants of the City of London take any part in the parish business within the City of London?—Not in the City of London; but I think there are very few of them who are unwilling to take their share of the parish duties in their own respective parishes where they reside.

1697. Do not you think a considerable obstacle is created by the unwillingness of the great merchants and bankers to give up their time to duties of a municipal nature?—I have no doubt they are unwilling to give up their time, and they admit that as an excuse for not attending to duties which they would feel themselves bound to attend to if it were made a matter of emulation and pride on the part of those on whom such duty should devolve.

T. Hankey, jun., Esq.

1698. When you say that in order to induce the great merchants to become connected with the corporation, certain duties which are now imposed upon the members of the corporation should be taken from them, do you allude to the magisterial duties?—I allude to the magisterial duties, and I think also a great many of the ceremonies connected with the corporation give annoyance to the merchants, and that they would not consent to go through them.

1699. You refer to the description of pageanty which surrounds the great offices of the City?—Yes; and the necessity which would be imposed upon himself, unless he would appear singular, of going through what appears now to be the regular duty of an alderman.

1700. Do you refer to the duties of hospitality which are exercised by the Lord Mayor?—Partially so. The duties of hospitality might be discharged certainly in a much less ostentatious manner than they are at present.

1701. Do you think there is a certain fitness in the chief magistrate of the City sometimes presiding at entertainments on public occasions?—So long as there is a corporation in the City of London and a chief magistrate, or chief by whatever name he may be designated, if the magisterial duties were removed, I think the duties of hospitality, as exercised by the present Lord Mayor, are by no means undesirable; but I think the annual entertainment at the Guildhall is a very heavy expense, and a very useless one. I do not know how many thousands of pounds are spent in that entertainment, which scarcely gives gratification to anybody but the idle boys about the streets of London.

1702. Has not the large number of persons who are invited to the annual entertainment at the Guildhall rather a tendency to prevent the speeches, which are delivered by the Ministers and other public persons at that dinner, from being heard, which would not be the case if the number were less?—I think, as far as bringing the members of Government into communication with the citizens of London goes, that object would be much better attained by confining the entertainments to the Mansion House than giving them at the Guildhall. I have always witnessed, on occasions on which there is any political excitement, that the guests who have been invited have taken great interest in the speeches, and in the opportunity of meeting with the members of the Government and the distinguished foreigners who may be invited on such occasions to the Mansion House, but I never could see any good whatever in the entertainments at the Guildhall.

1703. Is not it the fact that the speeches delivered at the Guildhall are totally inaudible to the great majority of the persons present?—During the time I was in office as Governor of the Bank I was always invited to those Guildhall dinners, and I can only say that, although I had what I believe was a seat of honour assigned to me, I could never hear a single thing that was said in the hall.

1704. Do you know what is the general feeling in the City with respect to what is called "The Lord Mayor's show"?—I believe there is no interest taken in it whatever, except by mere idlers in London, and the children who are brought up to see it.

1705. Do you believe it is considered generally acceptable to the persons who witness it in the streets?—I should think not. I should think the tradesmen of the City of London must consider it a great inconvenience and annoyance. The upper classes, certainly, can derive very little gratification from it. It is only a gratification to children and idle boys, and to a great number of idlers who are brought into London and waste the day; there is a great deal of drinking and dissipation going on.

1706. Do you think it conduces to the dignity and consideration of the office of Lord Mayor that he himself should form a portion of that procession?—I think so long as there is a Lord Mayor he ought to move about in a carriage of sufficient state to show the importance attached by his fellow-citizens to the office; but as at present conducted it is a mere show without any use whatever. I do not think it adds to his importance at all, but rather makes him ridiculous.

1707. The procession has altered its character of late years. It used to be at all events a memorial of antiquity; it is now a sort of allegorical procession, is not it?—I think it has altered its character during the time I have lived in the City. Every year it appears to become more ridiculous.

1708. It no longer calls to mind former times in any manner, does it?—Except the antiquity of the coach; that is the only thing. The attendants generally and the allegories are those which are got up by people from Astley's and other establishments of that kind.

1709. It is no longer like the processions of the middle ages, is it?—I should think not.

1710. Assuming that some persons might think it desirable to keep up an ancient amusement of this kind for the sake of the spectators, do you think it desirable to connect the Lord Mayor with the procession?—I should think it still more absurd than at present, if the Lord Mayor were left out; it would degenerate into a procession without a meaning.

1711. You are of opinion that the chief magistrate, however, ought to exercise decent and even splendid hospitality?—Yes; I think, so long as there is a corporation of London, the chief of that corporation, whatever his title may be, whether chief magistrate or any other name, ought to have a position, and maintain that position with dignity, so as to command respect from those who attach importance to matters of that kind.

1712 Are you aware of the nature of the entertainments given by the mayor of

T. Hankey, jun., Esq.

17th Nov. 1853.

Liverpool?—I never dined on state occasions with the mayor of Liverpool. I believe they are conducted in a much quieter manner than in London; but I have always understood that they have been conducted in a respectable manner, and in a manner which does ensure respect and esteem by the corporation of both Manchester and Liverpool.

1713. It is the habit of the mayor to entertain distinguished visitors, who go to Liverpool, in a public manner, is it not?—I believe so.

1714. At the dinner at the Guildhall, the body of the hall is filled with a great many persons and their families. Are they common councilmen?—Yes, I believe so.

1715. They are not guests at the Mansion House?—No; but as far as the opportunity of hearing or even seeing much goes, it is almost a farce. It is merely an opportunity of giving a certain number of people a dinner. It is impossible for them to hear anything that is going on, and I should doubt whether they could see the guests of importance, except perhaps when coming into the room.

1716. Supposing it were not necessary, to be capable of filling the office of Lord Mayor, that he should belong to the body of aldermen, do you think the leading merchants of the City of London might be induced to accept the office of Lord Mayor for a year?—I think the corporation might be so framed, and its duties so arranged, that the merchants would not be unwilling to undertake the duty of acting in conjunction with the corporation.

1717. Do not you think it possible that a merchant might be willing for a year to accept the office of Lord Mayor as a matter of duty, who might not be willing all his life to be an alderman?—I think it is very possible it would be so; but I cannot conceive why the office of an alderman should involve duties for life any more than the office of a churchwarden, or many offices of a public nature of that kind, which men will accept for a year, but which they would be as unwilling to undertake for life as they are now to undertake the duties of an alderman.

1718. Have you ever given your attention to what would be the best system to be adopted in regard to the municipal government of the City of London?—I have often thought of it, and it has appeared to me that the duties of the corporation are by no means useless in London; but I think they are inapplicable to the present state of affairs, as confined to the City of London alone. I think there are certain corporation duties which ought to be undertaken, and which could be better done by a corporation throughout all London. I would have corporations for all London, whether there were one corporation for the whole of London, or whether you introduce what appears to me would be very much better, the same kind of system that there is in Paris. The town is divided into certain arrondissements or departments, and each department has a mayor and a certain number of officers connected with him. They attend to the municipal duties connected with their particular departments. I do not know what influence they have over the whole body in their corporate capacity, or whether each mayor with his subordinate officers attends to the duties only of his own department; I think that is the case. But in London it has appeared to me that a system of that kind might be devised. London being divided into a certain number of departments, each department having its mayor or chief municipal officer, and a certain number of officers who would be elected annually, and would meet for certain other municipal purposes in a general capacity. There are certain things which it appears to me could be much better done in a great town by a corporation than in any other manner. The improvement of the streets, for example. In the City of London that part of the duties is to a certain extent well and usefully done, and I should be very sorry to see the corporation of the City of London done away with, till I can see some other system devised by which those corporation duties could be performed, not only in the City of London but throughout the metropolis, in a more effective manner. I think it is at present subject to considerable abuses; but I am no advocate for doing away with the system altogether; on the contrary, I think the system ought to be extended to all London. I think the duties of a magistrate are no necessary part of a corporation; they have nothing to do with the duties of a corporate character, which I would limit to that which can be better done by a general body than by individuals. I think the paid magistracy of the metropolis generally works well to the satisfaction of the people at large, and I can see no object whatever in devolving magisterial duties upon a certain set of men who cannot be so well fitted for them as those who have been educated for the purpose, and who devote their whole time and attention to those duties. This is particularly true in the case of an alderman, who is selected from men actively engaged in business, and generally in a position in which their time is fully occupied. I think certainly that part of the duties should be taken altogether away from the corporation or its members; but there are certain other municipal duties, such as the improvement of the streets, lighting, sewerage, paving, and general attention to the cleanliness, care, and comfort of the inhabitants of a town, which can be always better done by persons in a corporate capacity, because the system can be made uniform. At present, if any parish were to alter a street, they might be stopped half way by a quarrel with another parish. There would be an advantage in acting in a corporate capacity generally for such purposes.

1719. As a merchant, have you ever found any reason to complain of the conduct of the corporation?—The business with which I have always been connected, has had no connexion with the corporation, and there has been no necessity for applying to them.

T. Hankey, jun., Esq.

17th Nov. 1853.

My business is that of a West India merchant, and I have not had anything to do with the corporation. But it appears to me that the corporation of the City of London cannot interfere in any way to do good, and that any interference must be rather prejudicial than otherwise. I do not think we want, in the existing state of affairs, any corporation to tell us what we had better do, or take charge of any affairs connected with our business, or protect us as traders. The more we are left to ourselves the better we manage our affairs.

1720. When you speak of the mayors of different departments, you allude to the whole metropolis?—To the whole metropolis.

1721. Do you think the City of London, properly so called, is large enough to make it necessary to divide it?—I think, if corporations were formed for the other parts of London, the City of London might remain one also. I see no advantage in limiting the City of London to any particular boundary. If all London were on one uniform system, there would be no necessity for the barrier being at Temple Bar or Bishopsgate Street. It would be according to such arrangement as would tend to work for the general benefit of the whole.

1722. Do you think it desirable that there should be a corporation which should have power over the whole metropolis?—I think, if there were a corporation for the borough of Marylebone; a corporation for the borough of Finsbury; a corporation for the borough of the City of London, and the other parts of London, it might be very desirable for certain purposes that there should be an aggregate union of the bodies for joint action.

1723. Your view seems to be that London might be divided into a number of municipalities?—Yes.

1724. Some to the north of the river and some to the south?—Yes.

1725. That certain objects of municipal government, for instance, paving and lighting, and such like functions, should be assigned to each municipality separately; and that there are certain other objects for which they should be combined?—Yes.

1726. Are there not some objects in which the entire metropolis has a common interest, for example, the widening of the great thoroughfares, or the building of bridges?—Undoubtedly. It is for that reason, I think, that though particular corporations would attend to certain things in their own locality, they should act as a general corporate body with respect to others. There might be a deputation from each mayoralty, to meet in common as to certain things where the supervision of the whole might be required. There are two things particularly interesting to the whole of the metropolis: one is the supply of water, and the other is the sewerage and drainage. I think those two subjects call loudly for the interference of either some special board of the Government, or some public body, which would take cognizance of the interests of the whole of the metropolis.

1727. Has not the whole of the metropolis a common interest in the building of bridges over the Thames?—Yes; and nothing shows more the inaptitude of the corporation of the City of London for its purposes, as protecting the general interests of the inhabitants of London, than its conduct towards the bridges. Any person in the habit of walking over London Bridge will see that the thoroughfare is not sufficiently large for the traffic using it. Close by there is Southwark Bridge, which is comparatively empty. I know nothing further about it than I have seen in the papers; but we have heard that the corporation have been long considering the subject of buying it, but they have been doubting whether they should give 250,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* It appears to me to be a paltry and foolish thing to dispute about such a trifling sum. It is a matter of public interest that the great thoroughfares should be made public and free. I think they ought never to have been granted by Parliament as monopolies originally; and having the opportunity of buying them which the corporation certainly has in the case of one bridge, that of Southwark, I can hardly understand how any set of men who have an object in promoting the welfare of the City of London, can hesitate in purchasing that bridge, and thereby affording an immense accommodation to the public at large. Certainly it appears to me to be a step antecedent to any proposed alteration or widening of London Bridge, which I see is now talked of in the newspapers.

1728. Has not there always been found in practice a great difficulty in providing funds for the construction of bridges in London?—I think that is a question which rather affects the Government than individuals. I think if the Government consider the metropolis to be under the charge, as I presume it is supposed to be, of the Home Secretary, or some functionary of the Government,—for there is no one else who takes charge of it, except in the case of the City of London proper,—they ought to take care that there are public thoroughfares and good thoroughfares, suitable to the traffic and the wants of the people; but they seem to me never to have taken that subject into consideration, but to have left it entirely to private enterprise to build bridges over the Thames.

1729. If the Government desired to come forward to build a bridge, have they any means of building it, other than by asking Parliament for a vote of money?—I presume not.

1730. Would not that money be paid out of the general exchequer, and therefore from taxes levied over the whole of the United Kingdom?—It need not be so. At the present moment the Government have granted very large taxation, not only on London but on the suburbs of London, in the way of coal dues, and they have allowed the income derived from that source to be applied in building streets in Westminster and elsewhere.

T. Hankey, jun., Esq.

17th Nov. 1853.

They are called the City dues, and the City has the discredit of the taxation, but I believe I am correct in saying that it is applied in improvements all over the metropolis.

1731. The coal tax is a coal tax levied upon the inhabitants of the entire metropolis, and upon the inhabitants of the metropolis alone?—The limit of the coal dues extends, I believe, to twenty miles round London.

1732. They are levied upon the inhabitants of what may be called the metropolitan district?—I believe so.

1733. Would it in your opinion be desirable that there should be a power of levying a rate upon the inhabitants of the metropolis at large for purposes of public utility, such as that of building bridges, or forming parks, or constructing public works useful to the entire metropolis?—I believe if, either through the medium of corporations, or through some public department of the Government, attention was paid to the general improvement of the metropolis, both as to building bridges, sewering, lighting, and water, the inhabitants of London would cheerfully consent to pay any taxation which was necessary for that purpose.

1734. At present there is no means without a special Act of Parliament, is there, of levying a tax which extends over the whole of the metropolis, but is confined to the metropolis?—I am not aware of any.

1735. You must resort to one of the two funds, either to the City or to the general exchequer?—As at present constituted, because there is no corporation whose powers are co-extensive with the metropolis.

1736. Do you contemplate that by some such union of municipalities as that which you have sketched out, it would be possible to levy a tax upon the entire metropolis, for purposes of general metropolitan utility?—I think it would.

1737. Have you attempted to form any idea of how that object could be accomplished?—I think, if the taxation were raised in the shape of a house tax, or anything like a property tax, it would be far more cheerfully paid, and appear more reasonable and comprehensible to the minds of the inhabitants of London, and its immediate neighbourhood, than the present mode of raising a tax by coal duties. I think the coal duties are not a generally acceptable tax; it is little understood; it is considered generally to be a City tax, and that it is intended for the purposes of the City. I believe a great deal of odium has in that way been brought upon the City, which is very undeserved.

1738. Do you think it would be possible to form a metropolitan board of works, with a power of taxation co-extensive with the metropolis?—I can see no reason why it should not be.

1739. Would it be possible to form such a body without infusing into it the element of popular election?—I think the element of popular election would make it work better in many respects; it would certainly make it more popular if the people had a voice in the election of those who were to have the power of taxing them. That has been generally considered to be a sound principle, whether it has worked to the benefit of the people or not.

1740. Supposing London were divided into municipalities, could you form such a board by taking one or two members from each municipality, and giving that combined board the power of taxation?—I can see no difficulty in it. You have now the power of raising taxes in parishes for lighting, paving, and watching.

1741. Do you think the public would submit to a system of that sort willingly?—They would like it much better, I think, than the present tax on coals.

1742. Might not either the First Commissioner of the Board of Works, or some other person appointed by the Government, be ex-officio a member of such board, so as to guard whatever interests the Government might have in the protection of the metropolis?—I can see no reason why that should not be so.

1743. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—The only other point to which I wish to allude is this: I observe, though I have not read attentively the examination of several gentlemen before the Commissioners, one or two merchants of London have alluded to the formation of a chamber of commerce.

1744. The Commissioners would be very glad to have your opinion upon that point?—As far as I have been able to give the subject consideration, it has appeared to me that neither chambers of commerce nor tribunals of commerce would be at all desirable in London. I can conceive no practical use to arise from them; but, on the contrary, I think they would lead to a great deal of harm. I read with astonishment that two of my brother merchants entertained a different opinion, because those with whom I am daily associating, and I associate with a great many of the merchants of London, are, I should almost say, unanimous in an opinion that neither tribunals of commerce nor chambers of commerce are desirable in London. With regard to tribunals of commerce, I have always thought, supposing they were sanctioned by the Government and made into tribunals of any importance, they would be the formation of a third or fourth court of law, whic would be a court of law having the position of an inferior court, and would never command that weight and influence, and give that satisfaction which the superior courts of law now do. Unless it were presided over by judges of as high character as the judges who now preside over our courts of law, there would be constant appeals to those tribunals, and that would rather add to the expense of litigation than diminish it. With regard to a chamber of commerce, as far as I understand the meaning of a chamber of commerce, it gives an opportunity for meeting and discussing matters in which commercial men have a common interest, and forms a medium of communicating with the Government of the day, or between different classes of the mercantile community, on subjects of general interest. I do not know whether those chambers are generally found to work well on the Continent, though, from the almost universal existence of them, I suppose they are found to be of some use. Some of our towns in England which have risen to great commercial importance have made use of those institutions, particularly Manchester and Liverpool. But I have observed that the chambers of commerce in those places have a tendency to become mere political bodies. At Manchester, I believe, the chamber of commerce was an extremely well organized body, and did a great deal of good at the time of the discussion of the corn laws, and created great interest throughout England. It was at the chamber of commerce that such subjects were most discussed; and either pamphlets emanating from that body, or persons connected with that body, conveyed a great deal of information to the community at large. But the result of their particular attention to that subject has been, that I believe now those gentlemen who are connected with trade in Manchester, who take different views from those which are held generally by the members of the chamber, have ceased to take a part in it. The chamber of commerce has become now, I will not say exclusive, but far too exclusive a body to attend to the general affairs of the town. I think chambers of commerce will always have that tendency in large towns; as the towns increase, they will cease to be of any use as a means of collecting together general information on commercial subjects.

1745. What has been the case at Liverpool; has the chamber of commerce taken a useful and active part in commercial subjects, and united the merchants, irrespectively of party differences and political opinions?—I am not aware of the working of the chamber of commerce at Liverpool, but I can well fancy that the chambers of commerce in country towns would be more useful than they would be in the metropolis. In London now commerce is so sub-divided, that there are very few subjects in which we have a common interest. For instance, in the trade with which I am connected we have no common interest with the large trade to the Baltic; we have no common interest with the Levant trade, nor with the East India trade; but we all have, in fact, our own chambers of commerce in our own trades. We have the West India Association; there is the Baltic Coffeehouse; there are places of meeting in almost all the trades. Ever since I have been in business I have been connected with shipping, and we have always had a shipping association, and we have an association which is well known under the name of "Lloyd's," where anything with regard to shipping can always be brought forward, though it could not well be discussed. I think as a chamber of commerce it would be on too large a scale. At present the merchants connected with the northern trade assemble at the Baltic Coffeehouse, others meet at the Jamaica Coffeehouse, others at different places, and they there discuss all matters connected with their particular business. And then as to the means of communicating with the Government, ever since I have been in business I have never found the slightest difficulty in communicating with every member of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, on any matter relating to the trade in which I have been interested, and I believe that other merchants connected with London would say the same thing. If that be the case, I think it is more likely that a chamber of commerce would either become a political body, or would soon become effete for the purposes for which it was intended, namely, the consideration of matters in which traders have a common interest.

1746. Do you know how it has worked in Liverpool?—No.

1747. Liverpool resembles London very much in most of the particulars which you have mentioned; the chambers of commerce there are very various?—Yes; but they have not the same means of communicating that we have in London with the Government. We can always communicate with the members of the Government within an hour. It requires more formality to constitute a deputation, though that deputation may have more weight, as coming from an aggregate body of commercial men. Even at Liverpool, I believe, now almost all the different trades have their own exclusive unions. I know they have an East India Association and a West India Association.

1748. Have not they also a chamber of commerce?—Yes; I do not know whether it works well or not. I do not think that any of those men with whom I am in the habit of associating are of opinion that either chambers of commerce, or tribunals of commerce, would be any benefit to the City of London.

The witness then withdrew.

Mr. G. F. Allcock.

Mr. George Frederick Allcock, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

1749. You are a citizen of London?—I am.

1750. Do you reside there?—I reside in the City.

1751. Do you carry on trade in the City?—I carry on the trade of a gold refiner and bullion dealer, and have done so for the last thirty years.

1752. Is your trade wholesale or retail?—It is partly both.

1753. Have you ever been connected with the corporation?—I have not been connected with the corporation, but as a liveryman of London I have taken an active part for many years in the elections of the various officers.

Mr. G. F. Allcock.

17th Nov. 1853.

1754. Is there any point with reference to those elections to which you desire to call the attention of the Commission?—The first point to which I should wish to call the attention of the Commissioners is this: that the constituency is so extraordinarily narrow, that it does not fairly represent the citizens of London generally. The franchise now lies with the freemen householders for all wardmote officers, such as the election of common councilmen and aldermen. Those freemen householders do not comprise more than about 200 out of 1,000, or one-fifth of the general inhabitant householders. The consequence is, that where you come to reduce that 200 by various circumstances, you find, that if a common councilman goes to an election, he will get perhaps 110, or 120, or 130 votes. You therefore see perhaps 1,000 inhabitant householders reduced to that small constituency, by that word "freemen" being introduced. That is the great objection all inhabitants have, that the freemen householders disqualify every other inhabitant, merchant, banker, wholesale dealer, and private resident. Unless those persons occupy houses in the City and are free of the City, they have no vote.

1755. What constituency do you propose to substitute for the one which you object to?—The extension of the franchise to every inhabitant householder of the City of London paying scot and bearing lot, with six months' occupation.

1756. Is there any other point to which you desire to call our attention?—I have found, in consequence of the narrowness of the constituency, it is almost impossible for any new candidate to attempt to make any alteration by being introduced into the corporation. There is a close combination of the old members to keep out new ones. If a death takes place, a sort of house list is made up by the old members, who select one of their own friends, who is nominated. He is put in nomination at a sort of hole and corner meeting called a precinct meeting; and then he is sent forward as one of the number. If any gentleman, upon independent principles, fancies he should like to get into the corporation, for the sake of carrying out some useful reform, he is immediately met with the statement, "We are very comfortable as we are, and do not want any reform." I have had that answer given to me upon many occasions.

1757. What do you propose with respect to the livery companies; would you retain the electors in common hall as they are at present?—I think the liveries generally ought to have no influence whatever in the election of the corporate officers. They have their own municipal rights, which they exercise very stringently. For example, some of the poorer companies had various rights conferred upon them in early ages, which they exercise at the present day, to the great detriment of young beginners in trade. The bakers can compel any young man who wishes to set up in business, to take up his livery in their company. The Founders' Company have the control over all weights and measures which are manufactured in London; and, unless they are taken to Founders' Hall to be stamped, they are illegal, and may be seized and destroyed. That is an evil, which I believe every class of trade feels. It is possible to get weights and measures made at Birmingham, or any great manufacturing town, much better and cheaper than in London; but they must be previously taken in London to Founders' Hall to be stamped. A few weeks ago the Founders' Company, for some reasons, which of course are not apparent to me, thought proper to send inspectors round to all the bullion dealers in the City who are using troy weights. Now, they never enforce inspection in other weights than in avoirdupois weights; the consequence was, that all the bullion dealers were told that every weight they were using was illegal, because it had not been stamped at Founders' Hall. I said, "I give my orders to my scalemaker to provide me weights and everything else wanted "in the business. I do not ask him whether it is right or wrong. I trust to him."

1758. The privilege to which you now refer is a company's privilege, and not a corporation privilege?—It is a livery privilege. The Vintners' Company, I believe, has the power of compelling a vintner to take up his livery. All this tends to cripple a young beginner in trade.

1759. Would you think it desirable that the liverymen of the companies should be the electors in common hall?—I think not. I think the electors of the City generally, as I have just proposed, namely, all the inhabitant householders, should have the option of going to the Guildhall, or to the wardmotes, and choosing those persons whom they thought fit and proper to represent them.

1760. Would you deprive the liverymen of their municipal franchise?—All those who resided in the City would still possess it; but there may be persons who reside a considerable distance off—they may be in Germany or in Paris—but they can come over and exercise the right, because they have paid for it, although they do not pay one farthing in corporation rates and taxes.

1761. You would not allow the liverymen to vote as such, unless they occupied a house in the City?—Certainly not; they ought, I think, to vote only as householders.

1762. In what ward is your house of business?—The ward of Aldersgate.

1763. How many voters are there at present?—There are about 900 inhabitant householders who would all be entitled to the franchise if the word "freemen" were not attached to it.

1764. How many freemen are there?—The freemen householders are less than 200, according to the last list that was made out; and when the last contested election took place for ward officers, there were only 110 who polled out of an influential and large ward containing a great many wholesale houses; those were brought up by the eight common councilmen who represent the ward.

1765. The alteration you recommend would increase the constituency of your ward from 200 to 900?—Yes.

1766. If such an alteration were extended to the whole City, do you think the constituency would be sufficiently large, preserving the City boundaries, to secure a good representative body?—Yes. It would make an entire alteration in the body who are now elected. You would have a better class. The franchise now resting in the smaller class of shopkeepers and traders, they generally have a predilection for men of their own class. If a merchant or a banker should feel inclined to put himself forward, they would say they do not want merchants and bankers as common councilmen. By the proposed alteration you would enable every gentleman who thought proper to go and support a friend, or a man whom he thought would better represent him, but he cannot do so at present. The next point which I wish to call your attention to is the election of aldermen. I think the election of aldermen stands upon a very wrong basis. Very often they receive no vote at all. Sir Peter Laurie never recorded a vote in his life; it was by a mere chance that he became an alderman. No one at that moment could be found to stand forward as a candidate when the late Alderman Cox died, and therefore, as a matter of course, he was elected. In a great many wards the constituency is so small, that I believe if there should be a contest the number of votes would not amount to above thirty or forty for each. When I consider that thirty or forty persons have the power of creating a magistrate, who is afterwards to be the chief magistrate of the City, I never can imagine that that can fairly be called the representation of the City of London. The extension of the franchise would remedy that.

1767. Would it remedy it so long as the present inequalities of the wards continue?—No. Then we come to the next point, which is the equalization of the wards. In some wards there are not 200 electors. Bassishaw does not contain above fifty or sixty. In Walbrook ward, where there was a contest some years ago, I believe, upon a scrutiny taking place, one candidate had thirty votes and the other thirty-four. If you carried out an equalization of the wards, you would not want half the present number of aldermen. Put those smaller wards together, and you might reduce the number of aldermen from twenty-four to twelve. Another evil with respect to aldermen is, that they are elected for life. You have no means of getting rid of an alderman however much you may disapprove of his conduct. It has happened in the course of my experience that if an alderman is unfortunate in business, his brethren are exceedingly kind to him. They have always good berths to command, and he is put into one. That was the case with the late Alderman Thomas Wood; he is now chief clerk at the Guildhall. That gentleman, I believe, was very much injured by his contests to become Lord Mayor. It is true the corporation opposed him, because there were certain rumours afloat which did not redound much to his advantage. They opposed his being the Lord Mayor, but they soon afterwards made him the consulting legal officer of the corporation.

1768. Will you proceed to the next point which you wish to mention?—If the wards were equalized, in my humble opinion you would have a far better constituency. You would not require the same number of aldermen, and I would likewise suggest that there should be paid magistrates to the two police offices in the City of London; men who understand the profession, and who are not dependent upon a solicitor who may be, by the influence of certain members of the corporation, made a clerk, from whom the magistrate or alderman has to take his law. He has no one else to consult. I think those are matters which would very materially conduce to mend the corporation, but not destroy it.

1769. Would you propose to maintain a separate court of aldermen?—I should allow the aldermen to remain a part of the corporation, but not a detached part as now. They have now a separate chamber, and they have certain means at their command uncontrolled by the common council. They can make grants of money; they can, in fact, grant pensions to some of their own relatives.

1770. You would propose to diminish the number of the aldermen, to make them periodically elective, and to abolish their separate court?—I should certainly abolish their right of presiding as magistrates in administering the law, because they are not men, from their former habits of life, competent to perform the duty.

1771. You would deprive them of their magisterial duties, and, in addition to that, abolish their separate court. You would incorporate them with the common council, and cause them to be periodically elected?—Yes; a common councilman is elected annually, an alderman for life.

1772. Do you see any advantage in keeping up the election of chamberlain and bridgemasters, and one or two other petty officers in common hall?—The various evils which have arisen from these elections would be remedied by the extension of the constituency, because if all the citizens took an interest in those elections, you would not find men who would have the temerity to come forward for a situation of 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* a year, and literally buy it. The bribery and corruption in the City is so great that it is thought only a very venial offence. In the late election for chamberlain a person was brought, in my presence, from the workhouse to vote ; he was no liveryman, but he was brought from the workhouse and paid for coming.

Mr. G. F. Allcock.

17th Nov. 1853.

1773. If the common councilmen were elected by the constituency you have described, might not they be trusted to elect the chamberlain and the bridge-masters ?—I think so. You would, in the first instance, have the choice of the citizens in the common council.

1774. Would it be desirable in your opinion that the Lord Mayor should be elected by the whole constituency or by the common council ?—As the principal officer of the corporation, I think he ought to be elected by the citizens, and that would prevent anything like partisanship in the common council.

1775. In the event of a contest, it would probably increase the expense, would it not ? —Not more than it would in the case of a member of Parliament. There is no necessity for going to great expense, unless they resort to corrupt means ; that is where the cause of the great expense lies. In any reform of the corporation which may take place, if that bribery clause were inserted which is now applied to members of Parliament, it would have a great effect. If every man had the bribery oath put to him who was brought up to the poll, it would send back a vast number, but I believe there is no check whatever to it.

1776. Is it the general belief at the City elections that bribery is not illegal ?—It is. It is notoriously done in open day ; in fact, they make a boast of it.

1777. Do both the candidates at contested elections in general act upon the belief that bribery is not illegal ?—I believe, at the last election for chamberlain, the thing went on very well for a day or two, but a certain party was determined not to be beaten, and the consequence was, that money was let fly and a great many persons were bought and carried up to the poll without caring a straw who was chamberlain. I believe two guineas were given to some of the butchers in Newgate Market for a vote. I know one or two who, it was stated, took the bribe.

1778. Is there anything connected with your trade to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners ?—The bullion business has nothing to do with the corporation.

1779. Have you never found any reason to complain of the corporation connected with your own trade ?—No ; the only thing I can refer to is the Founders' visit, which after all produced no advantage. They withdrew all their charges. They went into the bullion office of the Bank of England, and gave them notice that they should seize all their weights, because they had not been stamped at Founders' Hall ; the weights of the Bank of England being well known to be the best in the kingdom.

1780. Is there anything further which you wish to state ?—With respect to the election of aldermen, I would beg to say that some years ago there was a contested election for the ward of Bassishaw. The constituency was found to be very small, and it occurred to one of the candidates that he might make half a dozen friends liverymen and present them with their freedom, and so carry the election. The opposite party heard of it, and instead of six he made twelve, and the consequence was he gained his election. That is not exactly bribery, but it is very close to it.

1781. He paid the fees on the admission to freedom of those persons ?—Yes.

1782. Do persons become entitled to vote immediately on taking out their freedom ?— They do.

Adjourned to to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Friday, 18*th November*, 1853.

W. Cotton, Esq.

18th Nov. 1853.

WILLIAM COTTON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

1783. You are a director of the Bank of England ?—I am.

1784. Are you a merchant of the City of London ?—I have never been engaged as a merchant. I have had a counting-house in the City, but my principal occupation has been that of a shipowner and a manufacturer, carrying on business at Limehouse.

1785. Have you long been connected with that branch of business ?—About forty-five years.

1786. During that period has your attention been at all directed to the operation of the proceedings of the corporation of London ?—My attention has been directed rather to the general constitution of the corporation of the City of London, than to any minute details of their proceedings.

1787. You are doubtless well acquainted with the division of the governing body between the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council ?—I am aware of the general constitution of the corporation.

1788. Does it appear to you that that division is a desirable one ?—I think a division, but not constituted as it is at present, might be advantageous in every corporation ; I mean that there should be one body superior to another.

1789. What do you conceive to be the general nature of the business transacted by the Court of Aldermen, as distinguished from the business connected with the Court of Common Council?—The Court of Aldermen are magistrates of the City of London, and from what I have observed, they have peculiar duties which devolve upon them with reference to the election of certain officers, and the general management of the City. I can only judge of their duties by what I have seen recorded in the newspapers. I have no other knowledge of them.

1790. You are aware that the aldermen sit together as a court, and that the separate aldermen also sit as magistrates?—I am.

1791. Do you think it expedient that the aldermen should exercise the functions of magistrates?—I think there is an inconvenience in it. From the number of cases which come before the Lord Mayor and aldermen, parties are not well disposed to become aldermen in consequence of the heavy tax upon their time in the administration of justice. I think there is always an advantage in having the administration of justice, where it can be efficiently accomplished, in the hands of independent persons, rather than paid magistrates. I have observed this in respect to the administration of justice in counties, and I think it would be the case in the City of London; but the circumstances of the City of London of late years have been so completely changed, that there is great difficulty now in getting competent persons to undertake the duty of alderman, who at the same time can devote their time efficiently to the discharge of their duties as magistrates.

1792. Taking the circumstances of the City of London, and of the office of alderman, as they exist, do you think it desirable that the aldermen should continue to exercise the functions of magistrates?—I think not. I think there ought to be responsible magistrates appointed. I would not deprive the aldermen of the office of magistrates of the City of London; but there should be some competent person, like the ordinary police magistrates, to preside in the Courts, and the aldermen should not be dependent upon their assessors for that information which is necessary for the due administration of the laws.

1793. At present are the Lord Mayor and the aldermen, to a considerable extent, dependent upon the advice of their paid assessors?—I think they are; but as far as I can judge, they have been fortunate in the parties they have had as their assessors.

1794. Then, though the system is nominally one of an unpaid magistracy, it is in reality one of a stipendiary magistracy?—It is one of a stipendiary magistracy, without the responsibility which I think ought to devolve upon the legal advisers.

1795. Do you think the aldermen of London, acting as magistrates, are more dependent upon their officers than the county magistrates are upon their clerks?—The county magistrates, generally speaking, have more time, and have less to do, and from their position in society, and from other circumstances, are better acquainted with the laws which they have to administer, than gentlemen who are elected as aldermen, and who have had no previous instruction in the law.

1796. The result of the present system is, according to your view, that the paid assessor of the alderman is practically the magistrate, though without an efficient responsibility?—I think he is. The responsibility certainly rests upon the alderman, but for legal knowledge he very much depends upon the assessor.

1797. What are the duties which you contemplate the Court of Aldermen, supposing it were maintained separately, ought to discharge?—It appears to me that the whole constitution of the City of London should be materially altered. I should be very sorry indeed to see the corporation of London no longer in existence, for I think great good might result from it under proper regulations. The circumstances of the City of London have materially altered within my recollection. Formerly, some of the leading bankers and merchants of the City were aldermen. I believe the first person who threw up his gown was a friend and acquaintance of mine, Mr. Robert Williams, who was a banker in Birchin Lane. Another banker also gave up his gown, and from that time there seemed to be a sort of slur cast upon the position of alderman; and merchants of consequence in the City were not disposed to undertake the office. Many circumstances have also combined to separate the merchants who carry on trade in the port of London from the corporation. Formerly, many of the merchants resided in the City; there is scarcely one who resides there now. The City of London, I believe, has considerably diminished in population, I mean the population of that description of persons who ought to undertake the important duties of alderman. If the City of London remains in extent of population as formerly, this must arise from the lower class of the population having been crowded into a fewer number of houses; because the number of houses pulled down is very considerable; and many of those houses which were formerly residences have been converted into counting-houses, into public offices, and Manchester and other warehouses. The opportunity of persons engaged in trade residing in the City of London has therefore unquestionably been materially diminished.

1798. At the time to which you refer, did not the corporation, to a considerable extent, represent the principal bankers and merchants of the City?—Referring to my early days, I think that such was the case.

1799. You say that the merchants have ceased to reside in the City?—Yes.

1800. Are you acquainted with the residences of the present aldermen of London; do any of them reside in the City?—I do not think they now reside in the City; and I do not know where the residences of many of the present aldermen are. They have their houses of business in the City, but they do not, I believe, reside there. The temptation to be an alderman is much greater to a person who is keeping a shop, or carrying on a retail business in the City, than it is to a merchant. Our merchants, during the war, chose to leave their counting-houses as soon as possible, and reside at a distance, and they have no longer the attachment to the City which they formerly evinced. The other parties, having their business in the City, take an interest in City proceedings, which, it appears to me, the merchants for some years, and I regret it, have altogether neglected.

W. Cotton, Esq.

1801. Do you consider that the corporation rather represents the retail trade than the superior branches of commerce and banking in the City?—Yes. The aldermen, with few exceptions, I believe, have been concerned in the retail trade, or in business which is not generally undertaken by merchants; and I believe the corporation represents the retail rather than the superior branches of commerce. There is another circumstance to which I beg to call the attention of the Commission, that even with regard to the retail trade the City of London is materially altered in its position. Formerly the great retail shops were in the City; the great retail shops are now more numerous at the west end of the town than in the City of London. Parties used to come from the country and from the west end of the town to purchase articles in the retail shops in the City, who now go into Regent Street and Bond Street, and places of that sort; the consequence is that the retail trade of the City is very materially altered from what it was in my early days.

1802. Are there not still in the City some considerable shops carrying on what may be called a wholesale retail trade; that is to say, retail shops whose operations are very extensive in the way of supplying other shops?—There are several which carry on a large retail and wholesale business; but persons who have these very large concerns on their hands, are not disposed to undertake the ordinary duties of magistrates, or any of the duties which devolve upon the City authorities.

1803. Are the Commissioners to understand that the state of things which you describe, dates from a comparatively recent period, and almost within your recollection?—I think it dates very much within my recollection. I remember Mr. Williams throwing up his gown, and one or two others doing the same; and I also recollect a growing disinclination on the part of the merchants and bankers of the City of London to take any part in the proceedings of the City; and if my memory does not fail me, there were violent attacks, by a party in the House of Commons, made upon the citizens of London, which brought them into ridicule and disrepute.

1804. Are you acquainted with the constitution of the common council?—Yes; I am aware that the election of the common council is in the freemen in the different wards who pay a certain rent. Formerly, the merchants being generally free of the City of London, the class of persons who elected the common council were of a different grade from what they are at present; and in many of the wards, in consequence of improvements in the City, and of the houses being converted into counting-houses and into warehouses, there are fewer electors, and fewer persons who are in such a position as to render them suitable to be elected on the chief council of the City.

1805. Do you believe any change has taken place in the class of persons elected to the common council of late years?—I think a material change. I am not able to give the details, but that is my impression.

1806. That change you would consider to have been rather for the worse than the better?—Yes.

1807. Do you know anything of the manner in which committees of the common council are appointed and discharge their duties?—I do not know the way in which they are appointed, but it has always appeared to me that every committee appointed by the common council has too many members. The common council itself is too numerous for an executive body; and their committees, I believe, consist of forty or fifty members; any business cannot be well conducted when there are so many responsible.

1808. Are not the members of the common council rather suited to a legislative body than an executive one?—Certainly. I consider it a very bad executive body. I have heard from those who have been in the common council frequent complaints of the disorder to which there is necessarily a tendency in all large bodies.

1809. The members of the common council might be suited to a deliberative body for the purposes of legislation, but not to a body of an executive character?—That is my opinion.

1810. Have you ever had any business to transact with the navigation committee of the common council?—I never have had anything to do with them. I know very little about them.

1811. What is your opinion as to the elections in common hall; have you had any experience upon the subject?—I am not a freeman of the City of London, but I have always considered the elections in common hall to be very unsatisfactory. It is always a scene of the greatest confusion; and if the elections are to be in the hands of a large number of persons, it would be very much better done in any other way than by assembling them in common hall. They might give their votes in their own wards and their own districts for that purpose.

1812. The plan laid down by the General Municipal Corporation Act, is that the burgesses elect the town council, and the town council elect the officers. Does that appear to you to be preferable to the plan which is pursued in the City of London?—I think it is; and in the City we have not sufficiently considered the advantages of electing the parties who are afterwards to be the selectors of the proper officers to perform important duties.

1813. If the town council or the common council, whatever may be its name, possesses the confidence of the commonalty at large, does not it seem reasonable that it should be entrusted with the power of selecting the executive officers?—If you were to establish a system by which the common council could have the confidence of the metropolis from being elected by a great number of persons interested in the prosperity of the City of London, it would be very much better to vest the election of the officers alluded to with them rather than with the liverymen.

1814. Are you at all acquainted with the relation of the trade companies to the corporation?—I am to a certain extent acquainted with it. I have known parties engaged in several of the companies. They were established for the purpose of encouraging their own craft; but their position is now completely changed, inasmuch as the larger companies have very few of their own craft among them. The livery are merchants and others engaged in various occupations. It appears to me not desirable that the parties who are made free by those companies should be the parties who are to act as freemen in the election of the Lord Mayor, for those companies which are the least select are the most disposed to add to the number of their freemen; and the companies like the Goldsmiths', the Mercers', Grocers', Drapers', and Merchant Tailors', and other large and important companies are more particular as to the admission of liverymen.

1815. According to your view it would not be desirable that a liveryman as such should have any municipal franchise in the corporation?—My impression is that a better description of party to have authority in the corporation might reasonably be arranged.

1816. Might not the same franchise dependent upon the occupation of a house for a certain time combined with the payment of rates as under the general Act, be taken without reference to the companies?—I think it would be very much better. It would lead to a greater number of persons being interested in the support of the City of London, and you would have on the whole a better description of electors.

1817. At present I understand you to say, that the companies have lost all special reference to the trades whose names they bear?—I would not say all, because I believe the Goldsmiths' Company has reference to the trade whose name it bears, as also the Apothecaries' and Stationers'; but generally the occupations of the members of the companies have no reference to the name they bear. There are the Bowyers', the Cordwainers', and a variety of other companies which I cannot remember, who have nothing to do with the business for the support of which they were originally constituted.

1818. Have you any knowledge of the privilege of the City with respect to porterage and metage?—I have no further knowledge than what I have seen in the public papers.

1819. In your business, you have never had occasion to employ them?—No.

1820. You are rather of opinion that the constitueney of London for the election of the common council and the other municipal officers, should be in householders of a certain class?—I think so, rather than in the livery.

1821. Would you think it at all necessary that those persons should become freemen of the City independently of the companies?—I think there is no object whatever in their becoming freemen of the City of London. Formerly it was considered that everybody carrying on business in the City must be free of it.

1822. Then they passed through the companies. Now the corporation of London admit to the freedom of London without reference to the fact of the parties belonging to any company; is there any object in that?—None whatever, as the City cannot compel all parties carrying on trade to take up their freedom. In common with others, I had a notice to take up my freedom; but I imagine that it is out of the power of the City to compel me.

1823. Has the City made any attempt to compel you to take up your freedom?—They have never taken any proceedings that I am aware of to enforce the notice.

1824. You are of course aware that the corporation possesses a large income independently of rates or taxes of any kind levied upon the public?—Yes.

1825. Do you think they have employed that income in the manner most conducive to the interests of the commonalty which they represent?—My impression is, that the City of London have employed their money honestly; that they have acted with perfect honesty; but I do not think they have employed their money in the best possible way. My wish would have been to see them employing a large portion of their money in the improvement of the social condition of the inhabitants of the City over which they preside; and from what I know of the wretched state of some parts of the City, I do not consider that they have done so. The corporation of Liverpool have devoted very large sums of money towards promoting an object, which, I believe, tends greatly to the comfort and health of the inhabitants, namely, the establishment of baths and wash-houses. They have devoted a large portion of their income towards the establishment of model lodging-houses and sailors' homes, and other improvements; but the corporation of London have only voted small sums of money upon application for such objects.

1826. Do you consider that the corporation of the City of London have in general stood forward as the promoters of purposes of general utility?—I do not think they have; certainly not in the degree in which I think from their position they ought to have done

W. Cotton, Esq.
18th Nov. 1853.

The corporation of the City of London should have put a stop to many things which interfere generally with the commerce of London. I allude to porterage and a variety of matters of that sort, which are no benefit to the general trade of London, though they may be advantageous to individuals. I think also they would have done better if they had taken a more prominent lead in promoting those social improvements which are so desirable in this great City.

1827. What great objects do you think they generally have had in view?—A great exertion has been made of late years towards the improvement of the thoroughfares of London.

1828. Is not that an object of general utility to the metroplis?—I have mentioned that as an object of general utility, and some of the members of the corporation have taken a very active part in its promotion. At the same time I think they might have proceeded even more rapidly in that direction than they have done, for it is only of late years that any very great improvements have taken place.

1829. Have they shown a disposition to identify themselves with the general interests of the metropolis, or do they look only to the separate interests which they may possess as a corporation, whose territory comprises only a small portion of the town?—They appear to have considered it their duty to attend more to their own portion of the town than to the general interests of the metropolis, and it is natural that it should have been the case.

1830. You think the funds which they possess ought properly to be employed in local improvements within the City?—The property which they possess, and which was left to them for that purpose, the City has a prior claim to; but there are other sources of income which the whole of the commercial world have a fair right to expect they should devote to the general improvement of the metropolis.

1831. At one time the present City of London was nearly the entire metropolis, was it not?—At one time it was nearly the entire metropolis. The greater part of the business was carried on there. It is now only a very small portion of the metropolis.

1832. Since the time when many of their endowments were acquired, the character of the City has been entirely changed, has not it?—It has.

1833. So that endowments which might have been originally intended for the benefit of the entire City, have now become appropriated to a very small portion of the metropolis?—Yes; for the metropolis has outgrown the City.

1834. Have you ever considered whether it would be possible to devise any plan of municipal government for the whole of the metropolis?—I think a plan might be devised for the municipal government of all parts of the metropolis. If a certain number whom I would denominate the common hall, or the electors, were to be elected by a large portion of the metropolis, they, the common hall, might elect a small number for the executive council, and also elect the different officers connected with the City. But to bring any large number of persons into the common hall, or into the general constituency of London, without a good arrangement as to the mode in which their votes are to be taken, would be a very serious inconvenience.

1835. Is there not now a great practical difficulty with respect to the funds for defraying the expense of any public work which is a metropolitan object; for instance, in the case of a bridge over the Thames, or a new park, you must go either to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a vote of money, or you must ask the City for a grant from their funds: do you think it would be possible to provide some intermediate fund from which a supply would be obtained?—I think it would. The whole of the metropolis ought fairly to be called upon to contribute towards those improvements from which the metropolis generally would benefit. At present there is no means of accomplishing that object.

1836. At present there is no mode of imposing a tax which shall be co-extensive with the entire metropolis, but which shall be limited to the metropolis?—There is no means whatever.

1837. If you ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a grant, he will answer, "If I "build bridges in London I must build bridges in Edinburgh, and Dublin, and in other "parts of the kingdom," will he not?—He will; and I had frequently that observation made to me by Chancellors of the Exchequer, when I have wanted certain improvements made in the City of London, which I thought would tend to improve the social condition of the inhabitants in the poorer districts.

1838. In London you have the most wealthy community in the world, and yet the present state of things supplies no machinery by which a tax can be imposed upon it?—I have always regretted that those who occupy the metropolis, and who are possessed of great wealth, cannot be called on at present to do that which would be of essential benefit to the health and to the social comfort of the great mass of the population.

1839. Do you think it would be possible to arrive at that end by some municipal institution?—I think it would; it would require very great consideration, which I do not feel myself competent to give; but I think that such an object can be accomplished.

1840. Have you ever turned your attention to the question of a chamber of commerce?—I have had my attention directed to it, but I am very far from thinking it desirable in the City of London. I do not apprehend any good whatever there could result from a chamber of commerce. We should have a great deal of talk, but little good resulting from it. The merchants of the City of London have such free access to the Board of Trade and to the other authorities of the Government, that no good result would attend a chamber of commerce in London, and I believe that such is the general opinion of the principal merchants of the City.

W. Cotton, Esq.
18th Nov. 1853.

1841. Is not the variety of branches of trade which have their head-quarters in London very great?—Very great.

1842. Is not each branch of trade in many cases extremely important, taken by itself?—No doubt of it.

1843. Under those circumstances do you think it likely that a certain small body, representing all the branches of trade, could be satisfactorily formed in London?—I do not think it could. I think the members of the chamber might be chosen by the majority, but they would not give satisfaction to a very large minority.

1844. Separate branches of trade now have associations of their own, have they not?—Yes; by means of which they hold communication one with another; and they have meetings when anything is proposed which they think likely to conduce to the common welfare.

1845. Among the shipping interest is there not an association?—Yes; there was one, of which Mr. George Frederick Young was chairman.

1846. Does that body now exist?—I have not heard anything of it lately, and I very much doubt if it does.

1847. In the case of any public measure affecting the shipping interest as a whole, probably an association would be formed for the time, which would communicate with the members of the trade?—I think it would be much better that an association should be formed for the time than that there should be a permanent association. I have always found that permanent associations after a little time carry out their own views, and do not give general satisfaction to the trade by which they were originally established.

1848. Is there any other subject which you wish to mention to the Commission?—I am not aware of any; I do not profess to have a very deep knowledge of the City and its proceedings. My observations have been made with reference to the general arrangement of the constitution. I would only add, that having observed the conduct of the aldermen and common council, I think they have acted very honestly, but the objections which I have to them rather depend upon the constitution of the corporation than upon the proceedings of the individual members of it.

A. Pulling, Esq.

ALEXANDER PULLING, Esq., was further examined as follows.

1849. Are there any peculiar jurisdictions in the City of London?—There are very peculiar jurisdictions in the City of London, both civil and criminal. Under the ancient custom of the City of London there exist peculiar laws, exempting, as I humbly conceive, the citizens of London from the jurisdiction of the Queen's ordinary courts. There are also powers which the citizens enjoy of choosing their own magistrates and judges. They have also, under a very ancient law which I shall venture to assert is still in existence, a peculiar mode of trial. The City magistrates and authorities have also, fourthly, a very peculiar power of trying persons without the ordinary forms prescribed to secure the liberty of the subject in the rest of the kingdom. Those are all City customs and City laws, confirmed as all the other City customs and City laws are by Act of Parliament, and therefore I conceive that they still exist as laws unrepealed. I will call the attention of the Commissioners to certain charters which confer those rights upon the citizens of London. The first is the charter of Henry I. By the charter of Henry I. the citizens of London have the power "To place whomsoever or such one as they will for themselves " for the keeping of the pleas of the Crown, and of the pleading of the same, and none other " shall be justices over the same men of London." This charter is repeated on two or three occasions subsequently, and there are upwards of twenty-two charters granted to the City of London, all of which are confirmed by Act of Parliament. With respect to this privilege, first of all, of the citizens pleading within the walls, it is a privilege which the citizens enjoy both with regard to civil and criminal business. With respect to civil business, we know that certain questions have arisen whether it should extend to transitory actions, and difficulties have suggested themselves; and if this plea in abatement were now put forward, that the defendant is a citizen, great difficulties would arise. It has very rarely occurred that this question has been raised of late years, but it may be raised. It is a law which admits at least of doubt, being a right confirmed expressly by Act of Parliament with regard to civil business. Under the words of the charter it also extends to criminal business; and therefore, if a person who was a freeman of London should happen to commit a felony in York, it might be a question whether he would not have the right to be tried in London, because the citizens of London are not to plead "Without the walls " of the City for any plea."

1850. If such a case were to occur, it would excite so much attention that probably there would be an end put to the right claimed at once?—Probably that would be the case.

1851. Do you refer to the plea in any proceeding by the Crown?—I am not aware of any such a plea in a prosecution by the Crown. There are instances of such pleas in civil actions. In Mr. Tidd's Book of Practice there are a great many cases collected with respect to civil pleading. The same charter of Henry I., so confirmed as I have already mentioned, enables them to place "whomsoever or such a one as they will for themselves "for keeping of the pleas of the Crown." It is in consequence of this that the Lord Mayor is chief justice in the commission of the gaol delivery at the Old Bailey. This gives the citizens the power of appointing their own judge; and therefore, if the Queen's commission should not be issued, I conceive the citizens would have a power to appoint a judge themselves; at all events the charter gives them that power; whether there would be any practical machinery for carrying it into effect may remain doubtful. There are other charters which provide that "All inquisitions from thence to be taken by our justices "or ministers of the said City, shall be taken in St. Martin's le Grand, in London, and not "elsewhere." That is by the charter of Edward III. in Parliament. The charter excepts the gaol delivery at Newgate. Now the gaol delivery at Newgate is merely for the delivery of persons actually in custody; therefore the question would arise upon criminal cases which were presented by the grand jury, where the parties were not in gaol, and were not delivered according to the commission of gaol delivery, whether that trial was right, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament provides, that all inquisitions to be taken of the men of the City should be taken at St. Martin's le Grand, and here would be a trial taking place at the Old Bailey contrary to the charter. That is an Act of Parliament which is not repealed; it is the same Act which gave the City the monopoly of the markets. It came before the House of Lords in the Smithfield Market case, who declared this to be an Act of Parliament. This Act provides that all inquisitions shall be taken by the justices or ministers of the King at St. Martin's le Grand. Therefore, in all cases not coming within the commission of gaol delivery, the question might arise whether they were properly tried. The place was altered by the charter of Henry VIII., not in Parliament, from St. Martin's le Grand to Guildhall. The charter provided that all inquisitions, by the justices and ministers of the Crown, should be thenceforth taken at Guildhall instead of at St. Martin's le Grand; that is not a charter in Parliament, and the question is, whether they should not still be taken at St. Martin's le Grand. The same charter also provides that the citizens should not serve on inquests out of the City. That appears to give them a general exemption from serving on juries out of the City of London. Questions might arise whether every citizen of London, wherever he resides, would not be exempt. Such is the power which magistrates and judges have within the City of London, based on the right which the citizens have, to plead only within the City walls, and to elect their own magistrates. But there is a peculiar mode of trial, which is stated to be an ancient custom of the City of London. I have heard no mention of it, and seen no record of it for a long time, but I find it still to be an ancient custom of London, and it may possibly be recorded by the recorder of London, one of these days, as an ancient custom. The custom is thus stated: "According to the "ancient customs and liberties of the City, there were three purgations in the pleas of the "Crown, whereby such as were called in might acquit themselves; the first was, de morte, "of death or murder; the second, de maihemia, of maiming; the third purgation was, "de insultis, baculis tostis, vulnerationibus, &c., of assaults, battery with staves, burnings, "woundings, and such like injuries done in the time of the Lord's Nativity, or in Easter "or Witsun weeks. By the great law, the appealed and accused made six oaths in his "own person, that he was innocent of felony and breaking the King's peace, and of the "whole crime laid upon him, and so let God help him, and those holy things; after that, "six men were to swear that the other swore a sound and safe oath, according to their "consciences and understandings, and God help them, &c.; and this order was to be "continued to the number of thirty-six men complete: so that, first, the accused swore, "and then after him, the six, until the numbers above noted were full. He that was "accused of maiming took three oaths in his own person, that he was free and innocent "of felony or breaking the King's peace; and then six men swore that he made a just "and true oath, according to their consciences and understandings. And this order was "continued to the number of eighteen. He that was accused of assault, battery, burning, "wounding, blows, bloodshedding, and other injuries, done at the holy times before "mentioned, made an oath in his own person as before; after him, six men swore as "before, who were chosen out of the neighbourhood where he dwelt." At the time that this prevailed, the trial by ordeal prevailed throughout the rest of the kingdom, and there was only one exemption, as the judges of Westminster Hall were in the habit of believing, and that was in favour of the clergy,—a peculiar mode of purgation being incorporated into the privileges of the clergy called the benefit of clergy. At the time when the trial by ordeal prevailed, the citizens of London being, as Sir William Blackstone says, a peaceable set of men, who claimed to be exempted from the trial by battle, and from the ordinary ordeal of fire and water, it was a great advantage to them to have this privilege.

A. Pulling, Esq.

18th Nov. 1853.

1852. The citizens of London were always exempted from the trial by battle?—Yes; it was a great advantage to them. The charter of Henry I. provides that "If any of the "citizens shall be impleaded concerning the pleas of the Crown, the man of London shall "discharge himself by his oath, which shall be adjudged within the City." That charter is in the reign of Henry I., alluding to this very custom, a custom to be found in the City books, and which can be authenticated by the City records. Now it would appear that after this charter of Henry I. the Crown did not always observe it, for there is a record mentioned in Hoveden, of a citizen of London who had failed in the water ordeal, and he was barged in the time of Henry II. That is set forth in Wilkins's Leges Saxonicæ. Then comes the charter of Henry II. to the citizens of London confirming their ancient right. The charter of Henry II. provides that the citizens of London shall discharge themselves of the pleas of the Crown, according to the old usage of the City of London. That charter of Henry II. is confirmed and incorporated in the charters of Richard I., of John, and Henry III.; and in the 8th charter of Henry III., at the very end of his reign, Henry III. in his charter provides "That none of the said citizens may wage "battle, and that for the pleas belonging to the Crown, chiefly those which may chance "within the said City and suburbs thereof, they may discharge themselves, according to "the ancient custom of the said City. This, notwithstanding, except that upon the "graves of the dead, for that which they should have said if they had lived, it shall not "be lawful precisely to swear. But instead and place of those deceased which before "their deaths to discharge those which for concerning the things belonging to the Crown "were called and received, there may other free and lawful men be chosen which may "do and accomplish that without delay, which by the deceased should have been done "if he had lived." That was the charter granted in the fifty-second year of the reign of Henry III. after the trial by ordeal by fire and water had been generally abolished in the rest of the kingdom. The purgation of the clergy, which very nearly resembles this, is mentioned by civilians as part of the common law. That was not abolished till the time of Elizabeth,—the eighth of Elizabeth, chapter four; but there is no mention in the Act or ordinance of Henry III. with regard to trial by ordeal about this custom of London. It may be a question whether this trial by purgation is not still in force in the City of London, and some criminal may some day claim to put it in force.

1853. Was not the law by purgation the law of the whole country in former times?—No; wager of law in civil cases generally prevailed, but not in criminal. In ancient times the general law throughout the whole of the country recognized in criminal cases the trial by ordeal, the trial by fire and water, and the wager of battle. Having referred to the subject of trial by wager of law which prevailed throughout the whole of the country in civil cases, I may mention that it was generally abolished by the third and fourth William IV., chapter 42, London not being there mentioned. I once had had the honour of urging before the Court of Queen's Bench that the City of London having a peculiar custom of wager of law, it may happen that that is still in force, and that the reform made in the law has not taken effect in the City of London. Then another peculiar jurisdiction which prevails in the City of London in criminal cases, is the power to try without any indictment. This is a right which very few lawyers have paid much attention to in modern times, the old right of infang thieft. It is mentioned in Bracton, and in the old authorities. It was a right to try a robber taken within the franchise, and was an old Saxon regulation; it was a seignorial right to try a robber taken within the franchise if he were taken in the mainour. There is an express grant of this right to the citizens of London by that same charter in Parliament which I have already alluded to, the charter of Edward III. The citizens of London have an express grant of infang thieft and outfang thieft. The mode of trial in infang thieft described in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown appears to have been this: "If the thief or robber had, on fresh pursuit, been taken in the "mainour, or the goods found on him brought into Court with him, he might be tried "immediately without any indictment." This being a peculiar mode of trial specifically pointed out by a charter in Parliament, which the judges at Westminster have declared to be an Act of Parliament, the question is open whether this mode of trial, never having been abolished, is not still in force in the City of London.

1854. Do you mean a person taken under the circumstances you have described would be arraigned at once, without a bill having been found by the grand jury, or any committal by a magistrate?—He might be tried by the City magistrate without a jury. As Sir John Patteson knows, this mode of trial of infang thieft was expressly abolished in Edward III.'s time. The 28th of Edward III., chapter 3, and the 42d of Edward III., chapter 3, are both mentioned in Sir Matthew Hale's Pleas of the Crown. I have looked at those Acts, and they provide that no persons should be punished without being brought to trial in due process of the law. Those are the peculiar privileges with regard to jurisdiction which prevail within the City of London. The rights of the citizens to plead within the walls, and not to plead elsewhere; only to serve on juries within the walls, and not elsewhere; to appoint their own magistrates, and to be tried by their own magistrates; to purge themselves of criminal charges in a peculiar way, on oath; and the franchise of infang thieft, or right to try prisoners without the usual formalities.

1855. The corporation of London, as a corporation, of course would not trouble themselves about such matters, if they were to arise?—Probably not; but they are laws prevailing within the City, as part of the custom of London, and they remain in force, not having been repealed

1856. They are customs affecting the City of London, but not rights or privileges of the corporation?—They are rights and privileges of the citizens; at least many of them are. Infang thieft is a grant to the citizens of London. There are, I find, within the City of London, Courts both civil and criminal of a very peculiar jurisdiction. There are all the Wardmote Courts, which are rarely noticed at the present time; there are Courts Leet, with all the ancient jurisdiction of a Leet. The Court at one time, as is well known, was a criminal Court of extensive jurisdiction. Whether the jurisdiction may be ever resuscitated in the City of London, whose privileges and customs are confirmed by statute, remains a question. At present the Court Leet simply consists of some gentlemen dressed up in fur, who go about collecting money at Christmas. There are twenty-five of these Courts in the City of London. Then there is the Central Criminal Court; that valuable Court to which jurisdiction is given, not only within the City, but over the whole of the metropolis. But then, conflicting with the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, there is the London sessions within the City, and also a great number of sessions throughout the metropolis.

A. Pulling, Esq.

18th Nov. 1853.

1857. Do you know whether any amount of business is transacted at the London sessions?—Practically, I believe there are very few cases tried at the London sessions except assault and petty cases of that sort; but civil business is transacted. Appeals against rates, convictions, and orders of removal.

1858. When are those sessions held?—They are held I think eight times a year.

1859. Is the recorder of the City a judge of the Court?—The Lord Mayor and aldermen are the justices; the recorder also being a justice, and acting as the assessor of the Court.

1860. Is the common serjeant a judge in that Court?—He is not. The common serjeant rarely comes there.

1861. What is the reason there is so little criminal business in that Court?—The Central Criminal Court Act took away the jurisdiction from the Middlesex sessions, and from all the metropolitan sessions, except in some very petty cases. The section taking away the jurisdiction was repealed two years ago, and the Middlesex sessions then revived, and they now try a very large number of cases. The same is the case with the sessions held at Westminster. Within the City there are also police courts, of which the Commissioners have heard a good deal, presided over by the aldermen of London; there are also the petty sessions and the wardmotes. Then there is the Lord Mayor's Court of Conservancy, which is a penal court relating to the Thames. I am not aware of any great tyrannical exercise of power on the part of the Lord Mayor as conservator of the Thames. The corporation go up in barges, but I do not know that any great power is exercised. The Lord Mayor also is escheator, and then there is the Coroner's Court.

1862. The City of London being a county in itself, it has a separate coroner?—It has a separate coroner, who is coroner also of Southwark. The Lord Mayor is the coroner; the gentleman who officiates is only the deputy coroner.

1863. How is the deputy coroner appointed?—He is appointed by the Court of Aldermen; he is the gentleman who is now the steward of the Southwark Court There is also a custom upon this subject, which creates a sort of distinct court in the Lord Mayor personally, acting neither as a justice nor as a judge, but as a sort of arbitrator of differences. "The Lord Mayor for the time being may cause any person inhabiting within "London or the liberties, to be summoned to appear before him upon the complaint of "any citizen, and for non-appearance may grant his warrant to bring such person before "him, and then (which is more than other justices of the peace can do) he hath "power to hear and determine the differences arising between them." That is an ancient custom of London which is set forth in Strype's Stow, where the records are very accurately copied; the Lord Mayor may ex mero motu summon any person inhabiting London and the liberties to appear before him on the complaint of any citizen, and upon non-appearance may grant his warrant to bring such person before him, and he may determine the differences arising between the parties.

1864. Is that power ever exercised?—There is no doubt that the gentlemen who sit both at the Mansion House and at the Guildhall are in the habit of entertaining questions which the police magistrates would not entertain. For instance, any complaints which are made at the Mansion House would be listened to, and it is very possible with the best feelings in the world that the Lord Mayor may send for the tradesman who is charged, and bring him before him. That power is practically exercised; it is done for the best motives, but it is a power which is not usually exercised by other magistrates.

1865. It seems to describe a court of arbitration?—It does. Then the civil courts having jurisdiction in the City of London I find are very numerous. The first court, I find, is the Court of Hustings. There is the Mayor's Court, which is a double-branched court, a court of law and a court of equity. Then there are the Courts of the Sheriffs', the Courts of the Sheriffs' Compters, as they are called, being two courts by the custom of London, but one court practically by the will of the common council. Then there is the Small Debts Court, which is an emanation from the Sheriffs Court created by Act of Parliament to assimilate it to the County Courts elsewhere. There is the Appeal Court of St. Martin's-le-Grand, where the justices of Westminster usually preside under a commission. It is a Court of Appeal from the Court of Hustings or from the Mayor's Court.

1866. That Court very seldom sits, does it?—Very seldom. The leading case is Green and Cole, in 2d Saunders. It has not been convened for many years, I think. There was a case about the livery, which occurred some time ago, and it became likely that the Court would be convened in the case of Brown and Sturt, which came before the Court of Queen's Bench. Then there is the Court of Orphans, and an ancient court called the Court of Policies of Assurance. There are two ancient courts of Piepondre, courts specifically granted in London and in Southwark.

1867. In the Lord Mayor's Court, and the Sheriffs' Court, in civil cases, was the trial as in other courts, by a jury?—Always by a jury, excepting the court of equity of the Mayor's Court. Then there is the Court of Record, in Southwark, and the Chamberlain of Apprentices' Court; that is the last of the courts. The Lord Mayor, however, is admiral of the port of London; and it may be a question whether he has not an Admiralty Court also. The Court of Hustings has, by ancient custom, an extensive jurisdiction: it is the highest court in London. It is mentioned in the charter of Henry I., and the oldest charters. It has original jurisdiction in real actions which have been abolished elsewhere, but which may yet be supposed to continue in the City of London, never having been expressly abolished there. They are ancient customary actions, mentioned in Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, and in the books of the City of London. There are a great number of real actions by the custom of London. This Court of Hustings has also, besides its original jurisdiction in real and mixed actions, and such actions as gavelet for rent, a power of enrolling wills, conflicting with the jurisdiction of Doctors' Commons. There is a peculiar custom in London with regard to wills. A citizen of London might make a parol will, unattested, without any of the formalities which usually accompany wills, and which are now required by Act of Parliament to accompany wills, and by enrolling it in the Court of Hustings it becomes a good will. That custom is also confirmed by the charters and statutes to which I have already referred. There is a charter of Edward IV., which declares that the citizens of London should make their wills as heretofore. According to the custom, that enrolment of a will was held to prevail against an act of Henry VIII., as to enrolments. They have also the power of enrolling deeds. A document conveying land, enrolled in full hustings, would have the effect of passing a fee. If an acknowledgment were made within the hustings by parol, and that acknowledgment were attested by witnesses, and the attestation enrolled in the hustings, it would become a good conveyance of land. It is usually set forth in the collection of the customs of London, as a good custom of London to convey goods by parol. It possibly may yet have to be decided by the judges at Westminster, unless the Legislature interfere, whether this power of enrolling wills, and this custom as to deeds, will prevail against the Statute of Frauds, and against the late Wills Act, which contain no express repeal of the customs of London. The same may be said with regard to this custom of passing lands by parol. It remains an open question whether the custom of London is to prevail. Then there is also a peculiar custom as to distress and replevin. There is a peculiar custom with respect to a tenant under 40*s.* having certain notice; and a peculiar custom as to distress and replevin, different from that which prevails in the rest of the country. There was a return of probates of wills in the hustings, made to the House of Commons on the 31st of July, 1843, which contains a long list of wills in London, which go back to the time of the 43d of Henry III., and in the time of William and Mary.

1868. Are there no wills of a later date than William and Mary?—No; it appears from the return of the town clerk that no wills are to be found later than William and Mary. There was no act in William and Mary's time which altered the law of wills. There is an enrolment of deeds also; how far they extend I do not know, but they go back for a very considerable time. There is an enrolment of deeds as far back as Henry I. At all events, it is mentioned in the book of the abbot of Ramsey, quoted in Coke's 4th Institute.

1869. However ancient the enrolment of wills in the City of London may be, it seems to have been disused for a considerable number of years?—Yes; but the Commissioners must always remember that the customs of London, usi vel abusi, will prevail; therefore they may be raked up by any one who wishes to set up a fraudulent title. For instance, a man getting a will or deed enrolled in the hustings, might years afterwards use that as evidence of title, and raise a question whether a gentleman's title to his land was good. The next court is the Mayor's Court. This Court has a general unlimited jurisdiction in civil cases, in personal actions, but not in real actions. It also has, under the custom of London, particular powers with respect to distribution. It has a very peculiar mode of proceeding by concessit solvere. It is laid down in the customs of London as a mode of proceeding upon covenant without deed under seal, that an action might be brought without showing a consideration. The question would arise whether that was good against the Statute of Frauds; whether, upon a man simply saying, "I undertake to pay," without showing for what, such a covenant would be good under this concessit solvere. I believe in the Court in Bristol, where this custom of concessit solvere was raised, it was held not to be good; but it does not follow that it is not good in London, where the customs are confirmed by Act of Parliament. Then there is a peculiar mode of proceeding as to femmes covert: a married woman may sue and be sued as a femme sole. A married woman trading in London, who might have an idle husband, or a bankrupt husband, or a man of bad character, might be put forward as the real trader, and thus sue and be sued, and thus protect him in fraudulent practices. Sometimes it is productive of good, but it may be productive of great harm. Then there is a peculiar custom in the distribution of intestate's estates: the old right with respect to distribution was given at a time when the law of testacy and intestacy was very different to what it is now. That this custom prevails we have the best proof, for a question was sent by the master of the rolls to the recorder within the last two months, to certify the custom of London as to distribution.

A. Pulling, Esq.

1870. Is not the custom of London expressly saved in the statute of distribution?—It is expressly saved. This custom of distribution gives a wife a greater share than she would get elsewhere; she has half or a third by the custom, and then when the other half or two thirds comes to be distributed under the statute of distributions, she comes in for her share under that statute. This custom of distribution prevails in all cases where the party is a freeman of London, though only an honorary freeman, even though his family might not be aware that he had ever been a freeman, and he lived a great many miles away. A peculiar case on this custom was the case of Serjeant Onslow: he had married the widow of Sir Francis Drake, who was made an honorary freeman of London and of the Grocers' Company, on the occasion of Lord Rodney's victory. Sir Francis Drake had all the honours of the freedom of London conferred upon him. I suppose, when he made his settlement, and when he was on his deathbed, he did not think of the accident of his being a freeman of London. He died in 1789. His widow married Serjeant Onslow, and the serjeant looked into the law; and in 1826 he raised the question, and it was brought before the master of the rolls. The case is reported in 1st Simons, and the serjeant as representing Lady Drake, his then wife, claimed to be entitled to a greater share, in consequence of his wife being the widow of a freeman of London. That case is Onslow v. Onslow, in 1st Simons' Reports.

1871. Was there any decision upon it?—The ground of the decision was that the custom applied to honorary freemen; the custom itself is indisputable; the only question was with respect to its applying to honorary freemen. There are two courts of the Sheriffs' Compter. The two sheriffs of London have attached to them what is called a Compter. The Compter is a court to which a prison is attached, but it is a distinct court; and Lord Coke, who is so accurate upon all subjects relating to London, he having been recorder of London, speaks of those two sheriffs' courts of London as being two distinct courts of record, which had existed from time immemorial. There were formerly two under sheriffs, or judges, of the Sheriffs' Courts, one attached to each court; they were distinct officers, and the courts were as distinct courts as the Court of Queen's Bench is distinct from the Court of Exchequer. But the Court of Common Council of late years, without passing an act of common council, or obtaining an Act of Parliament, resolved that they would not fill up the vacancy of one of those judges. The consequence was, that a judge was appointed who has gone by the name of the judge of the Sheriffs' Court. Mr. Bullock had the appointment before he was common serjeant, Mr. Serjeant Arabin being the judge before him; now my friend Mr. Russell Gurney, who is a most efficient judge, has the appointment. He was appointed long after the event had occurred of there being only one judge instead of two. There are two distinct courts, but the Court of Common Council have resolved that they would not appoint a judge to one, so that they call the judge who is appointed the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, in the singular number. Assuming that there was one judge of the Sheriffs' Court when Lord Coke told them there were two judges of the Sheriffs' Compters, and that the one judge who was appointed only represented one side of the court, the corporation obtained a private Act of Parliament, entitled the City Small Debts Act, which was obtained considerably after the County Courts was obtained, applying to the rest of the country. They recited that there was an ancient court called the Sheriffs' Court. That is a false recital. There is the Court of Giltspur Street Compter, and the Court of the Poultry Compter, but there is no court called the Sheriffs' Court.

1872. What is the title of that Act?—The City Small Debts Act is the 10th and 11th of Victoria, chapter 71, local and personal, and the 11th and 12th of Victoria, chapter 153. The two Sheriffs' Courts have also, like the Lord Mayor's Court, a jurisdiction in personal action. They have a very extensive jurisdiction, and they have some peculiar process of attachment, sequestration, and arrest. I will say one word, with the permission of the Commissioners, upon this peculiar process of attachment and arrest. The attachment is almost peculiar to the City of London. It prevails in Exeter and in Bristol, and some other places, but it is almost peculiar to the City of London. The custom extends only to debts arising within the City. By this custom a creditor can seize goods within the City belonging to his debtor. This is continually resorted to in the case even of west end bankers. The banker coming in east of Temple Bar may be met by an officer of the Sheriffs' Court and served with an attachment, which will have the effect of attaching money out of the City, because the debt follows the person of the debtor. I would say a word upon the law of arrest. There prevails both in the old Sheriffs' Court and the Mayor's Court, by the custom of London, a particular mode of arrest. That custom is laid down by Lord Coke, and it is found in all collections of the customs of London. It is a power to arrest debtors fugitive; a power to arrest before a debt becomes due. It is a particular customary mode of arrest, which has been certified by an ancient recorder of London in the time of Henry IV. There is a certificate of the recorder of London as to this peculiar mode of arresting debtors fugitive. The Imprisonment for Debt Act assumes to deal with the whole power of imprisonment for debt upon mesne process; that is, the power of arresting the debtor before the debt has been declared to be due by the judgment of some court; but a question will arise whether this custom of London is repealed, and whether there is not still a power which may be exercised of arresting the party before the debt is declared to be due, and arresting him contrary to the express provisions of the 1st and 2d of Victoria, chapter 110. There is also an observation that I would make with regard to the practice of the Mayor's Court, that there have from ancient times been attached to the Court particular practitioners. There were four gentlemen who were common pleaders of London, and there were four attorneys. In ancient times there were six. Sir John Patteson knows that the question about the attorneys was raised in the Court of Queen's Bench some time ago, in which I had the honour of being engaged, and the question of the pleaders was also raised. I had the honour of being engaged in that also. In both cases difficulties have arisen, and those difficulties are even yet not decided. To regulate the profession of an attorney, a public general Act was passed so far back as 1843, the 6th and 7th of Victoria, chapter 73. That Act gave a right to all attorneys of the superior Courts to be admitted in the inferior Courts. Throughout the whole land, in every Court in the kingdom, this law was obeyed, except in the City of London, where the law was disobeyed, and the custom of having only four attorneys and having only four pleaders prevailed; whereas even the ancient Common Pleas was opened to all the bar, against the exclusive monopoly of the serjeants.

1873. When you say the law was disobeyed, do you mean anything more than that it was held that the custom of London not having been expressly repealed, prevailed against the general Act?—It was doubted. The question was raised by Mr. Ashurst three years afterwards, I think about the monopoly in the Mayor's Court being repealed by the Attorneys' Act of 1843. He raised that question in the year 1846. The question came before the Court of Queen's Bench, and the Court held that the public Act did repeal the local custom of London. The case went afterwards to the Exchequer Chamber, and there the judges doubted upon it. At all events no decision was come to upon that point, there having been a bye point upon the pleadings, the form of the mandamus.

1874. Is it the fact that in the Court to which you refer the practice is still exclusive?—Certainly not. In 1843 the public general law was altered. In 1846 a suggestion was made that the public general law did not apply to the City of London. Great expense and great litigation arose, and ultimately, when the Court of Queen's Bench had decided that the City of London ought to give way, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber did not upset that judgment, but decided that particular case upon a bye point, then the Court of Common Council considered the question. The Act was passed in 1843, and in 1852 I believe the corporation came to a resolution that the Court should be thrown open to all attorneys and to all barristers. I believe that was the resolution, but the question has arisen whether that resolution of the corporation is good, and I believe an action is still pending at this moment, whether the attorneys of the Mayor's Court have not still a monopoly.

1875. In what Court is that action pending?—In the Court of Queen's Bench.

1876. Was it an ordinance of the common council?—It was an act of the Court of Aldermen, they being the judges of the court.

1877. Were those offices of the attorneys of the courts in question and of the pleaders, formerly bought and sold?—They were formerly, but the corporation were anxious to do away with that practice, and they commenced a system of election; and I do not think any one of the attorneys holds his office by purchase now. The attorneys have been treated with, but an arrangement has not been come to with them, and there are legal proceedings pending. In the case of the pleaders the corporation took the same course that they did with regard to the judges of the Sheriffs' Court, and simply refused to appoint any more. When the last vacancy occurred, they did not appoint any one to the office, so that there was a custom of giving a monopoly to four, and there were only three to discharge the duties. The next court is the one which has been framed by the Act of Parliament I have referred to, the Small Debts Court. That court emanates from the Sheriffs' Courts, but it assumes incorrectly the existence of a court called the Sheriffs' Court of London; there being no such court that I can discover. Then it confers jurisdiction on the judge of the Sheriffs' Court. The 9th and 10th Victoria, chapter 95, is the County Courts Act with regard to the rest of the country. The corporation of the City opposed that Act, as they oppose, on principle, Acts generally which may be supposed to affect their franchise and their rights, and a clause was inserted that no court should be established under that Act within the City of London. The consequence was, that in the next session a bill was brought in by the City remembrancer, and it passed into a law under the 10th and 11th of Victoria, chapter 71, to establish a Court for the City of London. In that same session an Act of Parliament was obtained to alter the County Courts Act; but inasmuch as the superintendence of the City bill was a business quite distinct from the public general bill which affected the rest of the country, there were clauses introduced into the City bill which did not exist in the general bill. It was necessary to alter it again, and so the City came to Parliament again, and obtained the 11th and 12th Victoria, chapter 152; and ultimately they obtained the Act of the session before last, the 15th Victoria, chapter 77, local and personal, which now regulates the Sheriffs' Court. The Small Debts Bill of the City of London was brought in at the time when the public general bill was under discussion; and the question was raised, as to what the new jurisdiction should be, and how far the penalty for suing elsewhere should extend. By some inadvertence, the clauses in the City bill entirely conflicted with the clauses in the general bill. The City bill contained provisions, that any person suing for 50*l.* and recovering less than 50*l.* in the superior courts, should be deprived of his costs; and it adopted, introducing the word 50*l.* instead of 20*l.*, the very words in the 9th and 10th Victoria, chapter 95, the original County Court Act, but substituting 50*l.* for 20*l.* The amended Act, relating to County Courts generally, contained a clause, that any one suing for 20*l.* in the superior courts should recover no costs. That section was worded differently from the section in 9th and 10th Victoria; and the remembrancer, anxious to do full justice to the City of London, took the clause of the County Courts Act as it originally stood, and put 50*l.* instead of 20*l.*; and he took the amended clause in amending the County Courts Act, and left it 20*l.* Of course litigation arose. I had the honour of being engaged in a case upon that point arising from the conflict of the two Acts of Parliament, in which it was a question whether, a creditor who sued in the superior courts for 50*l.* a person, who at any time during six months should have dwelt and carried on business within the City, was subject to the penalty of costs for so doing. The judges of the Court of Common Pleas, after considering the conflicting clauses, decided that the Legislature had, in express words, declared that it was compulsory to sue in the City Court in Cases under 50*l.*, though it was not compulsory in the rest of the kingdom, and that the poor plaintiff must take the consequences, and must be deprived of his costs.

1878. There is no County Court in London, is there?—There is no County Court. The Small Debts Court is engrafted upon the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs' Court.

1879. The state of the law is this, that the City of London is exempted from the general County Courts Act, and it has a Small Debts Court under a local Act?—Yes. The only inconvenience is, that there are clauses in the City Court Act which conflict with the clauses in the general Act, producing an exception to the general law of the land. There is another court, the Court of Appeal in St. Martin's-le-Grand.

1880. That is not a permanent court; that is a court pro hâc vice, is it not?—Yes. Then there is the Mayor's Court as a Court of Equity; that court appears to have a very considerable equitable jurisdiction, in fact an unlimited equitable jurisdiction. I do not think, from the practice of removing equity proceedings by certiorari into the Court of Chancery, or from some cause or other, decidedly not from any want of confidence in the judges, the general jurisdiction of the Court of Equity has been resorted to.

1881. Has it been the practice, while the number was limited to the four pleaders, for other counsel to be called in specially?—It was the practice when the four pleaders had the privilege, to take in other gentlemen specially, the pleaders always having a brief in the case.

1882. Have you ever yourself practised there?—Yes.

1883. From what you have seen of the practice of those Courts, the Mayor's Court and Sheriffs' Court, has any prejudice arisen from the circumstance of the judge being appointed by the citizens?—Certainly not.

1884. There is nothing like suspicion of partiality prevailing?—Most certainly not. I know on every occasion where the customs of London or the rights and privileges of the City of London have been in question, the judge of the Sheriffs' Court and the judge of the Mayor's Court, the recorder, have taken a most impartial and unprejudiced view.

1885. No suspicion has prevailed among the suitors that there was any unfairness?—No; I believe none at all. The Mayor's Court as a Court of Equity has an unlimited jurisdiction I believe, however, that its practical jurisdiction is confined to cases of apprenticeship, where upon a bill being filed for a return of premium, the recorder, after consulting perhaps with the chamberlain, gives an equitable decision upon the rights of the parties. I think there is very little equitable jurisdiction exercised except that.

1886. In the case of an action in one of the superior Courts and judgment by default, so that a writ of inquiry goes to the sheriffs of London, where is that executed?—It would go to the Secondaries Court, they being the permanent officers of the sheriffs of London.

1887. Are the secondaries appointed by each sheriff?—The secondaries are appointed by the common council.

1888. They are then deputies of the sheriff without having any power of appointing them?—That is so. They are generally experienced parties, and they sit as judges. There is only one at present; the common council having refused to fill up the other vacancy. Besides this Court of Equity sitting with a regular judge, namely, the recorder of the City, there is also a Court of Equity held before the Lord Mayor, who really appears to have the power to act without the sanction of the recorder at all. It is a peculiar custom of markment. Lord Coke says, the Lord Mayor should, in all cases before him, decide them according to equity. It is not the equity of the Court of Chancery or any other equity; but it is something, neither law nor equity. It appears to be in fact almost an arbitrary power. The Lord Mayor may call before him any cause in the Sheriffs' Court, and he may mark it either by reducing it indamages or depriving the plaintiff of what he has obtained by the verdict of a jury. I know that that custom exists, because I have been engaged in a case during the time of the late recorder, where this custom was held to prevail; and there are other cases in which this custom has been held to be good. I believe, generally speaking, now the Lord Mayor would call the recorder before him, and probably would be guided by his advice. Emanating from the Lord Mayor's Court, there is a peculiar court, called the Court of Orphans. The Court of

A. Pulling, Esq.

18th Nov. 1853.

Orphans is a court which the Court of Aldermen can call into existence, in order to vindicate that ancient right which they have of the guardianship of the estates, and the persons of orphans of freemen of London. This is an ancient custom, which appears to be expressly confirmed by an Act of Parliament, appearing upon the rolls of Parliament, in the 1st of Richard II. I have looked at the Act, and it appears expressly to confirm the jurisdiction. The right of the City of London, in the case of orphans, is exempted in an Act of Henry VIII., relating to the general law of orphans throughout the kingdom; and the City, it would appear, could exercise it in the case of a person running away with a ward of the Court of Aldermen. I will suppose the case of the orphan of a gentleman who had been made an honorary freeman of London; they might declare the young lady a ward of the Court and imprison her suitor or her husband. This right was reserved by several Acts of Parliament relating to orphans. It appears to have been exercised up to the time of William and Mary. The Court of Aldermen were in the habit of taking possession of the property of orphans. It appears that by the shutting up of the exchequer great losses were incurred; and what was called the Orphans' Act was passed. This Act provided that no person should be compelled by virtue of any custom of London, or by order and process of the Court of Orphans, to pay into the "chamber of London any sum of money or personal estate belonging to any orphan, "any custom, or usage in force, to the contrary notwithstanding." This statute it will be seen does not destroy the power of the Court of Aldermen over the person herself, nor does it destroy the power which the Court of Aldermen had of compelling the orphan's money to be paid not into the chamber of London, but into some other depository. It does not destroy the jurisdiction of the Court of Aldermen as the guardians of orphans, but it merely prevents them from compelling the money to be paid into the chamber of London. I remember a case where this question was raised some ten years ago, whether the jurisdiction did not still exist, and certainly it does appear to me that the Court of Aldermen still enjoy that jurisdiction. The Court of Policies of Assurances is a Court created by an Act of Parliament in Elizabeth's time. It was regulated by another Act in Charles the Second's time. There were defects in the working of this Court, which are pointed out in a case in Shower, and the consequence has been that that Court has never been called into existence since the time of Charles II. It is however always mentioned as a Court of the City, it never having been abolished, and it is possible that its powers may still be called into existence. Then there are those ancient Courts, the Court of Pie Pondre and of the Clerk of the Market, which do not require any comment. Those are the Courts civil and criminal of the City of London, and the jurisdiction which they exercise; and now I will proceed with the leave of the Commissioners to point out the inconveniences which arise from this conflict of jurisdictions. I have already had occasion in some measure to allude to them. It certainly does appear a very great inconvenience that, with those numerous Courts existing in the City of London, to the number of twelve or thirteen, parties should always be subject to be sued in different places, and to a doubt whether the City Court has jurisdiction, or the general Courts of the land; whether the accident of a person residing in the City or being a freeman of London, would subject him to the jurisdiction of those particular Courts, and thus deprive the plaintiff of the benefit he would have from the general law of the land. Those Courts were established at a time when justice was supposed not to be fully administered in the Queen's Courts, and there does not appear to me to be any reason for now continuing such peculiar jurisdictions to those City Courts.

1889. The peculiar jurisdictions are rather local regulations of the City, than privileges of the corporation, are they not?—They are confirmed as privileges of the City, the right of holding Courts is a franchise of the City, it would be a corporation right.

1890. The corporation as a corporation cannot be considered as deriving any benefit from them?—I conceive not.

1891. Whatever advantage may be supposed to accrue from them, must accrue to the citizens at large?—It must accrue to the citizens at large, either the advantage or the disadvantage. Whereas these Courts were created or were in existence at a time when justice was not fully administered over the rest of the country, we have now local Courts established throughout the whole of the country, namely, the County Courts; and it does not appear to be advantageous that such a number of Courts should exist in the City of London as we find there. At the same time, I cannot but think that, in addition to the County Court existing in the City of London, supposing the local Act were repealed, and it were declared that the Small Debts Court in the City of London should be regulated by the County Court Act, which I think would be a very simple and advantageous change, it still would be an advantage to have out of the wreck of all the other Courts one good Court established for trial by jury in the City of London. There does appear to be a reason why in the City of London there should be a Court in which persons could have cases tried by jury which the Mayor's Court could be really made into. The Mayor's Court is a most useful Court, and if it were regulated by Act of Parliament, and the jurisdiction of the Court of Hustings and other Courts were done away with, an appeal being given from the Mayor's Court to the Courts at Westminster, it would be a very desirable change.

1892. You would recommend that the various petty peculiar jurisdictions should be consolidated into one general and useful Court?—One general and useful Court. That does appear to me to be a very desirable change with regard to the Mayor's Court. Whether it should have jurisdiction in foreign attachments admits of very considerable doubt; it is productive of great good and also of considerable evil. The amount of inconvenience is more a question for merchants of the City of London to decide than a mere lawyer, but it does seem a very anomalous system, and it appears to me very doubtful whether there is any reason why foreign attachment should prevail in the City of London when it does not apply over the rest of the kingdom.

A. Pulling, Esq.

18th Nov. 1853.

1893. Do you think that the custom of attachment could be advantageously modified without being entirely abolished?—It would be very difficult to do anything else than to destroy the custom altogether, unless you apply it to the rest of the kingdom. It does give a creditor an unfair advantage in the City of London which he has not elsewhere.

1894. Is not it very much contended that it would be an advantageous thing to extend it throughout the whole of the kingdom?—It is. It does apply to a great extent in Scotland, and is often a very considerable advantage. I would certainly abolish those particular customs which prevail in the City of London, and I can see no reason at all why property under an intestacy should be distributed in a different way from that in which it is distributed over the rest of the kingdom. I cannot see what advantage is derived from the widow taking a greater share, or the children a different share, from that which they would take in the rest of the kingdom; and when one finds that the custom extends to honorary freemen, it does appear to be a very harsh rule indeed. I would put an end to any doubt as to the power to arrest on mesne process; and, in fact, to all those customs of the City which conflict with the general law of the land. I can see no advantage in having this customary jurisdiction different from the general law of the land.

1895. Do you believe it to be good law, that a custom of the City can be only taken away by the express provision of an Act of Parliament; take for example the custom of the City upon parol wills, or upon parol conveyances, or some peculiar mode of replevin, do you believe a custom of that nature would prevail against general words in an Act of Parliament?—I am incompetent to answer that question; for I can only say that I have argued on both sides. I have been engaged in cases where it has been elaborately argued that a custom was destroyed by a general Act of Parliament, and in other cases where it has been also argued the other way, that it was not.

1896. Those cases may have depended on their special circumstances. I observe it is laid down in your Treatise on the Law and Customs of the City of London, at page 7, that no City customs can be now taken away except by the express provisions of an Act of Parliament; do you believe that to be good law?—I may state that that is the law, as far as I am competent to decide it, that a custom cannot be taken away except by the express provisions of an Act of Parliament.

1897. If that be so, a local custom of the City of London would be stronger than a local Act. If a local Act were in existence in reference to any particular district, and a subsequent general Act were passed, which general Act contained words which were inconsistent with the local Act, the provision in the local Act would be repealed, would not it?—The question would always arise, in that case, whether the general law conflicted with the special law.

1898. If the subsequent general Act conflicted with the prior local Act, the prior local Act would be repealed, would not it, though it were not specifically mentioned?—I do not think, as a general rule, the special law would be repealed because it merely conflicted with the general law; but if the words used by the Legislature were comprehensive enough to include the clauses of the general law,—if, for instance, the Act were to recite, "It is desirable that the laws should be consolidated,"—then I take it that all special laws would be repealed by the conflicting provisions of the general law. But if, without any such recital, the Legislature were merely to declare one thing, the special law having declared another, there would be an implicit reservation of the special law. It is a question, however, which is open to very grave doubts, and has been elaborately argued up to the present time in Westminster Hall.

1899. It appears from your statement to be generally agreed, that a custom of the City of London, unless it be expressly recited and set forth in the Act, and repealed, would hold good against general words in an Act of Parliament?—It certainly is my opinion that the greatest doubt would exist, whether it were repealed or not.

1900. At all events, it would be a question which would be probably raised in argument at the bar?—It would.

1901. Have you ever known instances in which a debt sued for by a plaintiff in foreign attachment has been of much larger amount, or stated to be of much larger amount, than the value of the property attached; for instance, the plaintiff might be suing for 5,000*l.*, and the property attached might not be worth more than 500*l.*, how is that attachment to be got rid of; what bail is required to be put in?—I believe the bail must be for the whole amount of the debt.

1902. Have you ever known that lead to great practical inconvenience, inasmuch as the defendant or the garnishee might be able to put in bail to the amount of the 500*l.*, but not for the 5,000*l.*?—Then he must abandon the goods. I think that inconvenience will inevitably arise.

1903. If the custom were dealt with at all, would it be possible to alter it in the way of allowing the defendant to come in and defend without giving any bail, the attachment standing as a security to the amount of the value of the goods?—I think if the defendant were only compelled to give bail to the amount of the goods attached, it would be an advantage.

1904. Then the attachment should stand as a security; that is to say, the garnishee should keep the goods in his hands till the ultimate decision?—Yes; I think that would be an improvement, certainly.

1905. Questions have arisen frequently whether property attached is liable to attachment; for instance, supposing the garnishee has in his hands goods to the amount of 1,000*l.* belonging to the defendant, but himself is a creditor of the defendant to a large amount, has he any lien for his own debt as against the plaintiff, or if it be money could he set off?—Yes, clearly, he could set off his own debt; it is only the balance which could be attached, I take it.

1906. Is there any appeal from the recorder?—Yes; to the Court of St. Martin's le Grand.

1907. Would it be right in your opinion to allow that a case should be removed by certiorari, so as to bring it before one of the Courts at Westminster?—I think it would be a great advantage to have questions of that kind at once removed by certiorari. At present you only remove the cause. I would remove the attachment itself by an alteration of the law, so as to give the Courts of Westminster control over the Court in London.

1908. Your opinion is that it would be right to consolidate the various Courts, and to have a Civil Court in the City for the recovery of debts?—Yes.

1909. Do you think that that would be better than at once to destroy any such Courts, and above a certain amount to compel the parties to sue in the Courts at Westminster?—I think there is an advantage in allowing parties to sue in the City, having the option to sue in the superior Courts. It would be optional only with the plaintiff, and the defendant, not residing in London, could always remove the case.

1910 Are there similar Courts in other places?—There is the Passage Court at Liverpool, in which many cases are tried, and which is a very excellent Court. Then there is the Tolzie Court at Bristol; and the Court at Exeter.

1911. You seem to think that it would be extremely difficult merely to modify the custom of attachment by any Act of Parliament?—I am not prepared to say that it could not be modified; for instance, it might be modified in the respect which has just been pointed out by your Lordship. Very considerable difficulty arises from those customs of London not being repealed. I would direct the attention of the Commissioners to the cases which I have already mentioned: arrest, real actions, the case of the distribution of an intestate's property, and the case of a married woman trading. There are a great many other instances in which the customs of London are preserved. The practice is for an officer called the remembrancer to attend in his place in the House of Commons and watch every bill. His duty, I believe, is to watch every bill, public or private, which is introduced into Parliament. It is his duty to see that no bill directly or indirectly touches the rights and privileges of the City of London. The remembrancer is at the same time the Parliamentary agent of the corporation; and every year the corporation have a certain number of private Bills, which require as much vigilance and anxiety as can be bestowed by parliamentary agents in the management of a railway bill; the consequence is, that the remembrancer's time is very considerably taken up, and it is necessary for him to be watchful of public bills; and he sometimes discharges his duty by getting a clause inserted, "that this Act shall not be prejudicial to the liberties and privileges of the City of "London." Having done that he retires satisfied that the liberties of the City are preserved.

1912. How does the remembrancer ascertain the contents of every Act that is introduced?—By getting a printed copy, I presume. From his position in the House, if any information is required by him, he can easily obtain it. It was upon that ground that in former times the City had their privileges saved from the statutes as to apprentices and distribution, and orphans and the law of mortmain; for it is a question whether the citizens may still devise in mortmain. In modern times, in like manner, they were exempted from the Municipal Corporations Act, the County Courts Act, the Health of Towns Act, the Militia Act, the Lodging Houses Act, the Ports and Harbours Act, and in fact from almost every sweeping measure which would produce the same changes in the City of London as have been produced by the will of the Legislature in the rest of the kingdom. There have been other bills introduced which might raise a question about the privileges of the City being jeopardized. Upon these occasions the remembrancer has got the usual clause inserted, and great inconvenience has arisen. For instance, I may mention Mr. Sturges Bourne's Act, the 58th of George III., the Select Vestry Act, which was considered a most useful Act when it passed. The remembrancer, I suppose, having a number of private bills to attend to, contented himself with procuring a clause to be inserted, "That the Act should not extend to the City of London;" and Mr. Sturges Bourne's Act does not extend either to the City of London or to Southwark, by the express provision of the Legislature. That is only an instance. In the Acts relating to the sale of beer and wine, and other things, the corporation have always claimed that the City of London should be exempted. In all cases where the remembrancer might suspect that the privileges of the City of London were affected, there has been an attempt on his part to save them in that way. It was upon that ground that the privileges of the City of London were saved in several Acts which generally regulated the metropolis. For instance, in the case of the Police Acts, and the Acts relating to the police magistrates, the aldermen had the same privilege given them as the police magistrates. The same with the regulation of porters and the regulation of sewers. There is a Sewers Act applying to the whole metropolis, the privileges of the City being saved, and the City having obtained a separate and local Act for the regulation of its sewers. With regard to trade, there are in consequence of this system a whole mass of Acts of Parliament regulating particular trades exempting the City of London, and thus the law of apprentices, femmes covert, markets, brokers, and almost every leading branch of trade, is controlled by the custom of London. Then there are charters, confirmed by Parliament regulating the sale of particular articles of merchandize in the City of London. There are charters, for example, exempting the privileges of the different companies, the pewterers', the gunsmiths', the armourers', and other branches of trade within the City of London. The control given in those charters is rarely exercised, but that control is saved by Act of Parliament. I have called the attention of the Commissioners to the fact that wager of law in London may be considered not to be abolished, that the law of wills may be different in London, that real actions may not be abolished, that the law of arrest may still be different within the City of London to what it is in the rest of the country; that the law of rents may be different, and the whole clauses of the statute of frauds may not apply to London. In the case of fines and recoveries there is also a special custom, and the same may be said of many minor matters of less importance. I would make it certain with regard to all those conflicting customs that the general law should prevail in the City of London as it does elsewhere, and all those conflicting customs should be repealed. I will now, with the permission of the Commissioners, say a few words upon the subject of the Criminal Courts, and the evils arising from conflicting jurisdictions in the metropolis generally. I have pointed out that in the City of London there are those peculiar ancient jurisdictions and privileges which possibly may be productive of inconvenience, but I believe there are great practical inconveniences arising from the conflict of jurisdictions within the metropolis in criminal cases. While the Central Criminal Court is sitting, there are sitting in the rest of the metropolis continually the Middlesex sessions, possibly the London sessions, the Surrey sessions, the sessions of the Tower, and a number of other sessions; in fact, the sessions of all the metropolitan districts. Persons who are tried there, who would be sure to be recognised by the officers of the Central Criminal Court, have a greater chance of escape than if they were tried at one court where persons in authority would be able to recognise them; and it would be certain that the witnesses, the police, and others, whose services were required, would not be absent, and there would not be that inconvenience arising from the absence of counsel and attorneys which does occur in consequence of there being so many jurisdictions. I think it would be a very great advantage if the Central Criminal Court were made the only criminal court for the whole of the metropolis.

1913. If you took away the sessional jurisdiction, how would you provide for a sufficient attendance of judges at the Central Criminal Court?—I think assistant judges might be named. Assistant judges appointed at the Central Criminal Court, the minor cases now taken at the sessions could be taken in the weeks when the Central Criminal Court was not sitting for the higher class of cases, and thus the whole criminal jurisdiction of the metropolis might be transacted at one place. Instead of the police, the witnesses, and numbers of people being taken from one place to another, as they are now, the whole criminal business might be done at one place, the Central Criminal Court, the assistant judges sitting in the weeks when the higher class of business was not being transacted, for the trial of minor offences in the whole of the metropolis.

1914. The effect of that would be to do away with any criminal court in the county of Middlesex, except the Central Criminal Court?—Within the metropolitan district.

1915. Are any cases now tried in Kent or Surrey within the district of the Central Criminal Court?—Yes; that clause in the Central Criminal Court Act is repealed. It is the case that persons are tried at Newington, and at other places. Practically, the magistrates and the assistant judge at the Middlesex Sessions do try a great many cases.

1916. The effect of that alteration of the law has been to take business from the Central Criminal Court and restore it to the Middlesex Quarter Sessions?—Yes.

1917. That change is, in your opinion, in the wrong direction?—Yes; I would rather confine it to the Central Criminal Court, increasing the staff, and appointing assistant judges to that court.

1918. The Central Criminal Court is held twelve times a year?—Yes.

1919. How long does the sessions generally last?—From two to ten days.

1920. Can you at all judge how many more days would be requisite, supposing the alteration which you propose were made?—If two judges were sitting for a week after the close of the usual sessions, I think that would be sufficient; it would not throw any more labour upon the judges of the land who attend at the Central Criminal Court now, and I do not believe it would involve any greater expense to the country.

1921. It is usual at every sessions at the Central Criminal Court now to have three of the judges of the Courts at Westminster who are upon the rota?—Yes.

1922. Is there any necessity for that; would not the presence of one judge be sufficient?—One judge sitting as the judges do on circuit would be quite sufficient.

1923. Is there anything in the Central Criminal Court Act which requires any particular number of judges to be present?—No; it only requires that the Lord Mayor and two aldermen should be present.

1924. There being two judges present in all cases is therefore the result of a regulation among the judges themselves?—Yes; it is necessary now that the aldermen should be present; but I certainly would relieve the members of the corporation, the Lord Mayor and the aldermen, from the necessity of being present at that Court, and I would make the real judge who is to try the case, the recorder, or the common serjeant, or one of the judges of the land, alone sufficient to constitute a Court. If to this change were added a change dispensing with the services of the grand jury, I believe the business would be very much better conducted at the Central Criminal Court than it is now. The grand jury by their intervention do appear to me to impede the business very considerably. It is never known either by the witnesses, by the counsel, by the attorneys, or by any body what bills are likely to be found at a particular time. The list is only made out at an uncertain hour of the day, and it is never known by the parties who are most interested in knowing what the business of the day is to be, or what list is to be taken. The consequence is, the cases are called on, and excuses are made for the absence of the witnesses, the prosecutors, or the counsel, and a great many other inconveniences arise. If an efficient system of responsible police magistrates were adopted throughout the metropolitan district, I cannot see any use of which the grand jury would be. I think my suggestions as to the Central Criminal Court would not be complete without my adding that observation, though it may be quite beside the object of the present Commission. I may also add that I think within the City, as within every metropolitan district, in every case there ought to be a public prosecutor. The City of London, at this moment, have an officer called the City solicitor, whose services are very useful on many occasions; he occasionally is invested with the duties of a public prosecutor. The Court of Aldermen direct prosecutions; they have the power of ordering money out of the City funds for that purpose, and it certainly is the case that rightly or wrongly the Court of Aldermen select the cases where the City solicitor is to interfere. Very often they may be actuated by the best motives, but they undoubtedly select the cases. They do not authorize their officer to prosecute in every case of crime, but on account of the circumstances of the individual, his being a notorious criminal, or the offence being a very reprehensible one, or there being some cause which induces the Court of Aldermen to put the machinery in motion. But there is no public prosecutor within the City of London, though he might be very easily appointed; and I do think in any change which may take place regulating the corporation of London, it ought to be compulsory upon them to appoint a public prosecutor.

1925. Do the costs of those prosecutions ordered by the Court of Aldermen come out of the general City funds?—They do.

1926. There is no rate in the nature of a county rate which is applied to prosecutions within the City of London?—No.

1927. The City, being a county, could make a rate of that kind?—They have the power to do so.

1928. Do you know what were the provisions of the Bill which was introduced for the purpose of abolishing the grand jury, sufficiently to say whether it contained any provision for the appointment of a public prosecutor?—I think one of the enactments was, that every person should be put upon his trial upon the commitment of a police magistrate of the metropolis. The suggestions which I have taken the liberty of making with regard to the criminal courts of justice, I cannot think would be complete without establishing within the City of London, similar police courts to those which are established in the rest of the metropolis. I cannot understand upon what principle it is that gentlemen, with a number of vocations, should be considered qualified to administer criminal justice, from Temple Bar to Aldgate, in the very midst of the hurry and bustle of commerce, when it is necessary in the rest of the metropolis that men should be appointed with certain qualifications, and who devote their whole time to the business of magistrates. In the City certain gentlemen are appointed, who not only have their own affairs as merchants or tradesmen to attend to, but who have very great duties devolving upon them as senators in the civic council, and as aldermen in the various departments of the municipal government of the City of London, and who moreover can hardly be expected to attend to those duties to their own inconvenience. I cannot understand why an exception should be made in that respect in the City of London, and why it should be the duty of certain officers to dispense justice at the police courts throughout the rest of the metropolis, but in London it should be a mere honorary distinction.

1929. Do you know whether it is the practice for the aldermen to rely, to a considerable extent, upon the advice of their paid assessor in administering justice?—I have been so little before the magistrates of London in the police courts, that I am not able to judge. I certainly have had cases before the magistrates of London, and I have seen very strong feeling exhibited by aldermen. I was engaged in one case this year, I think, on the subject of a conviction by an alderman of London, where the alderman felt very warmly about it, and he himself sat as a magistrate afterwards to enforce the conviction.

1930. In what Court was that?—A magistrate of the City having convicted a party, and his conviction being appealed against, and a certiorari being applied for to the Court of Queen's Bench, the same magistrate issued a summons to call the defendant before him to show cause why he should not pay the money; and he sat himself to adjudicate.

A. Pulling, Esq.

18th Nov. 1853.

1931. Are you acquainted with the provision of the Municipal Act as to the appointment of stipendiary magistrates?—It gives a power to the corporation to apply to the Government, and the Government may appoint stipendiary magistrates.

1932. The town council may apply to the Government; they fixing the salary, and the Crown appointing the magistrate?—Yes.

1933. Supposing such a power as that were given to the common council, do you think it would be exercised?—It is very difficult to speculate upon what the common council might do.

1934. Do you think the disposition of the corporation would be to avail themselves of a power of that sort?—I am unable to answer that question. The common council consists of such a number of members that it is impossible to speculate upon what the majority might determine. I should rather think the feeling there is strongly against any appointment over which they have not the control, and that an opposition would be made to the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate by the majority of the members. The right of the aldermen to sit as magistrates is not a very ancient one. The charter which makes the aldermen de facto magistrates is only of the date of George II. Previous to that time only aldermen who had passed the chair were magistrates. The Lord Mayor had power to appoint two magistrates for Middlesex; a power which has not been exercised, and which the Court of Queen's Bench decided some time ago to be illegal. I will merely add, that in addition to the inconveniences from the conflict of laws and jurisdictions, it appears to me that there are very great inconveniences from the conflict of local boards in the metropolis. When we consider that there are 700 Acts of Parliament in force within the metropolis for the regulation of its local affairs, it does seem to me that it is absolutely necessary, for the proper government of the metropolis, that the provisions of those Acts should be consolidated.

1935. How many of those local acts are in force within the City?—I should say more than half of them.

1936. It is your belief that there are in force in the City as many as 350 local Acts?—I believe there are 350 local Acts in force within the City. I do not say there are 350 local boards. There are many improvement Acts, &c., which regulate the rights of parties, and give general powers which may be called into existence any moment. Then there are a number of paving Acts; a number of Acts relating to parish affairs, and lighting, and a great number of Acts of various kinds; but, certainly, throughout the metropolis I should say there were 700 local Acts 1937. Are there many charters applicable to the City?—I should think there must be 200 charters relating to the City of London.

1938. What portion of them contain provisions which are now in force?—From that very circumstance of the customs of London never becoming obsolete, it is difficult to say what are in force, and what are not. I have in Luffman's Charters fifty-two charters relating to the corporation of the City; but a great many charters are omitted, notes of which I have; others are in the town clerk's office, into which I have not had an insight; but copies are to be found in the Rolls, at the Tower, and elsewhere, and many of which have been noted by the record commissioners.

1939. What proportion of the charters of the City are in print?—I have fifty charters in print relating to the City itself.

1940. Are there any others besides those which are in print?—There are none which have been printed as a collection of charters; there are some which have been set out in decided cases in the reports.

1941. How many charters are there which are not in print but which are in force?—I cannot answer that question, but I should say there must be twenty more at the least relating to the corporation of the City alone.

1942. Practically, does it in general happen, when any question respecting the privileges of the City of London is in litigation, the litigant parties can ascertain from printed charters the state of the law?—Certainly not. I have every reason for saying that the policy of the corporation of the City of London, of late years, has been to conceal their charters, to deny the public access to them, and to prevent that discovery of their contents which appears to me every resident in London is clearly entitled to. There are old bye-laws of the City, declaring that the laws and customs of the City of London should be made known to the public, who were to be affected by them; but the officers of the corporation are instructed to withhold the information.

1943. What officers have the custody of the charters?—The proper custodian of the charters is Mr. Serjeant Merewether, the town clerk. I know he refuses access to them.

1944. Where are those instructions to be found?—One of the standing orders of the common council now is, that no officer shall show the records, or charters of the corporation, without the leave of the Court.

1945. Does it not appear to you that if the City claim under a charter an extensive public right, and seek to enforce that claim by litigation, they ought to put the defendant in full possession of the legal instrument under which the claim is made?—Undoubtedly.

1946. The further question would then arise as to the application of that charter to the particular facts of the case, just as it would arise with regard to an Act of Parliament;

but the preliminary question, as to the existence of the legal authority, ought first to be established, ought not it?—Certainly.

1947. Can you conceive any reason why the whole of the charters of the City, which are in force and which remain in force, should not be made public?—I can conceive a reason, and a very strong one. I beg leave to say that I have never been engaged for the corporation of London, and therefore, in what I say, I am not breaking confidence with the corporation of London; but I have reason to believe that the charters of London would show that the City of London has committed the forfeiture of many of its rights. For instance, the City of London claim to hold lands in mortmain, and that right they first derived in the reign of Edward IV. I see from the account of the City revenue, that they have a very large revenue now derived from rents and quit rents. The greater number of those rents and quit rents are derived from property, which I conceive they had merely for the purposes of a trust, of which trust they have committed a breach. For example, I find that the corporation of London, being the conservators of the Thames, have been in the habit of granting leave to encroach upon the bed of the Thames, and to do that very thing which the office of conservators directed them to prevent others doing, namely, encroaching upon the bed and soil of the Thames. I find an Act, in Charles II.'s time, passed after the fire of London, directing that the Thames should be embanked from London Bridge to the Temple, and that no houses should be built there. No one can go along Thames Street now without seeing an immense quantity of houses and warehouses, which have been built upon that spot; and I believe, though I am not in the secrets of the corporation in regard to their property, a very considerable amount of their income is derived from those houses and warehouses, which has been obtained contrary to their trusts, by encroachments on the bed of the Thames. The same may be said with regard to Smithfield.

1948. If they committed any encroachment upon the bed of the Thames so as to be a public nuisance, would not they be liable to an indictment as well as anybody else?—Very likely they might. The question is now pending as to the right of the City to the soil between high and low water mark; they have been in the habit of deriving, and now do derive, a revenue from granting licences to encroach upon the bed of the Thames. With respect to Smithfield, the charter of Charles I. which granted Smithfield granted also Moorfields, but the express condition of that charter was, that those places should be devoted to the same open purposes to which they had been theretofore devoted. Upon the great fire of London, an act of Parliament passed to rebuild London, in which there was an express recital that during the great calamity of the fire people had built pent houses upon Smithfield, but it directed that those pent houses should be pulled down and that none should be erected again. The original charter directed that no houses should be built upon either Smithfield or Moorfields, but the Building Act directed that those pent houses which had been built during the great calamity should be pulled down, and no others should be erected. It was a great question in opposition to the corporation in the case of Smithfield Market, whether their right was not forfeited. Every one knows that the small space of Smithfield Market is now not one twentieth part of the original space, and that the corporation of London have, in defiance of the express conditions of the grant of the surrounding land, not only allowed houses to be built there, but have received the profits of the buildings. With regard to Moorfields, they obtained a private Act of Parliament in 1812, and they derive a large revenue from the Finsbury estate, but it is in direct contravention of the grants to them. The grants being made to them with a direction to leave the spaces open, and the grant of the conservancy of the Thames being to protect the river from encroachments, they have allowed the river to be encroached on, and they have allowed houses to be built on the open spaces, and they have received the profits of such encroachments. I conceive that these are good reasons why the corporation should withhold its charters from the eye of the public.

1949. You mean that there are certain reasons why the City should be unwilling to produce its charters; but looking to the public good, and the interest of the persons affected by the charters, is there any reason why they should not be made public?—Certainly not. I cannot see any just reason why the corporation of London should withhold the knowledge of the grounds of its rights from those persons who are affected by them. I do not know that I can add anything to the observations which I have made, except that it appeared to me that where there is a conflict of jurisdiction, and a conflict of the powers of local boards, it would be a very great improvement if in every part of the metropolis there was established a system of municipal government upon the same model, as nearly as possible, as was established by the Municipal Corporation Act in other towns. I believe if every large metropolitan borough was incorporated, and the Municipal Corporation Act applied generally to each district, great advantages would be gained. I would not, in adapting the municipal corporation to the City, and any other of the metropolitan boroughs, deprive the City proper of any property, any title, or any beneficial rights which they now enjoy. I would reserve to the City of London all the rights which it now legally possesses. A similar reservation of rights has been made in the case of the Municipal Corporation Act; and, undoubtedly, the sense of justice of Parliament would make that reservation in favour of the City of London. I think the question of the police magistracy requires to be settled, and also the question of the police. I conceive there can be little doubt that one uniform system of police should be established throughout the whole of the metropolis, and one common system of sewerage. Whether the City should appoint one of the commissioners is another question, which could be easily settled; but those questions being settled, the question of police and the police magistracy, great advantage would be derived if the whole of the Acts of Parliament relating to the local government of the metropolis were repealed, and for them there were substituted a system of municipal government for the whole of the metropolis; each metropolitan borough constituting a corporation of itself. I would give them generally, as nearly as possible, the powers which are given to municipal corporations under the Municipal Act. In the City of London I would make a difference. I think, for various reasons, considering the still-remaining connexion of the City with the trade of London, and the share which the livery of London have in the franchises and rights of the City, the livery of London should have reserved to them a great deal of the powers which they anciently possessed. I do think that the livery of London might be made a very efficient body of men; whilst the householders might be invested with the power of regulating the rates, and regulating the general affairs of their local government, I would reserve to the livery the right they have now to elect the chief officer, the Lord Mayor. He should be elected by the livery, as he is at present. The chamberlain, who receives the property of the City of London, should be also appointed by the common hall of the livery. So the bridge masters, the sheriffs, and the other officers should be elected in the same way that they are at present; but the livery companies having those powers, I certainly would very greatly reform those companies themselves. The reform of the companies is not within the province of the present Commission; but I think there cannot be a second opinion that they require very considerable reform. Either the companies which have ceased to have any connexion with the trade which they profess to represent should be altogether disconnected with the City of London, and exist as voluntary societies, or they should still retain their place as a part of the corporation, but should restore the members of their particular trade to all the rights and privileges in the guild or company which they formerly possessed.

1950. If you maintain a connexion between the livery of the trade companies and the election of certain great officers in the City, does not the constitution of the companies then become a material question in respect to the constitution of the corporation?—I think it does undoubtedly.

1951. You say that the present constitution of the companies is defective, which renders the livery objectionable; but that the character of the livery might be improved if the constitution of the companies were altered?—I think so.

1952. In that point of view, the constitution of the companies becomes material to the question of corporation reform?—No doubt it does.

1953. There is no body of liverymen of London independent of the companies, is there?—None at all.

1954. On what ground is it that you think it desirable to continue the connexion between the livery companies and the corporation?—Because I believe that the trade of London could not be conveniently represented in any other way in the corporation of London, than through the companies.

1955. Do the companies now practically represent the trade of London?—I conceive that the livery are much more the representatives of the trade of London than the freemen householders. I believe there would be found a greater proportion of the merchants of the City of London among the livery of London, than there are in the corporation at large.

1956. The members of the great commercial houses in London are not freemen at all?—Many of them are not; there are many of them who are free of the companies.

1957. I understand your meaning to be this, that many of the great merchants and bankers of the City of London happen to be members of the companies, though they are not free of the City?—And I believe they are free of the City also, but few of them reside within the City, or have interfered in any business of the corporation.

1958. The companies have very little connexion with the trades whose names they bear, have they?—Very little; that connexion I would restore.

1959. In that sense the companies do not represent the trade of the City?—In that sense they do not. There are no members of the livery companies who have not at one time been connected with the City of London, and I do think that in restoring the livery to something like its ancient position in the City of London, you would secure to the Corporation of London a more permanent body than they could have if merely the persons who were rated for a year were put upon the burgess list.

1960. You mean that there are many persons connected with the livery who are not inhabitants of the City?—There are; for example, a man who is the son of a banker of the last generation, who might have been free of one of the great companies, becomes free by patrimony.

1961. What do you say to the influence exercised by some of the minor companies, such as the Watermen's company?—The Watermen's company have no livery, but they have a great many members who are free of the City, and who take up their livery in some of the smaller companies by the payment of a very trifling sum of money.

1962. Do you consider that they are a good class of voters?—Certainly not.

1963. Do you contemplate that any means should be used for removing them from the livery?—I do not like to deprive any persons of vested rights, but I certainly would regulate the admission to the livery by a positive law. I would allow no one to be on the livery unless he were elected by the general freemen.

1964. In that case the electors would elect into their own body?—Yes; but if the electors were composed of members of the trade, there could be no reason to suspect malpractice. At present they are not so, they are strangers.

1965. Would you maintain the distinction between the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council?—No, I would not.

1966. What do you consider to be the principal object of that distinction at present?—I believe at one time the Court of Aldermen had a distinct power from that possessed by the Common Council; but I believe, for all useful purposes, that power is gone, and I would destroy it altogether.

1967. The aldermen are members of the Court of Common Council?—Yes; and they meet in the Court of Aldermen separately.

1968. The powers of the Court of Aldermen appear to be limited, with the exception of the power of electing to certain offices; is there any other power of importance which they possess?—They have very considerable patronage over the hospitals.

1969. Is that patronage exercised by the aldermen as a court, or by the aldermen separately?—It is very difficult, when questions of patronage arise, to distinguish the Court of Aldermen sitting at the Guildhall from a dinner party of aldermen meeting together, for they undoubtedly require no official forms to go through in order to make up their minds for whom they shall vote. There is no doubt that the aldermen are very much influenced by the feelings and wishes of their brother aldermen.

1970. Is the Court of Aldermen a legally organized body in which decisions are made by a majority of votes, or is it a body like a Cabinet Council, which merely sits for purposes of deliberation, and has no legal organization?—I conceive that they always vote and decide by the majority; but the room is cleared of strangers when the aldermen are coming to a decision.

1971. You appear to think that the liverymen ought to elect the great officers of the corporation?—I do.

1972. Is that because you consider the liverymen to be the better sort of freemen of each company?—I think at present among the 9,000 liverymen are some of the best freemen of London.

1973. We hear of long-shore men who are liverymen, and who ought never to have been liverymen?—Every man guilty of corruption could be easily disfranchised if efficient regulations were established for that purpose in the City of London. I believe that the corporation of London are to blame for not having taken steps to suppress it.

1974. As the case now stands, some of the higher officers of the City are not elected by the liverymen and some are. The recorder is appointed by the aldermen, the common serjeant by the Court of Common Council, and the sheriffs by the liverymen in common hall?—Yes.

1975. Is there any reason for that distinction?—I would not have a judicial officer appointed by a general body like the livery; it would be very dangerous to have the recorder of London appointed by the livery of London. I would exclude the judicial officers from such a mode of election.

1976. What do you think as to the propriety of appointing the aldermen for life?—I think it is very inconvenient.

1977. Do you approve of the regulation of the Municipal Corporations Act, by which one third of the town council go out each year, and therefore each person would serve for three years?—That may be advantageous, but I would make the election for the town council annual in the City of London, as it is at present. I would make the election of all the unpaid officers and all the members of the corporation annual.

1978. The election of aldermen would become annual like that of the others?—Yes. With regard to the case of the aldermen, like all other City rights there is a doubt as to the legal period for which they are elected. There is an Act of Parliament which declares that the aldermen shall be elected annually, and there is an ordinance which appears upon the rolls of Parliament, but does not appear among the printed statutes, in the reign of Richard II., which directs that the aldermen shall not be amoved. There is a doubt whether this last is an Act of Parliament or not.

1979. Have all the ancient statutes affecting the City of London been printed?—No; there are a great many which are not printed. The statute which I have recited from Richard II., which confirms the customs of London, is not in print. Lord Coke mentions a great many Acts of Parliament relating to London which are not in print.

1980. In order to ascertain the law with respect to any custom of the City of London, it is necessary to go into a very laborious antiquarian research?—Certainly, to go over a very wide field indeed.

1981. Both into printed and manuscript authorities?—No doubt.

1982. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—There is no other point.

Adjourned to Tuesday next, at 12 o'clock.

Tuesday, 22*d November*, 1853.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

J. Cherry, Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

JAMES CHERRY, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

1983. You are mayor of Yarmouth, are you not?—Yes.

1984. For what purpose are you desirous of appearing before the Commission?—To represent the prejudicial effects of certain dues and customs which are levied upon corn and grain imported into London. The way in which the shipping interests of Yarmouth feel themselves aggrieved particularly is this: there are certain dues called metage, fillage, lastage, porterage, Lord Mayor's dues, and others which are levied upon all grain brought by vessels into the port of London, but which are not levied upon grain brought into London by railway conveyance on equal terms. I find that the amount of those dues is about 4¼*d.* per quarter, or 3*s.* 6*d.* per last. I am told that the railway company charge about 10*s.* per last, being free from these dues amounting to 3*s.* 6*d.*, and consequently the shipping is so far disabled from competing with them. I find, from a return which I have before me, that in or about the year 1847, there were 56,000 quarters of malt, and 210,000 quarters of barley, being together 266,000 quarters shipped from the port of Yarmouth to London. The last return, which ended in December 1852, was 55,000 quarters of malt, and 31,748 quarters of barley, being together 86,748 quarters as contrasted with 266,000 in 1847. I believe the Commissioners have already had it in evidence, that these metages and lastages are not desired by the merchants, and if desired at all, they could be done at a considerably less cost than they at present amount to. That, however, is a matter more concerning the merchant than the shipowner. The effect of the railway being free from these taxes, and shipowners having them imposed upon them, is to divert the traffic from shipowners to the railway company. It is on that ground more particularly that we complain. If the operation of those dues and taxes were general, ships would be able to enter the field with the railways on equal terms; but being limited to shipping, they are unable to compete with the railways.

1985. Has a considerable portion of the corn trade of Yarmouth been diverted from ships to land carriage?—We presume that the great falling off between the two periods I have instanced, chiefly arises from that circumstance.

1986. You believe that the diminution of the water carriage is not owing to a general diminution in the trade, but to a corresponding increase in the land carriage?—That the traffic has been diverted from one channel to another.

1987. Have you any evidence to prove that that has been the case?—I have no specific evidence to prove it, inasmuch as nothing but a return from the railway companies would show it.

1988. Have you any knowledge of whether much corn is carried by railway?—There is no doubt that very large quantities are carried by the railway companies.

1989. Do you believe, if railways and the shipping interest were upon a perfect equal footing, the shipowners could compete against the railways for the transport of corn from Yarmouth to London?—Undoubtedly. I find that those dues amount to 4¼*d.* a quarter. It would pay the shipping to bring the corn up at 1*s.* a quarter.

1990. You consider that the effect of those dues is sufficient to account for the change which has taken place in the trade?—Undoubtedly; and from my own knowledge, I should say there are not 100 quarters of corn less sent out of Norfolk than formerly, but rather more.

1991. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—That is the only point to which I would call the attention of the Commissioners.

Mr. S. T. Belton.

Mr. S. T. BELTON, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

1992. You attend here, I believe, on the part of a deputation from Saint Marylebone, who are desirous of making certain statements to this Commission?—Yes; appointed by a public meeting of the ratepayers and inhabitants called by public advertisement.

1993. Was the meeting numerously attended?—Not very numerously attended. From various parts of the parish the most influential persons attended.

1994. Do you believe the meeting fairly represented the parish of Saint Marylebone?—Yes; no doubt of it.

1995. Will you state to the Commissioners the points which you were instructed on the part of that meeting to lay before them?—I was instructed to state to the Commissioners the injurious effects of the coal duties, and likewise the cart duties. I will first of all go into the coal duties. It is calculated that the coal dues and metage levied upon the parish of St. Marylebone amount to 22,000*l.* a year. That amount includes the gas. We consider the amount levied for gas alone is equal to 5,000*l.* a year.

1996. You mean that what you pay in the increased price of coals in consequence of those dues is equal to that amount?—The tax upon the coals which are used in the manufacture of gas for the parish of Marylebone amounts to somewhere about 5,000*l.* a year, and the general coal dues to about 17,000*l.* a year. We have 17,000 houses in Marylebone parish, and those 17,000 houses we reckon to have upon an average about ten rooms each, which is 170,000 rooms. We form our calculation according to the quantity of coals which is supplied to the St. Marylebone Almshouses, supported by subscription from the inhabitants, where they allow them a ton and a half of coals to each room. If we go upon that calculation for the whole parish, you will find the estimate as a general one will come to the amount I state.

Mr. S. T. Belton.

1997. You calculate the amount of the tax to average about 1*l.* a house?—Yes, about 1*l.* a house. We have established baths and wash-houses in our parish, according to the Act of Parliament, by means of a subscription and a small rate of a halfpenny in the pound on the poor rate. This rate is levied for building and other purposes; else they are self-supporting. I find that the coal dues upon the baths and wash-houses amount to nearly 50*l.* a year. With respect to the public lights, which are 4,000 in number, we find that for those alone the tax upon the coal used in the manufacture of the gas amounts to 400*l.* per annum. We consider that we receive no benefit whatever from the tax. The tax has been levied from the parishioners and the inhabitants of the various parishes round London for a number of years, but they have received no benefit whatever from it. The coal dues were collected for the purpose of paying 1,000,000*l.* which was borrowed for the building of London Bridge and its approaches, but that amount has been paid off for some time, and therefore the sum which is now collected, is collected for making new streets in the City, and a small portion of it in Middlesex and Westminster.

1998. Were the improvements in Oxford Street paid for out of that fund?—A small portion of them. I believe about 40,000*l.* or 50,000*l.*

1999. Was not the entire expense of New Oxford Street defrayed from that fund?—No; there has been an increase of ground rents. The ground rents upon the property of the old houses were only about 10*l.* or 20*l.* a year.

2000. Whatever expense fell upon the public was defrayed from that fund, was it not?—I believe it was.

2001. Do you not consider that an improvement, by which the parish of Marylebone was considerably benefited?—I do not think the parish of Marylebone is so much benefited as the parishes of St. Giles and St. George, Bloomsbury. There were a great many poor and dilapidated houses pulled down, and the poor population that resided in that district is dispersed over Marylebone parish, to the great injury of the parish, and the ultimate benefit of St. Giles and St. George, Bloomsbury. Not only so, but there is an increased rental from the houses. Houses which were formerly let for 30*l.* or 40*l.* a year, now pay a ground rent alone of about 70*l.*; therefore what we allege is, that the improved ground rents ought to go to liquidate the money borrowed, and that the coal dues, by a careful management of the ground rents, need not be levied. Suppose a ground rent of 50*l.* a year worth twenty years' purchase, that would sell for 1,000*l.* Now if that money were accumulated, it would go towards paying the original outlay, pulling down the old houses or re-purchasing the ground, or whatever matters the money was expended on, we should have no occasion to pay those coal duties for any considerable time longer.

2002. Those ground rents are a part of the revenue of the Crown, are not they?—I suppose they are. Though we pay so much from Marylebone parish, we have no means of ascertaining how the money is expended, or what the receipts are from this property.

2003. Would it be possible to defray the expenses of a large improvement like that of New Oxford Street from a parochial rate?—I think there is a possibility of doing it, but the injustice is this: they say if you give a poor man more fire, you make more smoke and fog in London; but the fact is, you are taking away one day's firing from the poor man to pay for these fine streets in other parts of London, because the duty upon the poor man's coal is equal to 7 lbs of coals per week;—that would keep up his fire for a day; therefore, at this inclement season, it is acting very injuriously and unjustly to the poor of other parishes. I do not say that the City of London have got this to answer for, because those laws have been made for a great length of time, and at a period when the population was much smaller than it is at present. But the population has gone on increasing, and we find very injurious effects resulting. £22,000 per annum is equal to a poor rate of 7*d.* in the pound in our parish. The whole rental of Marylebone parish paying to the poor rate is 850,000*l.* a year. I find the rental of the City of London in 1831 was 792,000*l.*; in 1838 it decreased to 785,000*l.*, being a decrease in seven years of 7,000*l.*; whereas the rental of Marylebone parish has increased 150,000*l.* in that time; so that the Commissioners will see that a revolution has taken place,—the City of London is decreasing in its rental, while the parishes round London are vastly improving.

2004. Is your objection directed mainly to the principle of a coal tax, or is it the application of the present tax?—To the application of the tax, and to the principle of it too.

2005. You think it an objectionable mode of raising money for municipal purposes?—I do; for this reason: the citizens of London collect this tax, and there is a great deal of the money spent perhaps for useful purposes in the City, and other parishes, but the majority of the parishes which have to pay this money receive no benefit whatever from it. And the tax is injurious to trade. It is driving away manufacturers from the neighbourhood of London, which would be highly beneficial to the working population. At Reading, in Berkshire, beyond the 21 miles' distance, we can buy coals 2*s.* 6*d.* a ton cheaper than we can ten miles nearer London, though these coals pass through the London district to supply Reading. And not only so, but a short time ago I went by one of the steamers down to Sheerness. I found there, instead of the steamer I went by taking the coals in as she ought to have done, in London, she took the coals in five miles below Gravesend, detaining us there one hour to do so. That injured the trade of London, and was injurious to us all. It wasted my time, and was an injury to trade, merely to save the payment of the tax.

2006. Do you think a rate would be more willingly paid by the inhabitants of the metropolis for the purpose of improvements, than the present tax upon coals?—I have no doubt of it. In our local Act of Parliament I know that there is some enactment to the effect that a rate shall be made, if agreed to by the governing body. (35 Geo. 3. cap. 73, sec. 89.—Vestrymen may purchase lands, &c. for widening streets.)

2007. For purposes of general improvement in the metropolis, do you not think that the metropolis should very much be considered as a whole; and that in reality every part of the metropolis benefits from an improvement of every other part?—Yes; we may suppose that if one part of the body is out of order, the whole must feel the effect of it. But here the case is not actually in point. Here there were a number of poor, dilapidated houses pulled down at our expense, and new ones built. There are large revenues in the shape of improved ground rents, received by parties in possession, but which we have to pay for.

2008. You do not object to the principle of a general metropolitan tax for public works of metropolitan utility?—A general metropolitan tax would have the same injurious effect, unless under control. The vestry of Marylebone is a municipality without a head. The governing body of St. Marylebone are elected under Sir John Hobhouse's Act, by which every ratepayer has a vote for the election of the vestrymen. Though they are called vestrymen, their duties are multifarious. They superintend the lighting, the paving, and, in fact, all the other acts which a municipal body have to do.

2009. Do not you think it would be unfortunate if each district of the metropolis were merely to look within its own precincts for the purposes of improvement, and were not to take a larger view, and consider what was best for the whole metropolis, being certain that it would share in the general prosperity and improvement?—No doubt that is the case; for within the last twelve months we have expended 25,000*l.* for the paving of one street alone, which is Oxford Street. That tends to benefit the whole of the parishes around St. Marylebone, as well as the City of London, from its being the principal thoroughfare to it. I believe a sum of 500*l.* a year is received to make good the expense from the neighbouring parishes.

2010. I am supposing the proceeds of any such rate were impartially and fairly expended for the benefit of the whole metropolis, viewed as a whole?—I consider that if there was a general tax levied, it might be a benefit. We know very well that we have experienced the ill effects of badly ventilated streets lately. We think, therefore, some portion of this tax ought to go to the improvement of the localities, and that there ought to be some mode devised for that purpose.

2011. You state that Marylebone vestry, being elected under Hobhouse's Act, and having various powers, may be considered as equivalent to a municipal body rather than a parish vestry. It has been represented to this Commission by several witnesses, that it would be desirable that all the parliamentary boroughs of London should be incorporated under the Municipal Corporations Act; do you believe there is any wish in the parish of Marylebone that the borough should be incorporated under that Act?—I have had various conversations with the leading parties in the parish upon the subject, and I cannot find that they wish for any alteration in the present system. We have the whole powers vested in the vestrymen which any municipal body could have, except the care of the water and sewerage. The builders in the parish, however, build the sewers, and there is a general communication to the Westminster sewers for the purposes of outlet.

2012. Your view seems to be, that the effect of incorporating the borough of Marylebone under the general Municipal Act, would be to supersede the vestry, and interfere with their functions?—No doubt of it. The vestry is now elected by all the ratepayers, whatever amount they may pay. Every resident householder is eligible to be a vestryman who is rated at 40*l.* per annum. Not only male householders but female householders may vote; the voting being by ballot. My own idea is, that we should not be improved by having a corporation. We have now municipal power without a head.

2013. Your view is, that the vestry elected under Hobhouse's Act is for the parish of Marylebone a preferable body to a town council, elected under the Municipal Corporations Act?—I do not think the change would be any improvement to the parish of Marylebone. It would be an improvement to the parish of St. Pancras, for this reason, that they have seventeen or eighteen paving commissions, separate and distinct commissions, and some parts of the parish are not so well attended to as other parts, in consequence of some of the commissions not taking the same view that others do; perhaps wishing to keep down the expenses, or some cause or other,—therefore it would have a beneficial effect upon them. Perhaps also in Paddington, they having a select vestry not by popular election, the effect might be beneficial. The vestry in St. Pancras are elected under Hobhouse's Act, but they do not supersede the paving commissions, of which I believe there are seventeen in the parish.

22d Nov. 1853.

2014. If the parliamentary borough of Marylebone were incorporated, those three parishes would be thrown together would they not?—They would.

2015. Therefore the town council would be a differently constituted body from any one of the present parochial vestries?—It would of course; and there would be only one governing body for the three parishes, whereas there are now three governing bodies for the three parishes.

2016. Do you think that would be an improvement or the reverse?—I cannot say. I do not think it would be an improvement to our parish; but taking the three parishes together, I think it might be an improvement.

2017. There is a very strong parochial feeling in general, is there not, in those large parishes?—Yes, there is. I should wish also to refer to the cart duties levied by the City of London. The cart duties at the present time are let to contractors for 5,000*l.* per annum; and I am informed that they collect something near 10,000*l.*, giving 5,000*l.* clear profit to the contractors. By the contractors employing persons to collect the tolls, they are collected in a very harsh and rather an ungenerous manner. Suppose I go to Newgate Market and buy a leg of mutton or a flat of butter, that is placed in my cart, I have to pay 2*d.* for that to a man who will stop me at the corner of Newgate-street. I come down to Farringdon-street, and a neighbour of mine bought a little geranium which he gave 3*d.* for. Before the toll collector would allow him to get into the cart he made him pay another 2*d.* If I had gone up Holborn and bought anything else, and there had been a collector near, he would have made me pay another 2*d.*, so that there would have been 6d. toll for that cartload of goods. Supposing, my not being a freeman, I take a load of goods into the City three or four times in a day, I must pay 2*d.* each time.

2018. A toll is paid every time the cart passes the toll-collector?—With a different load.

2019. Are any compositions ever entered into by the owners of carts?—I believe those who go constantly into the City, make some contract with the toll-collector; they give 1*s.* a week, even that amounts to 52*s.* a year, which is a tax of some importance in addition to the other duties which they have to pay.

2020. The power of compounding is entirely arbitrary probably with the toll-collector, he may do it or not, as he likes?—It only rests with the collector.

2021. He may demand a toll each time if he pleases?—He may.

2022. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—No.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

Francis Bennoch, Esq., was further examined as follows.

2023. When you were last examined you were about to go into considerations with reference to the financial accounts of the corporation?—I was.

2024. Will you have the goodness to do so now?—Before going into those considerations, probably it might be as well if I were to state two or three matters which may clear the way for them, and perhaps be an important addition to some things I stated before in connexion with similar matters. I was about to refer in the first place to the Court of Aldermen. So far as their conduct has come under my observation as magistrates, I have no hesitation in declaring that they have discharged their duties to the utmost of their abilities, and they have generally performed their magisterial functions with great punctuality and considerable advantage to the citizens of London. Whether they shall continue as magistrates is another matter. I have a strong opinion that they ought not. If we are to have the aldermen continued, it would be better for them, as men of business and for the community, that we should have at each of the police courts of the City, a stipendiary magistrate who should be there at all times when the public required their services, and that the aldermen should not be called upon to leave their various vocations to attend to such duties. The great objection I have to the Court of Aldermen, as at present constituted, is this, they have the control of the City purse as much as the general corporation in common council assembled. They can by themselves vote any sum of money for any purpose they think advisable.

2025. Have they that control in the same unlimited manner as the common council have?—Doubtless to the same unlimited extent.

2026. Are they obliged to give an account to the common council, or to obtain their sanction for what they have done?—They are perfectly independent of the Court of Common Council. As an instance of that, I may refer to the present Lord Mayor, who performed a certain work which was esteemed by his brother aldermen of value to the City: they having overlooked a claim they had upon the county of Middlesex, of some 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* a year, in connexion with the administration of justice at the Central Criminal Court, he discovered that the metropolitan county was liable for a certain proportion, and in consequence of his recovering that sum, his brother aldermen thought some compliment was due to him, and they of their own accord caused his portrait to be painted, and a vote of thanks to be emblazoned at an expense of some 300*l.* or 400*l.*

F. Bennoch, Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

Then, it will be seen by and bye, they have the right of pensioning the widows or orphans or relations of deceased aldermen.

2027. Has the common council the same power?—They would doubtless have the same power, but I think in that respect they would have more discretion.

2028. You mean they would be less likely to give pensions than the Court of Aldermen?—I think they would do it in another way. In consequence of the number of offices which fall to the lot of the common council, the chances are, that they would elect some of the friends of deceased common councilmen to occupy those positions. That is shown by the names of the persons who now perform those functions in connexion with the various offices of the corporation.

2029. You mean, having such patronage, it would not be necessary for them, when they wished to pay a compliment to any one, to vote him a sum of money, but they would give him an office?—I think so. So general has the tendency become to elect relations of members of the common council to offices of that kind, that last year the sons of three members of the common council became candidates for one office. The more independent part of the common council considered this to be offensive and unwise, and they moved and passed a resolution, which is now one of the byelaws of the court, that the son of a common councilman shall not be eligible to be elected, so long as his father continues in the corporation. There are several committees of the common council, of which it would be impossible to speak too highly. I believe that the property of the City, so far as its rents are concerned, is exceedingly well attended to, and I believe there are no better landlords on the face of the earth; while they get the legitimate value for the property, I believe they are also kind and considerate to those who may be unable to meet their demands on any particular occasion. They scarcely ever pursue them with acrimony, or in any way calculated to injure them, but they seek rather to do them good.

2030. Does their property consist much in possessions within the City?—To a considerable extent. There is a table, which I shall presently place before the Commissioners, in which are shown the items of revenue. You will find they are lumped together, and there is great difficulty in separating them; it can only be done thoroughly, by calling upon the comptroller of the City lands to give evidence before the Commission.

2031. You are probably better acquainted with the character of the corporation as landlords in the City than in their outlying estates. How do you believe them to manage their City estates?—There is no doubt that the management of their outlying estates is conducted with consideration, equally to that which is shown to tenants in the City.

2032. Do you know personally how they manage their City estates?—I belong to the City land's committee. Before a lease lapses, notice is given that the lease will lapse within a certain time, and if then the occupier desires to continue, he must give notice to the committee within a certain time. It is probable that the lease may be in the hands of some one else, and notice will be given to him also.

2033. You say you think the estates of the City are liberally and kindly administered as relates to the tenants. Do you think they are sufficiently prudentially administered, as far as relates to the interest of the property itself?—I think they are.

2034. You think that a fair return is obtained from them?—I should say a very fair return. There can be no blame in that respect attached to the corporation.

2035. Do you believe the staff of agency and soforth, to be improperly large?—Preposterously. I speak of the property itself; in bringing the property or revenue into the chamber, it is legitimately managed, but so soon as the money is there, I believe there is an extravagant expense which ought not to be tolerated.

2036. The question refers to the agency which is used for the management of the property; of course, if that agency be unreasonably large, it will decrease the net receipts of the property. Do you think the agency is unreasonably large, and that in that manner the net receipts of the estates rendered less than they ought to be?—I think, so far as the management of the estates is concerned, the agency is not extravagant, but the money derived from them is so frittered away, by an undue expenditure in connexion with the corporation generally, that the effect is the same.

2037. How are the agents appointed, and who are they in general?—The agents are very few indeed. The comptroller of the City lands, who has a staff of clerks, invites all parties to come and apply to him. The property lies in the City, or contiguous to it, so that there is no difficulty in leaseholders applying at the comptroller's office.

2038. Is it the fact, that nearly all the City property is either near or in the City?—So far as I am aware, it is the case; there is some property of the City in Marylebone; some in connexion with Conduit Fields Estate on the left-hand side of Holborn; again in Finsbury, and two or three other parts of the metropolis.

2039. Is it, generally speaking, well conditioned property, which is easily managed?—I should say it is. Under the management of our present surveyor, who is exceedingly accurate and very careful, I believe every part of the property is well defined.

2040. Has your committee anything to do with the management of the property of the Irish Society?—Nothing whatever.

2041. Does any of that property belong to the City as a corporation?—It seems to be a doubtful matter whether it does or not. It is under the management of the corporation, and I may here say, that to the amount of expenditure which I put down the last time I was before the Commission, namely, 2,900*l.*, I ought to have added 600*l.* allowed to the Irish Society, which would have brought the allowances to 3,500*l.* There are other items, which swell the amount considerably. We shall find presently that many of those revenues never appear. What we must believe to be revenue connected with the corporation itself never appears in the corporation accounts. For instance, in the blue book published by the corporation we find no returns to the Irish Society in connexion with the chamberlain's office. We shall also find that a large amount of fees is received by various officers of the corporation in part payment of their salaries, for which they give an account to the corporation, but which never appear as receipts in this book. We shall also find a variety of discrepancies, amounting to thousands of pounds, which cannot be explained except by inference.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

2042. Are the payments made to the agents employed in managing the property deducted from the income before it is paid into the chamber, or is the money paid in a gross sum; and are all payments charged under the head of receipts?—There is a regular account kept between the comptroller and the chamberlain, which is published annually. He pays it in as he receives it. In the case of the Irish Society they employ an agency, but never having been a member of that society I am unable to speak to that precisely. I know that the amount never appears in the general account of the corporation. With respect to the sewers in the City, I believe that as far as the sewers in the City are concerned nothing can be better than the management of them by the Sewers Commission. For some years past nothing could be more clear than the character of their accounts, but that was in consequence of auditors being appointed who suggested improvements, and indeed would not sign the accounts unless certain improvements were carried out. The suggestion of the auditors was adopted, and a better system of accounts introduced, but I believe the report upon which this change was made was presented to the Court of Common Council, and referred to the Sewers Commission, with instructions, I believe, to report again to the common council. The report has never re-appeared; still it had the effect of changing the system of the accounts, and the parties who suggested the alteration have continued to be the auditors.

2043. Do you believe that the separate system of sewerage in the City, as distinguished from the rest of the metropolis, is productive of any evil or inconvenience?—I do not imagine that it is productive of any evil or inconvenience, further than by involving the necessity for applying to two bodies instead of one. Of course, also, there being two bodies, the expense must be greater than if there were but one. I believe in the City they would be always willing to meet the requirements of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers; but I think, considering the small area of the City, it would be better to have all the sewers of the metropolis under one management.

2044. Are you a member of the Commission of Sewers in the City?—I am.

2045. You probably, therefore, had frequent communications with the General Commission of Sewers?—There is a sub-committee appointed by the general body as a delegated body, who, together with the surveyor, attend the General Commission of Sewers when anything in connexion with the City is under their consideration.

2046. Does it appear to you that the joint action which is so important in those cases is practically and properly carried out?—I am not aware of anything to the contrary. At the same time I think it would be infinitely better to have them under one general head.

2047. You mean that the City should give up all separate jurisdiction over its own sewerage?—I think so.

2048. And that it should be merged in one General Commission of Sewers?—Yes; or such other body as might be deemed best, under a complete system of municipal government. With respect to the accounts which I am about to bring before the Commission, which I have gone into with a great deal of care, I am unable to see anything that would justify any charge of peculation or malversation in connexion with the members of the corporation. At the same time I am bound to declare that the extravagance, the multiplicity of officers, and the unnecessarily large salaries paid to them, bring out a total expenditure which is more condemnatory of the system than any words can possibly convey.

2049. Will you proceed to make the statement you allude to?—In the first place the gross income of the corporation is 213,572*l.* That sum is collected in this way: rents and quit-rents, 83,611*l.*; renewing fines, 12,800*l.*; markets, 20,598*l.*; tolls and duties, 6,941*l.*; offices, which is a curious term, and really means coal duties and corn metage, 73,169*l.*; bequests, 132*l.*; brokers' rents, 3,756*l.*; freedoms, 840*l.*; interest, 1,392*l.*; sheriffs' fines, 1,200*l.*; and casual revenues, 6,429*l.* The gross revenue is therefore 213,572*l.*

2050. Where do you take those figures from?—From the blue book, published by the City.

2051. Is that the income applicable to expenditure?—In certain ways it is. Then they have an income beyond that: from the navigation, of 8,377*l.*; from the consolidated sewers rate, 66,861*l.*; from the general sewers rate, 19,526*l.*; and from the bridge house estates, 47,021*l.*, bringing out a total of 355,357*l.* But this does not include the receipts from the Irish Society, because, not being a member of that society, I have no power to get at the particulars of their accounts, which I could have wished to have consolidated along with these; nor does it include the police rate, which is about 30,000*l.* more, there being 11,000*l.* expended upon the police out of the revenues of the City, as the proportion agreed to at the time when they obtained their independent Act. So I apprehend that the whole income of the corporation would come to very nearly 400,000*l.* in round numbers. The expenses of administration is a point to which I now desire to direct the attention of the Commission, because it is the point upon which the corporation must be condemned, if it be condemned at all. The general salaries allowed to the officers of the corporation amount to 38,672*l.*; legal salaries, 14,700*l.*; legal expenses, 4,600*l.*, I leave out the odd figures; pensions to relations of officials, 3,644*l.*; pensions to relations of aldermen, 580*l.*; parliamentary expenses, 1,467*l.*; committees' allowances, 2,900*l.*, to which, as I before said, must be added some other matters, which I think would bring it up to fully 4,000*l.* There are also some expenses connected with the keeping of the barge, and the expense of the barge-master; auditors receive 106*l.*; printing and stationery, 3,182*l.*; state coach and official clothing, 774*l.*; disbursements through the hall-keeper and to reimburse officers for petty expenditure, 4,067*l.* That is an item which requires some explanation. Advertisements, 142*l.* Then there are a variety of sundries, amounting in the gross to 14,688*l.*, and I think one half of that amount may be fairly taken and applied to the general expenses of administration, allowing the other half to go for the performance of works which either improve the corporation estate, or keep it in proper repair. Then we have discrepancies in the account of salaries, 10,061*l.*; and we have further discrepancies in the financial account in connexion with salaries, 13,187*l.*; and we have expenses of chamberlain's clubs, 2,372*l.*, bringing up the total amount of the expenses of administration to 107,874*l.*, to expend the balance of 255,000*l.* In addition to that, there are certain artificers enumerated, with names attached, 5,440*l.*; and then there are other artificers with no names attached, called sundry artificers (why the names are not attached, I cannot for the life of me comprehend), 4,160*l.* Then we have in connexion with the prisons: victualling, 2,561*l.*; soup, &c., 124*l.*; clothing, 543*l.*; coals, gas, &c., 2,313*l.* Then the public charities, of which I confess we have heard so much, that I thought we had expended much more, 1,147*l.* I find, on going into the detail of sundries to which I have referred, that they chiefly relate to self glorification. We find, "To Messrs. Onyon and Company, for cloth delivered to the "ministers of state and others, 133*l.*" It appears that the City is bound to send the ministers of state, in consequence of some particular charter, right, or privilege, granted to the City, so much cloth, either in the shape of gowns or wearing apparel. The amount paid under that head is 133*l.* annually. Then, here is an item for silk banners, 14*l.* Then, "To Benjamin Wyon for medal, commemorative of the opening of "the New Coal Exchange, 57*l.*" "To a Mrs. Dowse for writing, emblazoning, and "framing the resolutions of the Court of Aldermen to the President of the French and "the municipality of Paris, 26*l.*" That is one of the matters to which I would call your attention, as showing that the aldermen have an independent jurisdiction over the City purse, and that they can pass a complimentary resolution at any time, have it emblazoned, and spend upon it 30*l.* "To her also for writing, emblazoning, and framing "the vote of thanks of the Court of Aldermen to Thomas Sidney, Esq., alderman, "126*l.* 10*s.*" Then comes a singular item, "To the executors of William Rawlins, "serjeant of the channel, being the sum secured by a bond under the seal of the corpo- "ration, dated the 20th of March 1823, which sum was agreed to be paid to the said "William Rawlins in case he should surrender the said office during his lifetime, or to his "representatives at his decease, in consideration of his releasing to the corporation his "right of alienation of the said office, agreeably to the arrangement made by the cor- "poration in January 1823, 2,100*l.*" Then again, "To Mr. Higgins, the surveyor, "630*l.*;" "To Mr. Walker, the engineer, 52*l.*" I am perfectly safe, therefore, in taking one-half the amount I have stated as being expended in connexion with the civil administration of the affairs of the corporation. The Commissioners will observe that the book I hold in my hand I have had constructed in this manner: I have taken two or three of the blue books and I have cut out separately, item by item, and brought the whole of the items as nearly as I possibly could under their several heads, and from this book I gather the enumeration which I have just read, better than by going through the whole item by item. Here is the book (producing the same), with the whole of the accounts condensed, brought under their regular subjects, showing, at a glance, how the money, according to this return, is expended. If it will be of any advantage to the Commissioners, I will lay it before them. In connexion with this expenditure, as shown in their blue book, page 61, I find put down the sum of 19,625*l.* under the head of lodging houses for the labouring poor. Now, anybody looking at this account, would naturally believe that this money had been expended in the construction of lodging houses for the labouring poor. It is, however, merely a balance of the proceeds of a part of the Finsbury estate, which is an estate held in trust, and being held in trust they virtuously consider that they should not allow it to merge into the general funds of the corporation, but they set it aside for a specific purpose, which purpose, professedly, was that of building lodging houses for the labouring poor. The foundations of those houses, however, are not laid, though it appears here in the account of payments; but I suppose those houses will appear in due course of time. The coal tax here figures very conspicuously.

F. Bennoch Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

2052. Has the City expended anything in baths and wash-houses and matters of that description?—Not a penny further than by giving 50*l.* or 100*l.* now and then to such institutions as may have been established in the neighbourhood. There are no baths and wash-houses erected yet by the corporation of London. They intended, I believe, in connexion with the improvement of Farringdon Street, when they had built the houses for the labouring poor, to build baths and wash-houses; but the proposed scheme of a new central railway coming into that position, is, I think, a fair excuse for the delay of those works.

2054a. Proceed to the coal tax?—There seems to be a great misapprehension in the minds of some witnesses as regards the manner in which the coal tax is expended. The coal tax is 1*s.* 1*d.* per ton, of which the City receive, for the expenses of collection and other matters, 1*d.* They receive and appropriate to public improvements, under Act of Parliament, 4*d.*, and 8*d.* is handed over to the Government for the purpose of making general metropolitan improvements. Out of that fund New Oxford Street was constructed. Most of the improvements in and about the neighbourhood of Leicester Square, and the New Victoria Street in Westminster, were, I believe, entirely constructed out of the coal tax; and there is a sum of 90,000*l.* now lying to the account of the borough of Southwark, and about to be expended in the construction of a new street from the Town Hall to the Southwark Bridge Road. Beyond that there has been a great improvement made down in Spitalfields, in the construction of a new street from the docks up to Bishopsgate or Shoreditch. The cost of those various improvements has been paid out of the general coal tax. The corporation has a great many sins to answer for, but the mal-administration of the coal tax, much as I disapprove of that tax, I believe is not one. I believe it has been fairly expended for the purposes for which it was given.

2055. In disapproving of the coal tax, do you refer to the injurious effects of such a tax upon the community, or the manner in which the money derived from it has been applied?—The money has been well applied. The sin of the coal tax I believe to be its being levied at all.

2057. What part of that tax belongs to the City itself, and is applicable to purely City purposes?—4*d.* per ton.

2059. When will the authority under which that 4*d.* is levied expire?—I think in 1864.

2060. Till that period, are the proceeds of that tax so strictly tied up for purposes from which the City cannot divert it?—Yes. I believe it is altogether pledged to public bodies, who advanced the money by which the corporation have been able to effect certain public improvements.

2061. Is there any money derived from the coal tax which is now at the discretion of the City?—I am not sufficiently informed upon that matter as to be able to give a distinct answer; I think not.

2062. Do you know whether there is any amount of the tax upon coal which is now levied, granted in perpetuity?—I think not.

2063. You think it will wholly expire in the lapse of time, unless renewed by Act of Parliament?—I think it will wholly expire in the lapse of time, unless renewed by Act of Parliament; that is my firm impression and belief. I believe the general impression would be, that for all public improvements it is better to levy a rate over the whole metropolis, to be expended for the benefit of the whole metropolis.

2064. Do you think it would be advisable to anticipate the period at which the coal tax will expire, and substitute a general rate?—I think so.

2065. Have you any fear of the unpopularity which generally attaches to a direct tax of that description?—No. I think the sewers tax is borne with perfect contentment. It is felt that it is levied for the good of the individuals paying it, and that it ought to be paid without grumbling. The coal tax bears particularly hard upon certain trades: the sugar refiners, for instance, are almost entirely confined to the metropolis; it bears therefore very heavily upon them, in competition with foreigners who are able to obtain their coal duty free. I dare say the tax upon some of the sugar refiners may amount to 1,200*l.* or 1,500*l.* a year. I know that a friend of mine, who is engaged in the supply of gas, has contracted for coals to the amount of 50,000 tons a year; the tax, therefore, costs him 2,500*l.* a year.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

2066. Your opinion seems to be, that the purposes to which the coal tax is applied, are beneficial; that it is also equitable that the tax should extend over the whole area of the metropolis; but you object to the particular incidence of the tax, inasmuch as it raises the price of coal?—I object to any special tax which bears upon one commodity, and perhaps presses heavily upon one particular trade, and gradually—especially in the case of the tax on coal—presses at last heavier upon the poor man, who can very ill afford to pay it. There can be no doubt, in weather like this, there is no danger of having too much firing, whatever may be the inconvenience of the smoke.

2067. Will you proceed with any further statement you wish to make?—I have referred to certain discrepancies which it is right the Commissioners should understand. A return of the various sums received by all the officers of the corporation, and from all quarters, whether by distinct salary, or by fines, or fees, was called for about twelve months ago, and on the 28th of July it was made to the corporation, and laid before the common council. I find in this return there are certain officers who appear, according to their own statement, to receive 29,348*l.* According to the statement of this blue book, they only appear to receive 19,283*l.*; making a discrepancy between the two returns of upwards of 10,000*l.* For instance, in the case of Mr. Beddome, the mace bearer, he received 550*l.* according to his own showing, and according to the chamberlain's account he received 444*l.* Mr. Brand, the comptroller of the bridge house estates, appears by his own statement to receive 1,013*l.*, but in the chamberlain's account he only appears to receive 300*l.*

2068. Are the two accounts made up to the same time?—They are. The architect receives, according to the return, 2,500*l.*; but he is only put down in the account as receiving 2,275*l.* The chamberlain returns himself as receiving 2,500*l.*; in the chamberlain's own statement he figures to the amount of fifteen guineas. The judge of the Sheriffs' Court, who in one statement appears to receive 1,200*l.*, according to the other 489*l.* Thomas Saunders, the comptroller, according to the return receives 1,500*l.*, but only figures in the financial statement for 1,000*l.* This discrepancy, in my opinion, arises in this manner: all those gentlemen have attached to their own offices certain fees, which vary to a certain extent year by year, as in the case of the mace bearer. Those fees are received by themselves, and they receive the salary out of the chamber; but the fees swell up the salaries, as certified by their own return, far beyond the amount appearing in the chamberlain's accounts, and make the whole discrepancy amount to above 10,000*l.* I need hardly say, that in all corporations and in all public affairs such a manner of keeping accounts is not to be defended. Fees and revenues of all kinds ought undoubtedly to be paid into the common treasury, and all officers ought to be paid from the common general funds. Without such a system you are liable to have all sorts of irregularities, and perhaps there may be a certain inducement to do wrong; for I dare say, in some instances, the amounts remain unchecked. I find one of the officers returns himself as receiving 400*l.*, when according to the financial statement he receives 516*l.*; that I cannot explain. Another in that return receives 550*l.*, but according to the financial statement it is 580*l.* Whenever the excess is in the chamberlain's account, I cannot explain it; it is possible that some of those gentlemen may be able to do so. As I am speaking of the discrepancies between the chamberlain's account and the amount of salaries returned by the officers, perhaps it would be well to put in the return which was called for on the occasion of the late chamberlain being elected to his office. I gather from the reports that a good deal of misunderstanding and misrepresentation are abroad in connexion with the manner in which the chamberlain's office is conducted. The chamberlain receives from the corporation funds proper, no money; but those funds are invested in a variety of ways, from which they derive a certain amount of interest, and the chamberlain out of that interest pays himself and the whole expenses of his office. I need hardly say, that that again, in my judgment, as a merchant, is a loose way of keeping accounts. All those interests ought to come into the general fund, and the salaries of all men who are worth anything ought to be paid out in a straightforward business-like manner. It appears that the balance of that account lying in the hands of the banker a few months back, was 20,609*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* Perhaps I ought to explain that when I say the interest on the balance of money belonging to the corporation in the hands of their banker, after paying the chamberlain his own expenses and those of the office, now reaches 20,609*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, I mean that it did so at the election of the present chamberlain. The corporation committee who got up this return have bound the chamberlain down to expend upon his clerks 2,102*l.* 10*s.* They say, "With respect to the emoluments and allowances of the office of chamberlain "we are unanimously of opinion that the chamberlain should receive the payments from "the corporation received by his predecessor, the payments from the several public funds "as heretofore, together with the interest arising from the investment of balances. That "he should annually pay thereout the sum of 2,102*l.* 10*s.* as a fixed charge to cover his "clerks' salaries at their present amount, and the sum of 270*l.* for messenger, stationery, "and all other expenses of his office, receiving to his own use a sum not exceeding

" 2,500*l.* per annum. That in the event of the balance amounting to more than 2,500*l.*, " the surplus beyond that sum to be applied in relieving the charges of management of the " public funds in the chamber in equal proportions; and we recommend this honourable " court to give directions accordingly." Those directions have been given, so that the expense of his office is fixed at 2,372*l.* 10*s.* That is an exceedingly unwise resolution, because the chief clerk of the chamberlain within the last few days has resigned his office. In a printed letter which I received before I left my office this morning, he gives as the reason of his leaving, not that the chamberlain and himself have not agreed perfectly, but because certain members of the corporation have not worked so pleasantly with him as had been their custom heretofore. He states in that letter that a most corrupt motive is attributed to him as the reason for his leaving at the present moment. In his own defence, he prints and circulates this letter to show that it is not in consequence of any unpleasantness in his office, but simply in consequence of his being unable to work pleasantly with certain members of the corporate body; so that here an expenditure of 800*l.* a year falls into the chamberlain, and yet he is almost bound to appoint some one, and redistribute, in some way or other, the whole 2,372*l.* 10*s.*, when a considerable economical reduction might, in all probability, be made by an amalgamation of the offices.

2069. Do you believe it would not be necessary to appoint a successor to Mr. Scott?—Mr. Scott has been in the service of the corporation twenty or twenty-four years, and of course, with a gradual promotion or advance of salary, and it is very likely that a re-arrangement might be made of the offices, so as to save 500*l.* or 600*l.* a year. This return shows that the balance of interest of the public funds in the hands of the banker, carried forward year by year, after paying the salary of the chamberlain and the expenses of his office, is as follows:—In 1844, the balance was 713*l.*; in 1845, 41*l.*; in 1846, 895*l.*; in 1847, 1,146*l.*; in 1848, 2,117*l.*; in 1849, 3,063*l.*; in 1850, 2,892*l.*; in 1851, 3,333*l.*; in 1852, 5,360*l.*; bringing up a total balance of interest, after paying all the expenses to the amount I have just now named, of 20,609*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* I have been the more careful in stating this, because there seemed to be some apprehension in regard to the matter. The salaries of the offices, according to this return, which are in the appointment of the aldermen, amount to 9,986*l.*; in the appointment of the common council, 28,190*l.*; in the appointment of the Irish Society, 400*l.*; the committee of City lands, 858*l.*; the commissioners of sewers, 3,928*l.*; the navigation committee, 1,846*l.*; the finance committee, 300*l.*; the corn meters' committee, 350*l.*; the markets' committee, 614*l.*; the library committee, 300*l.*; the police committee, 787*l.*; the City school committee, 2,720*l.*; the Lord Mayor, 1,850*l.*; and the livery companies, 3,189*l.*; making together 55,318*l.* I may refer here to another list of discrepancies amounting to the large sum of 13,187*l.* Those discrepancies appear in the return made by the officers, but do not appear at all in the blue book. The result is that we have in connexion with the salaries 23,000*l.* expended, of which we know nothing, according to the accounts kept in the chamberlain's office. Some of this revenue is received under the management of certain committees, and by them paid to certain officers, who are under their superintendence, and elected by them. That is the case with the City school. The expense of a boy there averages about 10*l.* per annum for an education of the highest class. This sum is received by the City school, and I rather expect is kept in a sort of private account between the City school committee and the chamberlain in his office; because none of the payments appear in this return, and none of the receipts from the City school appear in this book. So I apprehend a private account is kept, out of which they pay the salaries of the various professors, masters, and teachers; and the balance is carried forward to the credit of the City school account. Here, therefore, are revenues making altogether the sum of 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.*, of which we know nothing in connexion with this system of book-keeping: a system for which the clerks are not responsible, as it was adopted by the common council on the recommendation of a committee appointed for the purpose, and any system more crude and intricate could hardly be conceived. Supposing no alteration were attempted in the corporation beyond that of remodelling the present corporation, I think the following reductions in legal salaries alone might be effected, without impairing the efficiency of any office.

2070. You refer to the salaries of officers employed in the administration of the law?—I refer chiefly to officers with fixed salaries; I do not refer merely to the legal salaries. The reduction I speak of will come out in the aggregate as much as 12,000*l.* The recorder receives now 3,000*l.*; the common serjeant 1,500; the judge of the Sheriffs' Court 1,200*l.*; but as the duties of those officers must either be performed by those gentlemen who now perform them, and who are not overpaid, or by a judge or judges appointed by the Crown, I do not see that any reduction could be made in the salaries. We have then the town clerk with 1,892*l.*, and a secretary with 1,249*l.* That is an office which was purchased a long time ago, and which the gentleman at present continues to enjoy. The remembrancer receives 1,765*l.* Now, I have never been able to understand the duty of that officer unless it is to appear for an hour or two under the gallery of the House of Commons, and take notice of what occurs in connexion with the corporation, which, if he had not noticed at all, it would often have been much better for the community.

2071. What are the duties of the remembrancer during the recess?—He arranges all the ostentation, and settles questions of precedency in connexion with the Lord Mayor's dinner.

22d Nov. 1853.

2072. He is a solicitor, is not he?—I believe he is.

2073. Has he any private practice?—I think not.

2074. You think he is not allowed to practice?—I think he is not, but his brother, who is solicitor to the City sewers, is permitted to have private practice. Those three offices of town clerk, secretary, and remembrancer I would throw into one office. The town clerk would be well remunerated with a salary of 1,250*l.*, and if he requires clerks to superintend the other two offices, I apprehend there would be no difficulty in getting thoroughly competent clerks for 300*l.* a year. Allowing him three clerks, that would amount to 900*l.* a year. The whole expenses, therefore, would be 2,150*l.* instead of 4,906*l.* In the same way I would proceed with the solicitor: he receives 2,366*l.*; the comptroller, who is a solicitor, and merely a conveyancer, whose duties are by no means arduous, nor require a man of great genius to perform, receives 1,500*l.*; and the comptroller of the bridge house estates, an analagous office (the only difference being that one belongs to the City lands and the other is under trustee of the bridge house estates), receives 1,013*l.* For some time the duties of the bridge house comptroller and solicitor were combined in the same office, and no inconvenience was experienced.

2075. Was the double salary maintained?—I believe not. The opinion is that those three gentlemen receive 4,879*l.* for the performance of duties which one solicitor with a salary of 1,250*l.*, and three clerks to attend to the various conveyancing and other duties in his absence, would perform for an aggregate sum of 2,150*l.* We then have the high bailiff of Southwark, and the common pleaders, receiving together 1,036*l.*; those offices I would abolish altogether, because they are of no use to the corporation; and as the duties of high bailiff in connexion with Southwark, the inhabitants of which are very anxious to get rid of the City jurisdiction, would no longer require to be performed, the office might easily be abolished. Then the clerk of the peace receives 349*l.*, and the coroner 482*l.* I would unite the offices of clerk of the peace and the coroner together, with a salary of 500*l.* a year.

2078. You think, though they would have no legal claim to compensation, they would have a fair equitable claim?—Yes; an equitable claim, decidedly. I should be very sorry that any contrary opinion should be entertained.

showing the area covered, are as follow:—in London, 14,580; in Liverpool, 54,310; in Manchester, 53,204; in Edinburgh, 7,786; in Glasgow, 11,965. The small number of houses in Edinburgh and Glasgow, in proportion to the population, is explained in this way: that even very genteel people live in houses arranged on what they call the flat system; they have one house built very high, each family occupy a floor with nine or ten rooms, going up a common stair; therefore, with 11,000 houses you may perhaps have 50,000 families. I requested the gentlemen to whom I have referred to put me in possession of, or procure for me, the last published accounts of the receipts and expenditure of those various corporations, believing that by so doing I should be able to bring forward the best possible proof that my idea, or, I may say, my fear, was a correct one as regards the extravagance of the system pursued in London. I have taken certain analogous and important offices in the several corporations, and compared them. They stand thus: the architect and surveyor of the City of London, for example, receives 2,500*l.* In addition to him, however, we have a surveyor of sewers, who receives 1,200*l.* a year. The surveyor at Liverpool receives 1,000*l.* a year; at Manchester, 700*l.* a year; at Edinburgh, 300*l.* a year. There appears to be no item of this kind in the Glasgow accounts; but I believe they have a river trust, superintended by a very important body, and that account I have been unable to get. We have a bridge house comptroller, with 1,013*l.*; they have nothing of the sort in either of the other towns. We have a chamberlain, with a salary of 2,500*l.*; in Liverpool they give him 700*l.*; in Manchester, 500*l.*; in Edinburgh, 470*l.*; in Glasgow, 400*l.* That officer there appears under the general name of treasurer. I find we have a clerk of the chamber, with a salary of 378*l.*; they have none. A clerk of the peace, who receives 349*l.*; there is no such officer in Liverpool. In Manchester there is one, with 450*l.*; in Edinburgh one, with 150*l.*; and in Glasgow none.

2080. The clerk of the peace is an officer of the county, is he not?—I think he is.

2081. Liverpool, therefore, not being a county, would not have a clerk of the peace?—There is one at Manchester. The emoluments of the clerk to the magistrates in London amount to 1,805*l.*; in Liverpool the stipendiary magistrate receives 1,000*l.*, and in Manchester 1,000*l.* The comptroller here receives 1,500*l.* I need hardly say that in the other towns the town clerk, being a solicitor, conducts nearly the whole of their business. I need not go through the whole of these details; here is, however, one other instance. The Lord Mayor receives, on an average, 8,000*l.* a year; in Liverpool, which is considered next to London the most extravagant corporation in the kingdom, the mayor receives 2,000*l.* a year; in Manchester he receives nothing; in Edinburgh the lord provost receives only 514*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* The mace bearer in London receives 550*l.*; in Liverpool he receives 20*l.*; in Manchester, I suppose they have not yet got a mace; but in Edinburgh he receives ten guineas. The recorder here, having of course heavier duties to perform than any other recorder in the kingdom, receives very properly 3,000*l.*; in Liverpool he receives 675*l.*; in Manchester, 800*l.* Here we have a remembrancer, one of those ridiculous officers whom we keep up with a salary of 1,765*l.* None of the other cities or boroughs I have named have any such officer, nor have they a secondary, nor a solicitor as such. The sword bearer here receives 550*l.*; in Liverpool only 40*l.*; there is none in Manchester; in Edinburgh he receives ten guineas, and in Glasgow they have none. The town clerk here receives 1,892*l.*; in Liverpool he receives 2,125*l.*, but then he combines in himself the office, no doubt, of remembrancer, secondary, and solicitor, and all others of the kind, which, in the aggregate, with us cost 10,000*l.*; in Manchester he receives 1,500*l.*; they have no such officer in Edinburgh; in Glasgow he receives 360*l.* Now come the upper marshalman and the under marshalman: they receive in London 795*l.*, with a variety of other matters and some extra fees, which bring the amount up to nearly 1,000*l.* The water bailiff receives in London 500*l.*; in Liverpool, where the duties must be equally great, he receives 200*l.*; and they have no water bailiff, of course, in Manchester, nor in Edinburgh or Glasgow. I think it would be very desirable to have some leading gentlemen from each of those cities to give something like an accurate idea of the expenditure in connexion with the administration of their various corporate affairs, and I believe their testimony would accurately prove every item I have now stated.

2082. Are not both the income and the expenditure of the corporation of London much larger than that of any of those boroughs?—In some cases the income is much more than it is in London. I find, taking the aggregate of the particular salaries of those analogous officers in those several towns, that in London we pay 31,787*l.*; in Liverpool, they pay 9,865*l.*; in Manchester, 5,774*l.*; in Edinburgh, 1,789*l.*; in Glasgow, 1,075*l.* I have no return of the cost of the chamberlain's office in London; but from other sources, I find the total expenditure of his office in 1852 was 4,872*l.* 10*s.*; in Liverpool, it is 1,113*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*; in Manchester, it is 670*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*; in Edinburgh, 665*l.*; and in Glasgow, 583*l.* The office of surveyor, in London, costs 3,700*l.*; in Liverpool, with a similar water frontage, 1,717*l.*; In Manchester, 889*l.*; and in Edinburgh, 339*l.* The office of town clerk, in London, costs 3,830*l.*; in Liverpool, 1,503*l.*; in Manchester, 1,825*l.*; in Edinburgh, 581*l.*; and in Glasgow, 360*l.* The total of these departments being, for London, 7,530*l.*; for Liverpool, 4,334*l.*; for Manchester, 3,386*l.*; for Edinburgh, 1,585*l.*; and for Glasgow, 943*l.* Now I hold that the population and area should form an important element of comparison in all these matters. I find, taking the population of London, in proportion to the population and expenditure of Liverpool, the expenditure of London, instead of being 31,783*l.*, should only be 3,354*l.*, or a little more than one-tenth of its present amount. Taking the population and the expenditure of Manchester, London should only expend 2,335*l.* Taking the population and the expenditure of Edinburgh, it should only spend 1,428*l.*; and, in comparison with Glasgow, only 418*l.* The Commissioners are no doubt aware that the aggregate expenditure of above 100,000*l.* by the corporation of London, in connexion with its offices, is very much larger than the whole expense of the civil government of the United States.

22d Nov. 1853.

2083. You mean of the federal government?—The federal government; and what is, perhaps, still more startling, the expenditure of the corporation on itself, in administering the funds it possesses, is larger than the whole amount of its revenue from rents, tolls, and fees from brokers,—three great items of its income. I thought it unwise and perhaps unnecessary to carry this comparison throughout the whole of the places I have named; but I thought it would be well to take one of them, and I have selected Manchester. I must say that the accounts kept by the Manchester corporation might be taken as a model of accounts for every corporation in the kingdom. They are comprised in a small pamphlet, every item being separated, and every item explained.

2084. Has Manchester the same sort of property which the corporation of London has; has it estates and property of that description?—I think not.

2085. Liverpool resembles London more nearly in that particular, does not it?—It does.

2086. Therefore it would be a fairer subject of comparison?—I have taken the expense of certain offices in London, and the aggregate expense of analogous offices in connexion with Liverpool: in Liverpool, it is 9,865*l.*; while in London, it is 31,787*l.*; so that if Liverpool can be managed, as regards those higher offices, for one-third the amount which is expended in London, it follows, that instead of saving 50,000*l.* a year, we might save 75,000*l.*, or 80,000*l.* a year. But I wish to be under the mark, and I am sure that a saving on the present foundation of the corporation might be effected—without doing any harm to the efficiency of the offices, or injuring the administration of the affairs of the City,—of at least 50,000*l.* I find that in Manchester the corporation proper expend 103,371*l.*; on what they call manorial rights, which I apprehend must be estates or markets, 12,720*l.*; construction of water works, 126,736*l.*; pipe laying, 9,307*l.*; revenue less interest, 19,730*l.*; general account, 52,627*l.*; paving account, 11,000*l.*; gas, 106,354*l.*; improvements, 30,758*l.*; and highways, 12,679*l.*, making a gross expenditure under the corporation of Manchester, 485,282*l.* The salaries and expenses of administering those funds amount only to 8,849*l.* The question was asked me just now: Is there any strict analogy between Manchester and London? So far as the analogy goes, I think it is against Manchester, and in favour of London, because we observe that they undertake the management of some very important works, which our municipality has nothing to do with, namely, the water works and the gas. They expend upon those two items annually, 233,000*l.*; and yet the whole is managed, as regards the salaries of the officers and the expenses of the office, with an expenditure of under 10,000*l.*

2088. Has the subject of salaries ever been brought before the Court of Common Council?—I am afraid in an old corporation like that of London, it has not been brought forward so frequently as it ought to have been, but it has come before them continually when an old office has fallen through, and a new officer was about to be appointed. In that case they have generally referred it to a committee to inquire into the emoluments of the office, and ascertain whether any reduction could be effected. I think in the majority of cases the emolument has been considered to be pretty near the mark, and has passed as an office which should not be disturbed, and the officer ought to be paid to that extent.

2089. An opportunity of that kind was afforded by the recent vacancy in the chamberlain's office?—Yes.

2090. Was there any disposition to revise the chamberlain's establishment?—It was referred to a committee, and the report which I have placed before the Commission contains the opinion of the committee. That report, having been presented to the Court of Common Council and received by them, may be considered as their opinion.

2091. What was the recommendation of that report?—That the office should continue exactly as it had been in every respect.

2092. Did the common council generally appear to assent to that report?—I think they did as a body.

2093. Was there any discussion about it?—I am not aware that there was; there was a long discussion when the office fell in, and a strong opinion on the part of a large number that they ought to reduce the salary of the chamberlain by at least 1,000*l.* a year. I believe several gentlemen in connexion with the corporation were somewhat disappointed that the committee did not advise a reduction, but it was remembered that one of the gentlemen who was a candidate had served the corporation, as they believed, as a magistrate for a considerable time, and that an office of that kind having fallen in, he was a very proper man to be elected.

2096. You stated just now that the Court of Common Council and the Court of Aldermen had each a separate, but absolute power, over the public purse?—The late chamberlain acted upon this recommendation of the Court of Common Council, but there is no doubt whatever that it was more for the purpose of carrying out a very generally expressed wish, not only on the part of the whole common council, but of a considerable number of aldermen themselves, that the chamberlain acted firmly in the matter.

2097. Do you know what the legal right is; you stated before that the Court of Aldermen could by a mere vote authorise the expenditure of a sum of money without communicating with the common council at all?—Undoubtedly some report of that kind might come up, and an order might be made and the money paid, before the Court of Common Council were at all aware of any such order or such expenditure.

2098. Do you mean that the Court of Common Council have the power of controlling any such expenditure by the aldermen by a general resolution if they think fit to exercise it?—It is a point I cannot answer. Some legal officers of the corporation consider that they can, and some that they cannot; but these things have got so much into a certain course of practice by custom, and the custom being that the aldermen can do as they like, they have to a large extent done as they liked.

2099. But you have just quoted an instance, in which the Court of Common Council did restrain the aldermen from authorizing certain expenditure?—I only remember in eight years one instance in which that has been done.

2100. I will read a passage to you from the first Report of the Commission on Municipal Corporations in 1835, which contains the character of the common council of the City of London at that time. They state, "The common council of the City of London presents "a striking exception to the system of self election for life, and it affords a remarkable "instance of the absence of those evils which we refer to it. The common councilmen "of this City are annually elected by a numerous constituency, yet changes seldom happen "among them. The important requisites of experience in the functionary, and the power "of control in the electors, are there effectually united, and produce that efficiency and "confidence which are wanting in most other corporate towns. The history of the "common council of London is that of a body which has watched vigilantly over the "interests of its constituents, and for a long series years has studied to improve the "corporate institutions with great earnestness, unremitting caution, and scrupulous "justice." Does that appear to you to contain a true character of the common council of London since the year 1835?—I do not know what it was then exactly. If it was true then, they must have become sadly degenerate since; for during the time I have had anything to do with it, that paragraph is as far from what is my opinion as truth is from falsehood. I hold that in doing justice to the constituents you ought to take care and watch carefully over the expenditure of the money, which in fact belongs to them; because I believe no charter has ever been granted without expressing the fact that the benefits arising from it are to be to the Court of Aldermen, the common council, and the commonalty of London; by the commonalty meaning, I apprehend, the constituency as well as those who represent them. Therefore to permit any extravagant expenditure of any kind, appears to me to be a neglect of duty. I was about to state that it not unfrequently happens that in cases of an emergency in any particular department, if an extra officer is required, he is in all probability appointed; he becomes then one of the staff of the corporation, and there seems to be great reluctance either to disturb the officer or destroy the office. The consequence is, that several of those offices have become almost sinecures. Then perhaps in another department an emergency arises, and another officer is appointed, and so they go on till we find a staff of 150 offices and officers in connexion with the corporation of London, when one-tenth of the number would be quite sufficient for the purpose of administering its affairs. Then there is a certain amount of patronage in connexion with the election of those officers. The authorities appointing them do not always inquire perhaps sufficiently into the necessity for the offices themselves; and thus the number in the course of 400 or 500 years has been a growing evil, till it has become an evil of very large proportions; the offices have been retained, and on a vacancy occurring another officer is appointed. This I think arises from the changeable character of the Court itself. After a man has been in it four or five years, and perhaps has felt the difficulties of fighting against the prejudices which exist there, he retires. Entering the corporation full of enthusiasm, determined to do some good, he finds he might as well be like St. John howling in the wilderness; that it is impossible for him to produce an impression, and he leaves the corporation in disgust,—the other members rejoicing that they have got rid of a troublesome fellow.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

2101. You think that the multiplication of offices has been partly owing to a want of system in the corporate administration?—To a large extent.

2102. It has not been for the sake of multiplying paid officers, and giving salaries to persons whom they are desirous of benefiting, but it has been caused by the accidental way in which one office has been accumulated upon another?—That is entirely my opinion, and in a state of things which has been the growth of four or five hundred years, it is a matter which perhaps is to be expected. Unfortunately some of those customs which have been handed down to us are still retained, to the disgrace of the corporation. The election of sheriffs, for instance, is one of the most analogous proceedings imaginable.

2103. Do you think the hospitality of the corporation is generally popular in the City?—If one might judge from the avidity with which people receive invitations, the anxiety expressed and trouble taken to obtain admission, and the innumerable applications made by distinguished people from all parts of London to those gentlemen who may happen to be on the committee for conducting the great entertainment, one would think it was not only exceedingly popular, but that the report of the destruction of it would excite a sensation throughout Europe, and would produce, as was stated the other day, a national crisis. But I need hardly say that that arises, probably, from the fact that people are anxious to see what has been so much talked about, and then, to my certain knowledge, leave it to laugh at it.

2104. What is the opinion in the City, on the subject of the Lord Mayor's show?—I believe it is a feeling of universal contempt. In consequence of the death of the Duke of Wellington last year there was no parade, but only a quiet dinner, and I believe that the citizens felt that, in consequence of that breach, there was this year an opportunity to depart from the ordinary routine, and abolish for ever the ridiculous parade. Unfortunately, however, they came out with a more foolish exhibition than ever, aided by Cook's circus; they have become liable to theatrical criticism, and it was received with that contempt and laughter it so well deserved. When you recollect that the transactions of the City of London are not counted by tens or thousands, but by millions in the course of a day, and how desirous people must be to get from one point to another,—to have the whole of the thoroughfares blocked up for this ridiculous parade, is perfectly absurd. The whole of the mercantile interests of the City are interested, and they consider the whole thing as a gewgaw show, introduced for the special benefit of nursery maids, children, and idle people and pickpockets.

2105. You do not think that there is a feeling in favour of it on the part of any class?—I do not.

2106. Who pays the expenses of that gewgaw show, as you have called it?—The Lord Mayor out of his income personally one half, and the sheriffs, most unjustly, are each called upon to pay a quarter. Then after they have invited the whole of the parties who feel they have a right to be invited, and that is one of the important duties of the remembrancer, to lay a list before the Lord Mayor and sheriffs of the noblemen and gentlemen who, either by office or by custom, have been in the habit of assembling at the Guildhall,—when they are accommodated, and all the members of the corporation are accommodated with seats for themselves, and their wives and daughters, there are certain spare seats in various places, and the committee of entertainment are enabled literally to give to the Lord Mayor cards to the number of about 100 or 120; each of the sheriffs receives for his private friends cards for fifty or sixty, so that the dinner card which the Lord Mayor and sheriffs give to each of their friends costs them in fact from 10*l.* to 12*l.*

2107. In fact the Lord Mayor and sheriffs have very little choice of their own, as to the persons who are invited?—I apprehend that nearly nine-tenths of those who are there are persons over whom they have no control, they being invited by custom. That is one of the gross injustices perpetuated upon merchants in the City of London who are called on to serve the office of sheriff. They are elected without their consent and against their will; if they do not serve they are fined, and if they serve they are fined still more, being obliged to expend some 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.*, and go through a number of unnecessary scenes which they themselves in their private condition would naturally shrink from.

" of those entertainments ;" and, therefore, the Lord Mayor, in the present year, has had to add three eighths to his expenditure, and the sheriff about two thirds; in other words, I think they divided it into sixteenths, and the Lord Mayor paid eleven sixteenths, as I understand, and the sheriff five sixteenths ; so that the present sheriff will probably pay about 900*l.* for the entertainment instead of 500*l.* or 600*l.* as usual ; and the Lord Mayor will pay from 1,400*l.* to 1,600*l.*, instead of 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* Several of the members of the common council have tried to make an impression upon the Court as to the importance of their standing between the merchants of the City and the unprincipled men who are haunting the purlieus of Guildhall for the purpose of catching a man who may be frightened or seduced into the office of sheriff. As soon as a name of a likely man to serve is whispered, one of those ubiquitous persons makes his appearance in the counting-house of the gentlemen so named, and congratulates him on his being likely to be nominated to the office of sheriff. Of course he is terror struck ; but the trader in corruption urges, " If you leave it to me I can prevent it for a consideration." The person appealed to perhaps replies, " I will not give you a farthing." The applicant rejoins, " Then, if " you do not give me a consideration, you shall be elected, and then you must pay a still " greater consideration."

2109. Suppose the party listens to this proposition, what happens then ?—This ubiquitous personage knows where his lieutenants are. He calls them together, and they go into the various slums of the metropolis along the shore, and into all the dark corners, and gather up a number of men who rejoice in the name and privileges of liverymen, and crowd the hall with them ; they vote as he signals, the thing is a settled matter, and a common hall election a complete farce.

2110. When he is proposed they negative the election ?—Yes, and somebody else may be elected instead. A gentleman came before the Court of Common Council, and producing a certificate from his medical man, showed that from some disease with which he was afflicted, and to abate which an operation or two had been performed, any excitement such as would arise from his going through the duties of the office would be dangerous. On the proposition of a member of the common council the Court excused him from paying the fine. I was in hopes that on that occasion, when they clearly saw that gentlemen were elected against their will by these conspirators against men's peace, the members of the common council who had the power in their own hands, would have taken the position of declaring that no gentleman should be elected to serve the office against his will ; and that no fine, whatever might be the purpose to which it was appropriated, should be taken from his pocket.

2111. Who are the members of the common council who have the power to exact or remit a fine ?—The general body by a vote.

2112. Where a fine is levied is it put to the vote, or is the fine levied as a matter of course, and does it require an express vote to remit it ?—It is put to the vote whether a party shall be excused the fine.

2113. Is that question put in every case ?—No ; some gentlemen do not apply for it.

2115. Have the common council power to excuse the fine in the case of the man who refuses to take upon himself the office of sheriff without assigning any reason ?—Yes ; but unless the person can show some sufficient reason for being excused, inasmuch as the fine goes to maintain a school for orphan children, they think it is rather a good thing than otherwise, perhaps. Of course I do not agree with the principle that you should do an injury that good may come ; otherwise, you might pick a pocket for the purpose of giving it in charity.

2116. Have all the aldermen served the office of sheriff ?—Not all ; there are two who have not.

2117. Is not it generally understood that the aldermen must pass through the office of sheriff at some time ?—Yes, before they are Lord Mayor ; invariably and generally when there is any difficulty in regard to a sheriff, if there is an alderman in the list who has not served the office of sheriff, they fall back upon him, and he must serve as a matter of course. That was the case last year, when Alderman Carter was called upon to serve ; it was believed that it was done by some irregularity or some understanding between another alderman and the voters in the hall. When the senior alderman was proposed, there were loud hisses and cries of " No ;" and when Alderman Carter, whose turn it was not to serve the office, was proposed, he was elected, which was understood to be rather unfair.

2118. Will you pass to the next point on which you wish to address any observations to the Commissioners ?—Unless there is any question arising out of the accounts which I have gone into, thus far I believe I have finished with them.

22d Nov. 1853.

satisfactory which is not general; that a general system for the municipal government of the whole of the metropolis is required. I have hitherto hinted at certain things which may be done by the corporation as it now stands with regard to the reduction of the expenditure, provided it should be maintained or only remodelled upon its present basis.

2120. Will you have the goodness to give the Commissioners the outline of the scheme you propose to substitute for the present system?—For the sake of clearness I have put down on paper the outlines of the scheme which I would recommend, and with the permission of the Commissioners I will read them.—(The witness read the same, as follows) :—

SCHEME.

1. That the representative system be maintained in its full integrity.
2. That the metropolis be divided into nine municipalities.
3. That each municipality be divided into wards.
4. That each ward have one alderman and six councillors.

Taking the City of London as an example, which contains—

	Houses.	Males.	Females.	Total Persons.
Within the walls	7,174	26,550	28,152	54,702
Without the walls, including :— Inner Temple, Middle Temple, Barnard's Inn, Serjeants' Inn, Clifford's Inn, Thavies Inn, Part of Furnival's Inn.	7,406	36,147	37,020	75,167
	14,580	62,697	65,172	127,869

The number of persons rated at and above 10*l.* is 16,761, which, when divided into twelve wards, gives an average constituency of nearly 1,400 to each ward; these would return twelve aldermen and seventy-two councillors, in all eighty-four representatives. Although about 130,000 appears to be the number of inhabitants who reside in the City of London, it is estimated that during the day at least 250,000 more pursue their avocations within its limits; it is therefore clear that the larger portion of its population is contributed by the surrounding districts, thus it differs from all others, and cannot in this respect be taken as an example. In this scheme 300,000 is taken as the average of the City.

5. The municipalities into which it is proposed to divide the metropolis are :—

1. City proper.
2. Tower Hamlets.
3. Finsbury.
4. Marylebone.
5. Westminster.
6. Kensington.
7. Lambeth.
8. Southwark.
9. Greenwich and Deptford.

6. Each municipality to have twelve wards, twelve aldermen, and seventy-two councillors, as proposed for the City proper.

7. All councillors to be elected on the same day; one-third to retire annually, but qualified for re-election.

8. All aldermen to be elected on the same day; one-third to retire triennially, but qualified for re-election.

9. That the aldermen and councillors be elected by the registered ratepayers.

10. That the mayor be elected annually by the aldermen and councillors, and have an allowance of 500*l.* per annum.

11. That each municipality appoint four aldermen and twelve councillors, to form a central committee, which would then consist of 144 members, viz., thirty-six aldermen and 108 councillors.

12. That each municipality in rotation have the right of nominating the Lord Mayor, and that he be elected by the whole constituency of his municipality, but not necessarily from the body of aldermen.

13. That the Lord Mayor preside at all meetings of the central council, and reside at the Mansion House, with an allowance of 5,000*l.* per annum.

14. That each municipality in rotation have the right of nominating the sheriff of London; that he be elected by the whole constituency of his municipality, have an allowance of 1,000*l.* per annum, and be ex-officio a member of the central council.

15. That the sheriff of Middlesex be nominated by the Crown, the two sheriffs to have the care of prisoners, &c., as at present.

16. That should any municipality decline to nominate or elect the Lord Mayor or sheriff, the right shall fall to the next municipality in rotation on the list, such list to be determined in the first instance by lot.

17. That the central council have the general management of all lighting and police, water and sewers, river and bridges, improvements and streets, finance, rates and rents, general purposes, education and charities, under the immediate superintendence of committees which might bear names analogous to the duties to be performed.

18. That each municipality carry out the various works to be executed within its own limits, which may have received the sanction of the central council.

19. That for the more perfect sanatory condition of the metropolis, the whole district of London within a radius of ten miles from St. Paul's be surveyed, and no streets be laid out or houses built unless approved by the central council, and certified by the surveyor as capable of being thoroughly drained.

20. That the construction of all bridges or steam ferries across the Thames be under the control of the river and bridge committee of the central council, and paid for by a general rate; all bridges to be free, but on all ferries a toll to be charged just sufficient to defray expenses and ensure their proper maintenance.

21. That all persons occupying premises and paying rates have the right of voting, and none other.

22. That the expenses of the local council or municipality be raised by a rate levied on the inhabitants of its own district.

23. That the expenses of the central council, and the cost of all works of a general nature executed through it, be met by a general rate, levied on the inhabitants of all the municipalities.

24. That the Central Criminal Court be under the management of the aldermen of the central council (who shall be magistrates), and the expenses borne by a rate on the whole metropolis.

25. That after the general act of incorporation, all commissioners exercising the functions of commissioners of improvements, sewers, &c., be abolished, and the works placed in the hands of the central council.

26. That the Mansion House, Guildhall, and such premises as might be required by the central council, be valued and paid for by the united municipalities.

27. That all funds left in trust to the City of London be held sacred to the purposes for which they were so left. That all charities be consolidated and administered by one committee. That all property left by individuals, or arising from property granted by charter for services rendered, or money paid, in times gone by, so soon as the obligations are cancelled for which they have been mortgaged, be appropriated to improvements within the City. In like manner, the bridge house estates when relieved of their present burdens be devoted to the purpose of maintaining the old, and building new bridges over the Thames, thus fulfilling the original intention, and observing the corporate right of property as jealously as the property granted to private individuals for similar services rendered in times of national peril. Under such a system,—a system calculated to benefit the entire community of the metropolis, from the squares of Belgravia to the docks at Limehouse, embracing the whole valley of the Thames and the Thames itself,—we may fairly conclude that the nobleman taking any interest in his neighbourhood, and the merchant desirous of extending the commerce and trade of London, would willingly and cordially associate to carry out an enlightened system of independent municipal government, which could only be secured by the highest intelligences heartily co-operating. With such a corporation, far removed from paltry bickerings and petty jealousies, we might, in a few years, have the Thames embanked from Putney to Blackwall, its waters purified, new streets opened, bridges constructed, sewers perfected, and the whole metropolis exhibiting a striking contrast to its present aspect under conflicting jurisdictions.

While the establishment of a central authority is advocated in the foregoing scheme, it is centralization springing out of, and controlled by, the principle of representation, and not that dreaded system of centralization, the tool of individual will or arbitrary power.

Offices of new municipalities need only be :—

Town clerk (a solicitor)	£1,000
Treasurer	500
Mayor	500
Committee clerks, &c.	500
Total amount	£2,500

The officers of the central council must be determined hereafter, in accordance with the duties that have to be performed when they are definitely known; but the judicial functions of recorder, common serjeant, and judge of Sheriffs' Court, as at present understood, should be transferred to judges appointed by the Crown.

The Lord Mayor, aldermen, and councillors of the central council should continue to possess all the rights and privileges now enjoyed by the corporation of London, viz. :—

The Lord Mayor to be ex-officio a privy councillor.

The right to approach the Throne with addresses.

The right to petition the Houses of Parliament through their sheriff.

The right to be represented in Parliament by an official; and such other privileges as may have been granted by charter for services rendered to the Crown in bygone days.

F. Bennoch, Esq.

22d Nov. 1853.

In this scheme I wish to retain all those ancient rights and privileges which cannot by possibility do any harm, and which bring the great mass of the people in and about the metropolis in close connexion with the Ministry of the day. I further desire to retain the name of the Lord Mayor, because he would then really be the lord over the other mayors, and become virtually the Lord Mayor. I think the recommendation that he should be called a lord lieutenant is absurd, because the very title of lord lieutenant indicates the existence of a superior officer of the same class, and implies that he is there representing a similar officer, which is manifestly absurd. The Lord Mayor would become a more appropriate title than it ever has been under the old system, which is that of a municipality enclosed in a very small area.

2121. Does your scheme contemplate an immediate change so as at once to do away with the present aldermen of London, or do you propose that it should be adopted as vacancies occur?—I think that the remedy cannot be applied too promptly. The evil is becoming greater every day, and I think the way to remedy it is the immediate adoption of a bold and comprehensive measure. I hear it argued that we ought to try for five years the experiment of a single municipality, and then to cluster round it, if it succeeds, a congeries of other municipalities. I think the proper way is to carry out a general remedy at once.

2122. Have you considered the political consequences which might arise from a political body such as you have just described sitting in the metropolis and representing such a mass of population?—I have no fear of the political consequences arising from such a body. When London possessed a power and contained a population larger than she does now, in comparison with other parts of the country, instead of acting politically injuriously, I believe she ever acted for the national good and to secure the liberties of the people. I believe such would be the case now. I think it is a weak and simple, if not a foolish fear, to anticipate that in consequence of people having the right to superintend their own affairs, and by associating for the purposes of the common welfare, they must by necessity forget their proper duties, and become a mere political body, striving to do injury and excite discontent, or subvert the best interests of the community.

2123. According to your plan, would not the chief power be vested in the central municipality, and would not very subordinate functions be left to the separate municipalities?—Those are matters of detail, which could easily be managed. I would have no improvement in regard to streets,—I would have no improvement in regard to sewers,—I would have no line of thoroughfare opened up,—unless it could be seen by the central council that such alterations were in perfect harmony with everything else that was contemplated to be done; for this reason: it will be seen according to this plan that each municipality is to be divided into twelve wards; each of those wards would have a representative in the central council, and that is the reason why the central council is made a little larger than it otherwise ought to be. I hold it to be essential, that no spot of the metropolis should be without its representative there; that, perpetually watching and guarding its own locality, it might at the same time bring about a system of unity of action, which could not otherwise be obtained. I recommend that the present City of London should be divided into twelve wards, and of course it is exceedingly important that it should be shown whether that can be done with propriety, and whether any improvement upon the plan of division now existing within the City can be effected. I have had a map coloured (producing the same) showing the wards as they now are; and if any man could be found who could give you an arrangement so involved, so intricate, and so absurd, he ought to have a patent for his very absurdity. Here for example is the ward of Farringdon Without, occupying about one fifth of the whole area of the City of London. Here is the ward of Bassishaw, which you may cover with your finger. Here is the ward of Farringdon Within, coming round in an extraordinary manner by a variety of angles and corners cutting into parishes: sometimes inside a large building, and sometimes only taking the foundation of a chimney; and we find a part of it absolutely and altogether separate and distinct from the other parts of the ward. There are also other wards which are very small; they are not separated by streets, but cut through property in every conceivable eccentric twist and angle. There is no general thoroughfare maintained,—no natural division is observed. Here is a little ward called Walbrook The whole arrangement is the most indiculous that can be imagined, and it is quite clear that by any alteration of the arrangement you could not make it worse than it is. But I have a plan (producing the same) which I think would be a great improvement. Here there is not a single street cut. With the exception of the absurd boundary of the City, which goes in and out in a zigzag and extraordinary manner, the whole City is divided into twelve districts, and they come out in point of population very nearly alike. Where a large ward appears, it must be remembered, and is indeed apparent as in the case of Smithfield, that there is a large area covered by the market and by the hospital, so that the population very nearly balances the population in what may seem smaller wards. I do not believe it would be possible to divide the metropolis in a way which would be more harmonious and convenient than this. There are two new streets required, to divide the town properly, and those streets will at once present themselves to you as essential. One is a street from Cheapside through Paternoster Row, to the western part of London; and as we show there a fine line for traffic east and west, so we might also have one north and south; this could readily and inexpensively be effected by the construction of the street and bridge on a line with the eastern end of St. Paul's Cathedral; this plan is now under the consideration of the corporation, and when completed, would open up a direct line of thoroughfare from the Angel at Islington to Clapham Common. It is very singular that it is only by those two streets being constructed that you can by possibility divide the City really well into twelve wards, almost proving that one desirable and wise plan will harmonize with other plans projected for the common good. In connexion with the boundaries, I beg to put in a paper, showing certain alterations proposed by the reform committee of 1852. They refer to the more equal division of the City into twenty-five wards, showing the value of the rateable property and of separate ratings; the number of persons rated at 10*l.* and upwards; the municipal voters &c.; but if my suggested plan be adopted, these will be unnecessary; they will, however, serve to show that although unable to effect any salutary change, some of the members of the common council have personally devoted their attention to a better division of wards, and a general reform of the corporation. (The witness delivered in the same.)

22d Nov. 1853.

THE RIGHT HON. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

FRANCIS BENNOCH, Esq., was further examined as follows.

F. Bennoch, Esq.
23d Nov. 1853.

2124. Is there anything which you wish to add to the evidence you have given to this Commission?—There are two or three points which, I think, require elucidation, because yesterday I could not speak positively upon them. Though my impression was very strong, I could not confidently tell the Commission whether the evidence could be borne out to the extent I stated, although I knew it was substantially correct. The first point is in regard to the Court of Aldermen having the right or power to dip their hands into the City purse without reference to the members of the Court of Common Council. I named a circumstance which had taken place some years ago, in which the chamberlain was called on by the Court of Common Council not to pay money expended in a certain manner by the order alone of the Court of Aldermen. It appeared that the Lord Mayor and aldermen had gone to Oxford, and in consequence of that expedition an account came before the Court of Common Council calling upon them for a balance of over 400*l.*; on going into the question it was found that over 700*l.* had previously been paid on account of that excursion.

2125. Was that the occasion to which the account published by the chaplain called public attention at the time?—No; that occurred long prior to this circumstance. This is a case which occurred in 1848, when the City authorities went to Oxford and were received in great state. They were invited to a dèjeûner at Mr. Morrison's mansion at Wallingford, on the banks of the river Thames, and afterwards returned by way of Reading and Staines to London, at an expense, it appears, of between 1,100*l.*, and 1,200*l.* The common council thought it was an improper expenditure of the public money to go beyond the City limits; but, finding they had no power to restrain the aldermen, the money was paid, and this byelaw which is now one of the standing orders of the common council was agreed to, and of course by the aldermen, because they form part of the General Court of Common Council. That order is to this effect:—"The chamberlain shall not pay "out of the chamber any sum of money for any charges or expenses, for any visitation or "journey by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, or any other branch of the corporation, either "for the purposes of conservancy or otherwise, when such a visit or journey shall be "beyond the boundary of the jurisdiction of the City, without the previous authority of "the common council upon motion for that purpose." From this it may be safely inferred that for all purposes within the jurisdiction of the City, the aldermen can do with the City purse whatever they think fit.

2126. Do you suppose if the common council were so minded, they could legally restrain the Court of Aldermen from making any expenditure of money without their sanction?—I think not; but inasmuch as the aldermen, being a part of the common council, agreed with that general byelaw, they became parties to it, and therefore they could not do that which would be an infraction of the bylaw to which they have assented.

2127. The aldermen who are members of the common council have only votes like other common councilmen in the common council; it is not necessary that there should be a majority of aldermen present in order to sanction any measure of the Court of Common Council, is it?—By no means.

2128. The alderman have only votes like others?—That is all. To show the advantage of that byelaw, I may mention that when Alderman Hunter was Lord Mayor last year, on the 17th of June, 1852, his deputy proposed a resolution to the Court to this effect,

F. Bennoch, Esq.
23d Nov. 1853.

"That this Court do concur with the request of the Court of Aldermen, communicated to the Lord Mayor, to view the upper district of the Thames navigation, and that the necessary expenses be provided for," showing that the aldermen recognized the byelaw of the Court of Common Council, and came to that body to ask for liberty to spend money in the manner proposed. Whereupon an amendment was proposed, "That it be referred to the committee for general purposes to inquire and report as to the nature of the duties attendant upon a view of the upper district of the Thames navigation, as well as the necessity for the same, and to report what privileges are endangered by the admission thereof, with a detailed statement of the expenses incurred on similar views from the year 1820 to the present time." That reference was made to the committee for general purposes in June 1852. We are now in November 1853, and such a return has not yet been made; and of course the Lord Mayor has not appeared in the upper district to survey the Thames. If there were any necessity for his going in 1852, that necessity must have increased month by month since, and it is either a neglect of duty on the part of the aldermen, or a desire to go beyond the necessary bounds in making the survey.

2129. Is it your view that the Court of Aldermen, according to the constitution of the corporation, has co-ordinate power with the Court of Common Council for all financial purposes?—There are only certain things in which the aldermen have exclusive jurisdiction. All the great committees of expenditure are formed of members of the common council in conjunction with the aldermen.

2130. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—There is. I named yesterday a point which created a little surprise in connexion with the items of expenditure which happened, I may say, almost accidentally, to meet my eye on going over the other accounts. It had reference to the 133*l.* expended in cloth to the ministers of state. I think it as well to give the Commissioners the precise facts of the case. I find, according to a list which has been in existence sixty or eighty years in the chamberlain's office, that the gentlemen who receive the compliment are the first Secretary of State, the Lord Chancellor, the Chamberlain of the Household, the Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, the Treasurer of the Household, the Lord Steward, the Comptroller, the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Master of the Rolls, the Recorder of London, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and the Common Serjeant; and for which the City obtain a proper receipt. It appears that one time the corporation had certain powers in connexion with the old Blackwall Hall factors, and they exercised the right of measuring all cloth sold or received in the City of London in the same way as they now claim the right of measuring other commodities. It appears that year by year they sent to the principal ministers of state four and a half yards of the finest black cloth that the country could produce, but the precise reason for it is not exactly understood; it is believed that it must have been for the purpose of encouraging the woollen manufactures in their earlier stages, and to show to the highest in authority the progress that was made year by year in that particular branch of industry. When the jurisdiction ceased, this expense should have been discontinued; yet here it stands, another evidence of the fact that a custom once established is seldom repealed voluntarily.

2131. Is there any other point to which you wish to advert?—There is one point which will further elucidate what I mentioned yesterday in connexion with the loose manner in which the accounts are rendered to the chamberlain. The Commissioners will find in the returns before me that there are certain officers who are appointed by the committee of City lands; among them is the keeper of the Monument, who for a period of years received from admission fees an average income of from 240*l.* to 250*l.* per annum. It appears that this gentleman had been either a member of the Court of Common Council, or was the brother of a member of the Court of Common Council. It is a sinecure office; he performs no part of the duty himself; he employs a couple of men, one to stand or sit at the top of the Monument all day, and the other remains at the enclosed bottom; the one to receive the money, and the other to prevent persons from throwing themselves over; and since it was enclosed like a cage, it is still necessary for the man to remain there, to prevent people hanging themselves. He pays them out of the receipts between 80*l.* and 90*l.* a year, and the balance he receives for himself.

2132. You mean the balance of the money received from those who go to see the Monument?—Yes. In 1851, when I entered the City lands committee, I found the price of admission was 6*d.* I tried very hard to reduce the price to a nominal sum, just sufficient to keep the structure in repair, and to obtain two or three days a week when people might go up the Monument and view it free of all expense. I could not carry the latter point, but I got the price reduced to 3*d.* Whether it was in consequence of the sudden reduction from 6*d.* to 3*d.*, or in consequence of the Great Exhibition, I cannot tell, but it is certain that in that year the profit which the keeper of the Monument received for his own sole advantage was the large sum of 1,337*l.* from which the corporation derive no advantage whatever.

2133. Is any part of this money devoted to keeping up the structure?—I believe not; because at the time when the price was reduced, it was held advisable to examine the condition of the Monument and ascertain whether it would be sufficiently strong to bear a large number of people, and I have discovered that at one time, when some female had thrown herself from the Monument, the number became so large that as many as hundreds of people were inside the Monument at one time. A survey of the Monument was made, and it was found to be perfectly sound and substantial, and no danger to be apprehended from any number ascending;—being in the form of a screw, the perpendicular pressure did not affect the structure at all. They therefore passed a resolution to put it into repair and to light it.

23d Nov. 1853.

2134. Are the expenses of keeping it in repair and lighting it considerable?—They cannot be much; there are only two or three lights. In connexion with the Irish Society, I was not sure as to the manner in which they kept their accounts. I find they are not at all kept in the chamberlain's office. It is an independent society. They keep the accounts themselves, and must be called upon to give evidence should the Commissioners require any explanation in reference to them. I also omitted to state, in the detail I gave of the saving which I thought might be effected without being injurious to any office in the corporation, that my evidence went on the supposition that nothing should be done in connexion with the corporation but merely remodelling it on its present basis. But if a similar scheme to the plan which I have suggested be adopted, I believe that a saving of expenditure of from 80,000*l.* to 90,000*l.* per annum may be effected, and allow 20,000*l.* a year for all the expenses of the municipality of the City of London, and its proportion of whatever sum it might be required to contribute to the expenses of the central council.

2135. You mean that the establishment would be greatly reduced?—Yes; so much reduced as to effect a saving of from 80,000*l.* to 90,000*l.* at least. Those are the two or three points which I wished to lay before the Commission. There may be some attempts to controvert my statement, but the corporation must do one of two things: if they show any inaccuracy in my statements, they must condemn their own accounts; and if they fail in that, they will stand convicted of an extravagant expenditure perhaps unparalleled in the history of corporations.

S. Morley, Esq.

Samuel Morley, Esq., after being sworn, was examined as follows.

2136. Do you reside in the City of London?—I carry on business in the City of London. I reside out of town.

2137. What is the nature of the business which you carry on?—The firm of which I am a member are wholesale warehousemen. I attend here in obedience to an invitation, less with the expectation of adding any facts to those which have been placed before the Commission, than of offering my testimony in support of the opinion which has been expressed, that there is in the City what I think I may call a univesal demand for extensive alterations in the corporation.

2138. Will you have the goodness to state what is the nature of the alterations which you imagine are desired in the City?—My belief is, that the institution at present existing is thoroughly out of harmony with public opinion. There is a large class of men whose co-operation would be very valuable, who at present are excluded from it by reason of the character of the arrangements connected with it. Those arrangements, I believe, are capable of such alteration as would bring into active co-operation many such men.

2139. Have you ever been yourself connected with the corporation?—Never. I have been an interested looker on. I have been invited many times to join the common council, but declined, just because it would have involved the sacrifice of so large an amount of time, as well as that the character of much of the duty was distasteful to me. If I were asked to state the reasons which exclude many men from the corporation, I should refer to the undoubted elaborateness of the mere external show and pageantry, and to the extent of the duties required of those who are members of the corporation.

2140. You referred to proposals which have been made to you to become a member of the corporation. Can you describe the motives which induced you to decline to accede to those offers?—I should say that the nature of those duties to be performed by a member of the common council, was such that I was not inclined to undertake them.

2141. Has not he frequently to attend the dinners which are connected with the committees of the common council?—There is no doubt of it.

2142. Do you think that that habit indisposes some persons to accept the office?—My impression is, that I know many large traders in the City who would be willing to give a fair proportion of time to the performance of those duties which I think fall within the range of corporate institutions; but the necessity which I really believe does exist, that any one who joins the corporation, should unite in the kind of entertainments which are referred to, would be to them quite distasteful.

2143. Is it your belief that the habit of connecting dinners and other entertainments with the ordinary business duties of a common councilman, deters many fit persons from entering the common council?—I think so, from the habit of living out of London, which has no doubt increased of late years. At the same time I have no doubt, if the character of the institution were altered, an alteration in reference to these entertainments would follow as a matter of course. I believe there are 232 members of the common council and the Court of Aldermen; 206 members of the Court of Common Council, and twenty-six aldermen. My belief is, that if that number were reduced very largely, say to fifty; and if the ward in which I carry on my business, instead of having to send eight or ten men to the common council, were to send one man, we should take more interest than we do in selecting the right man, than when he is to be one of so large a number. The consequence is, we have gradually kept away from any interference in a matter in which we are all deeply interested. I believe many merchants and large traders would be quite willing to unite themselves with the corporation under an altered system.

2144. Do you think the union of magisterial functions with the functions of the aldermen indisposes certain of the class to whom you have referred to take part in the corporation?—I do, decidedly. I give my opinion most unhesitatingly in favour of a paid magistracy. I do not believe in the economy of an unpaid magistracy. I believe there is no economy in it, when compared with the performance of magisterial duty out of the City. With respect to the office of sheriff in its present form, it is undoubtedly unacceptable to the class of men to whom I refer, and yet we are liable, without the slightest notice and by the importation into the common hall of the class of freemen to whom reference has been made (the 'longshore men), to have imposed upon us a duty which is in many respects repugnant to the feelings.

2145. The office of sheriff is an expensive one, is not it?—Yes; it would necessarily involve expenses. That a man, willing to serve his fellow-citizens and perform the duty, should be required to pay 600*l.* or 800*l.* towards a great feast at the Guildhall, is most unjust and unreasonable. I believe he has also to pay an equally large sum towards the expense of the dinners at the Old Bailey;—things very essential, I dare say, but still an expense which should be met from some other fund. The Commission has heard from most of the witnesses references to the Lord Mayor's show, which is really felt to be a thing more in accordance with the dark ages than the present day.

2146. You do not think there is any class of the community which wishes to retain it?—Reference has been made to children and nurserymaids; but I have no idea that the citizens of London look at the thing with any other feelings than those of repugnance.

2147. You do not think the tradesmen take any pleasure in such a show?—I should imagine that the tradesmen living in the line of streets must be greatly inconvenienced by it. It was this year felt by the committee of the Coal Exchange to be a positive affront to them, that their business should be interrupted by it the whole day. That committee published a resolution to that effect in the daily papers.

2148. Are you acquainted with the mode of election in common hall?—I can only state what is apparently authenticated by rumour, and refer to a fact which has been mentioned to me: that on one occasion of the election of sheriffs, an agent of the 'longshore men received money from two parties,—from the one, that he might not be chosen, and from the other, that he might. I believe the sum named was 50*l.* or 100*l.*, so that he was able to insure e certain result either way.

2149. Have you any knowledge whether election to offices of emolument in the City are accompanied by corrupt practices or not?—I see, by reference to the chamberlain's account, which I have looked through within this last week, that there are offices which have been purchased.

2150. The question referred to offices of popular election. Have you any reason to believe that bribery and corruption are resorted to in those elections?—There is no doubt that in the late election for chamberlain a large amount of money changed hands in some way. I was interested in that election, believing that an intelligent public servant in that office, Mr. Scott, was well calculated to serve his fellow-citizens as chamberlain.

2151. Were you on his committee?—Yes; I was.

2152. Are you able to state to the Commissioners more distinctly what the nature of the alteration is which you would propose to effect in the present system; would you propose that the aldermen should continue to be elected for life?—I should decidedly object it.

2153. Would you keep up the distinction between the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council?—Having had an opportunity of conferring with friends in Manchester as to the working of that corporation, I have formed a strong opinion of the advantage of the whole being in one body. They have aldermen there, but they are united with the common council.

2154. Would you wish to see the general provisions of the Municipal Reform Bill applied to the City of London?—I should, as far as is practicable, looking to the somewhat altered condition of the City affairs.

2155. Do you think that Act ought to be taken as the basis for an improved system of municipal government in the City?—I quite incline to that opinion. Having read in The Times of the 9th of November some thirty-seven propositions which were put before you, without knowing anything of the gentleman who submitted them to you, I am able to say that they have met with favour in the City. I refer to certain suggestions given in by Mr. Acland.

2156. You do not agree with some of the witnesses, that it would be desirable altogether to abolish municipal institutions in the City of London?—I do not. I believe in a proper system of municipal institutions. The metropolitan boroughs might with advantage have such institutions accorded to them.

2157 At this moment the metropolitan boroughs might, if they so thought fit, apply for municipal institutions; would you force those institutions upon them, even if they were unwilling to have them?—I am hardly prepared to answer that question. I should have thought it would have been acceptable to the metropolitan boroughs to have such institutions. I should demur to the extension of the corporation of London to the whole of the metropolitan boroughs. I think it would be too large a body a great deal. I think they should be confined to the duties connected with their own distinct locality; and then that each borough, if it could be so arranged, should by deputation form part of a common centre, upon which should be thrown the responsibility of promoting common objects.

2158. In short, you would maintain the municipal institutions within the present limits of the City of London; but you would in some way provide for joint action upon those subjects, in which the whole metropolis has a common interest?—Yes.

2159. Do you think it would be desirable that there should be the means of imposing a tax upon the whole metropolis, and upon the metropolis alone, for purposes in which the whole town has a common interest?—I think it would be quite in accordance with strict justice.

2163. With respect to the importance of establishing a chamber of commerce, have you formed any opinion; it has been represented that it might be desirable that a portion of the funds of the City should be applied to the formation of a chamber of commerce?—I quite differ from that opinion. I think chambers of commerce are desirable, but I think they should grow out of the want felt of such institutions by traders themselves. There are many aspects in which a chamber of commerce would be of great value in London. At this moment, for example, the whole trade of London is in a state of great difficulty as to the construction of the late Receipt Stamp Act,—the bankers in Lombard Street as well as small shopkeepers. That appears to me to be a very legitimate subject for a chamber of commerce to take up. So with regard to the inquiry into the Post Office, which is now going on. Such a body might fairly present evidence upon the bearing of certain arrangements in the Post Office upon the interests of trade.

2165. Do you not think it would be a proper application of the funds of the corporation of London to promote any object which is generally advantageous to trade?—My belief is, that if the tradesmen belonging to the upper class were to join, as I think they would, in any new arrangements which were made, they would have facilities for promoting such objects without the application of the corporate funds. I incline to an opinion that as a trader I ought to be willing to bear my share of the expense occasioned by carrying on an efficient chamber of commerce. With respect to the corporate funds, I would suggest, that in addition to widening the streets and increasing the facilities for carrying on business, there should be a much larger amount of attention paid to sanitary arrangements than has ever yet been manifested, as far as I have observed. I think with reference to the comforts of the dwellings of the poor, to some extent, there has been culpable neglect manifested.

2166. Has your attention been turned to the operation of the coal tax?—It appears to me a most objectionable method of raising a revenue. I entertain the opinion which has been expressed, that the citizens would cheerfully pay an improvement rate or tax, much sooner than the present indirect tax.

2167. You think a uniform rate upon householders is a preferable mode of raising money to the present duty upon coals?—I do, most decidedly.

2169. Do you see any advantage in keeping up the regulations that no person shall carry on a retail trade in the City who is not a freeman?—I hold it to be most unjust that I, because I am a large trader, should be exempted from that which the small traders are compelled to submit to. I hold it to be contrary to all right dealing, decidedly.

2170. Are you aware of any one of the trade privileges of the City which it would be expedient to maintain?—I am not aware of any. I should sweep them all away.

S. Morley, Esq.
23d Nov. 1853.

2171. Is there any other point to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—No. I would merely add, that in what I have said I have no intention, just because I have no right, to cast any reflection upon the members of the corporation, who I believe are for the most part better than their system. But I am bound to express the opinion that, looking to them as a body, they do not represent the class of men who would be best fitted to conduct the affairs of the corporation.

2172. Do you believe that they have exercised their patronage judiciously in cases where it was of importance to the public that fit persons should be appointed to particular offices?—I have hardly had opportunities of forming a judgment upon that point. Seeing the sort of men who have been connected for years with the corporation, I think I can trace the influence of motives in connexion with some of the forms of patronage as well as social enjoyment, which are the prominent features of the system at present.

2173. Do you think there has been an increased disposition of late years to appoint proper persons to office?—I think the knowledge that affairs were tending to the point which they have now reached before you, may have induced greater care and caution.

G. R. Corner, Esq.

GEORGE RICHARD CORNER, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2174. You are connected with the borough of Southwark?—I have been practising as a solicitor there since the year 1824. I am vestry clerk of the parish of St. Olave, clerk to the board of guardians of St. Olaves' Union, and I am prothonotary of the Borough Court.

2175. You are well acquainted, probably, with the nature of the connexion which now exists between the City of London and part of the borough of Southwark?—I have taken a great interest in the subject for many years, and devoted much time and attention to it, as my father, who was also a practising solicitor in Southwark, did before me.

2177. Has the application of the inhabitants of Southwark been for absolute incorporation with the City of London, or has it been that one of two alternatives should be adopted, namely, that Southwark should be altogether severed from the City, or incorporated with it, and admitted to its full privileges?—The application to the corporation of London has always been for a full incorporation with London, and not in the alternative. In the year 1660 the inhabitants of Southwark applied to Parliament for a separate incorporation, which was opposed by the City of London, who, in their answer, said it was not for the benefit either of the City or the borough that they, being so long and so intimately connected with each other for commercial purposes, should be separated from each other. The application failed, as I need not tell you, and the borough of Southwark has remained under the imperfect jurisdiction of the City of London till the present day.

2178. Supposing it should not be thought expedient to comply with this requisition of the inhabitants of Southwark, and completely to incorporate them with the City of London, do you think it would be desirable that the connexion of Southwark with the City should be severed rather than that it should remain in its present condition?—I would rather defer answering that question, because there is to be a public meeting held in Southwark on Friday next, for the purpose of considering, so far as a town hall meeting can consider, the very point in question. I should rather therefore not prejudge that question before the inhabitants meet.

2179. Are there any points to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—I think, with great deference, that the Commissioners cannot come to a proper consideration of the relation between Southwark and London, without going into a history of their connexion. I consider it desirable to go into that as evidence before you.

2180. You are aware that the former Commission went very much into the antiquarian part of the subject, and that is very fully before us already in their report. The Commissioners are therefore rather desirous of confining their attention at present to the practical questions which are before us. At the same time, if you have any statement to make which you think will throw light upon this question, we are desirous of hearing you?—I think the report of the Commission was chiefly founded upon my own evidence. Perhaps you will allow me, on a future day, after having gone through that evidence, to send in to you any corrections or additions to it which I may think needful. I beg to lay before the Commissioners a plan, showing what the borough consists of. Under the jurisdiction of the corporation of London there are three manors: the Guildable manor, which was the ancient town of Southwark, that is the small part, coloured pink; the King's manor, which was formerly the Archbishop of Canterbury's, which is coloured yellow; and the Great Liberty manor, which formerly belonged to Bermondsey Abbey. Those three manors which are coloured blue, constiuted the old borough of Southwark up to the time of the Reform Act. There was then added to it, the Clink Liberty, and the parish of Christchurch, and the parishes of Bermondsey and Rotherhithe. The parts of the map which are not coloured, although within the parliamentary borough, are not at present connected in any way with the City of London. It would be a very material question, if Southwark were to be incorporated with the City, whether the new parts of Southwark, which have been added to the parliamentary borough, should be annexed to the City. My own opinion is, that any measure of incorporation must include the whole borough.

2181. You think there would be considerable inconvenience in placing the different parts of Southwark under different jurisdictions?—Very great inconvenience indeed.

2182. Would it be possible that the borough of Southwark, so far as it is comprised in the charter which you have spoken of, should become as it were a ward of the City of London, unless it were taken out of the county of Surrey?—I think that would necessarily result. It never has been separated from the county.

2183. Is not that one of the great difficulties which exist?—That is one of the evils which we complain of; that we are subject to two jurisdictions, and the inhabitants are liable to two duties—to the courts of the county of Surrey and to the City courts.

2184. The charter which was originally granted did not relieve you from that, did it?—It did not.

2185. Are there any other observations which you desire to make?—I think not, at present.

2186. Will you state what is the extent of the interference of the City of London with the borough of Southwark?—The City of London do not interfere enough with the borough of Southwark. The City hold three Courts Leet for the manors, in the first instance. It is not the case that at any of those Courts Leet any fees are payable by any of the parties called upon to serve offices. It has been stated before the Commission by some gentleman, that half a crown is paid by the constables who are sworn in, but that is not now the case.

2187. How are the Courts Leet constituted?—They are the ancient courts of the manors held in pursuance of immemorial custom.

2188. Who presides in them?—The steward of Southwark, William Payne, Esq.

2190. Is there any other interference of the corporation besides those three Courts Leet?—They hold quarter sessions every quarter, at which nothing is done because they have no alderman to sit to hear cases, therefore there are no commitments for trial at the quarter sessions. The grand jury are summoned, but merely to be discharged.

2192. Do they attend?—They attend every quarter and hold the sessions.

2193. Those sessions are merely formal?—Merely formal.

2194. The officers for the City attend merely to discharge the grand jury?—To open the court and discharge the grand jury, and close the court again.

2195. What is the court which has jurisdiction in those cases?—The Court of Quarter Sessions for the county and the assizes, as also the Central Criminal Court.

2196. What other court is there?—The corporation of London appoint a coroner.

2197. Do you mean the Court of Aldermen or the Court of Common Council?—The coroner for London and Southwark is Mr. Payne; the appointment is in the Court of Common Council.

2198. Is that the whole extent of the interference of the City with the borough of Southwark?—They have the metage of corn and fruit.

2199. That is not peculiar to Southwark, but it extends over the whole of the port of London?—Yes; it extends over the whole of the port of London.

2200. Is there any other interference which is peculiar to Southwark?—No; except the holding of the Borough Court, of which I am prothonotary; that is a Court of Record, held by prescription for the trial of all actions of debt and trespass to any amount. Mr. Payne, the steward, is the judge, and the causes are tried by a jury. Counsel attend, and any attorney of the courts at Westminster, on producing his admission in the superior courts and his certificate, is allowed to practise there.

2201. Does that court transact business?—Yes.

2202. The judge is appinted by the City?—He is.

2203. Is that a court which it is desirable to retain?—I think it is a very useful court. As I am prothonotary of it, although my salary is only 50*l.* a year, I am not at all in favour of the abolition of that court.

2204. Irrespective of the consideration of salary, should you think it would be desirable that the court should be preserved?—I should then be of the same opinion, that it should be preserved.

2205. You think it is a court from which the public derive benefit?—Yes.

2206. Does that exhaust the whole list of City interferences?—I do not think the City interfere with the borough in any other respects than those which I have mentioned.

R. Corner, Esq.

23d Nov. 1853.

2207. If those instances which you have enumerated were abolished, the whole interference of the City, with the borough of Southwark would be at an end, would it?—Yes; I think it would. I should mention that they have a nominal alderman, who is the alderman of Bridge Without. The last alderman of that ward had a notion that his ward consists only of a few houses which formerly stood on London Bridge, and which, having been removed, there is now no ward, and no inhabitants, and no duties to perform. The senior alderman who has passed the chair is always appointed to be the alderman of the ward of Bridge Without, as a sort of honourable sinecure.

2208. You say the City appoints the coroner?—Yes.

2209. Does his jurisdiction extend over any part of the borough of Southwark except that which was granted to the City by charter?—Only over that part.

2210. Has he exclusive jurisdiction there?—He has; that is expressed by the charter. The rest of the borough is under the jurisdiction of the coroner for the count

2211. Can you form an opinion as to the feeling which may exist in Southwark respecting a more intimate connexion with the corporation of the City?—From the fact of repeated applications having been made for a more complete incorporation with the City, I think I can say that the desire among those who are best informed is, that the borough should be completely incorporated with the City. In 1788, in 1814, in 1827, in 1835, and in 1852 applications were made by the borough of Southwark to the corporation of the City for incorporation. Some of them were made at public meetings, some signed by a great number of the inhabitants being freemen of London. The Commission must be aware that there are resident in Southwark a great number of the freemen and liverymen of London, who, from their residence on the south side of the bridge, have no voice in the affairs of the corporation of which they are members.

2212. Does what you say refer to the opinions of the people of Southwark generally, or only to that limited class?—The people of Southwark generally are so numerous that I cannot presume to say what their opinion as a body may be.

2213. What do you conceive to be the prevailing opinion?—I think the Commissioners had better wait till after the public meeting on Friday, in order to ascertain that. I have here "An account of the proceedings at the Town Hall of the borough of Southwark "and ward of Bridge Without, held on Wednesday, the 27th July, 1814, pursuant to a "requisition to the high bailiff, signed by fifty-three inhabitants of the said borough and "ward, to take into consideration the various charters and statutes, granting and securing "the liberties, franchises, and privileges of the inhabitants of the said borough and ward, "Sir Watkin Lewes, high bailiff, in the chair." The result was a resolution, "That "humble memorials or petitions be presented to the Lord Mayor, commonalty, and "citizens of the City of London, and to the Court of Aldermen, praying them to take "the said charter of the 4th of King Edward VI. into their serious consideration, and to "take such steps as they in their wisdom shall deem expedient, for procuring for the "inhabitants of this ancient town and borough, the rights and privileges thereby granted "to them; and to restore the magistracy of the City of London in Southwark; and that "the Mayor and commonalty and citizens of the City of London would be pleased to "direct the judge and officers of the ancient Court of Record of the said town and "borough to make public in Southwark the jurisdiction, authority, and existence of "that court; and that steps may be taken to re-establish the same, as well as the session "for the said borough, and that process may be duly executed in Southwark, according "to law, and all doubts to be removed as to who are the proper officers to execute the "same. That they would be pleased to order proper measures to be taken for holding a "court of wardmote in the said borough to elect a competent number of inhabitants, "freemen of the City of London, to represent the said ward in the Court of Common "Council, and that the Court of Common Council would be pleased to reconsider the "Act passed by them of the 16th June, 4th and 5th of King Philip and Queen Mary, "for altering the mode of electing the aldermen of the Bridge Ward Without, and on "the next vacancy to restore to the inhabitants of this ancient town and borough the "right of electing an alderman for the said ward in the manner directed by the act of "common council, passed on or about the last day of July, in the 4th year of King "Edward VI." So that, at a public meeting in the year 1814, the resolution of the inhabitants was decidedly in favour of an incorporation with the City. Since then various applications have been made for such incorporation.

2214. How is the high bailiff himself appointed?—He is appointed by the common council. I should apologise for omitting to say, when I was asked in what way the City interfered with Southwark, that the high bailiff who is the head executive officer in the borough, is appointed by the common council, and he is the returning officer at all elections of members of Parliament. The precept comes from the sheriff of the county, directed to the high bailiff of the borough of Southwark. He executes it, and makes the return to the sheriff, who returns it to Parliament.

2215. The returning officer for the borough of Southwark is appointed by the common council?—Yes. Under the Act for establishing a Court of Requests in the borough, he was the bailiff of the Court of Requests, and was entitled to certain fees. When the County Courts were established, it was resolved that the high bailiff of Southwark should be bailiff of the two County Courts of Southwark and Lambeth, which were established in lieu of the old Court of Requests for the borough. I believe those fees are the principal part of the emoluments of the high bailiff. G. R. Corner, Esq. 23d Nov. 1853.

2216. Does the City exercise any jurisdiction over the prisons of the borough of Southwark?—The only prison that we have is a City prison, called the Borough Compter; but it is now quite unused and partly pulled down. The Town Hall is also the property of the City. If the borough were incorporated, of course we should not be contented with having but one ward. My notion is, that it would be proper to consolidate some of the smaller wards in the City, so as to reduce the number of wards there, and to make Southwark into as many wards as its population and extent would seem to require. For instance, each parish would be a ward, or some of the large parishes might be made into two or three wards.

2217. If the whole of the borough of Southwark were incorporated with the City, the addition would be larger than the original body?—And it would still not be so large as the Tower Hamlets. The population of the City of London is now about 125,000. The population of the whole of the parliamentary borough of Southwark, including Bermondsey and Rotherhithe, and Christchurch, is 155,000, that would make it 280,000, and the Tower Hamlets is about 400,000.

2218. That part of Southwark which borders upon the Thames, resembles in a great degree in point of trade and mercantile occupation the City of London as it now exists, does not it?—Yes.

2219. The rest of the borough of Southwark, which is behind, contains a large population, does not it, which bears very little resemblance to the City of London?—Like every other place, it contains a mixture. If you took the leading streets, I should say they are altogether like the City of London; but of course behind the leading streets there are courts and small streets, and so on; but you find the same thing in the City of London.

2220. Still, if you were to add the whole of the present borough of Southwark to the City of London, you would very much destroy the special character which now belongs to the City, would you not?—I do not see that. Southwark is essentially a commercial borough, and all its commercial interests centre in the City of London. Our merchants go to the Royal Exchange in London; there is no Royal Exchange in Southwark. Our wharfingers look to the merchants in London, and go to London for all goods to land and to warehouse. Our corn dealers, and granary men, and lightermen go to the corn market in Mark Lane. Our coal merchants go to the Coal Exchange in Thames Street. Our tanners and leathermen go to the market at Leadenhall. They have endeavoured to establish a market at Bermondsey, where the leather is tanned, but it has not succeeded; they are still obliged to go to the market at Leadenhall; and at Bermondsey they merely warehouse their goods.

2221. You mean that taking the borough of Southwark as a whole, it closely resembles the City of London as a whole?—I think so, except perhaps with respect to some parts of Rotherhithe and Bermondsey, which are still unbuilt on.

Adjourned to to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

Thursday, 24th November, 1853.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, MP., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY STEPHEN GIBBS, Mr. DAVID THOMAS ALSTON, Mr. JAMES WICKENDEN, and Mr. BENJAMIN BENNETT having been sworn, were examined as follows. Mr. H. S. Gibbs, Mr. D. T. Alston, Mr. J. Wickenden, and Mr. B. Bennett. 24th Nov. 1853.

2222. (To Mr. Gibbs.) In what capacity do you appear before this Commission?—I appear before the Commissioners as one of the proprietors of the oyster grounds at Queenborough, and also as a member of a deputation of oyster companies and proprietors generally.

2223. What oyster companies do you allude to?—I allude to companies in Essex and Kent; they are nine in number. Some of the oyster fishery grounds are managed by proprietors only; others are managed by companies.

2225. In what manner did the companies meet to consult together on this subject?—They have repeatedly met, but more particularly within the last week, to consider the question which we are desirous to lay before the Commissioners.

2226. Is there any permanent body which exists to watch over their interests?—They only meet upon special occasions, when called together for any particular purpose.

2227. Are the other gentlemen members of the same deputation?—They are.

2228. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commissioners any point in reference to the trade in oysters which you desire to bring before our attention?—We are very desirous of stating that the trade in oysters carried on by us in the City of London is most extensive; and we are particularly desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners to the abuses in the metage, porterage, and City dues. When I acquaint the Commissioners that there are upwards of 50,000*l.* laid out annually between the parties whom we represent, I feel quite persuaded you will see that we are heavily and seriously oppressed by those taxes of metage, City dues, and porterage.

Mr. H. S. Gibbs, Mr. D. T. Alston, Mr. J. Wickenden, and Mr. B. Bennett.

24th Nov. 1853.

2229. Do you mean that the burden of those duties imposed upon the trade amounts to 50,000*l.* a year, or do you mean that the interest involved in the oyster trade of London is the sum of 50,000*l.*?—There is a sum of money laid out during the season of buying, to the extent of 50,000*l.* The purchasing season may last from two to three months in the year only.

2230. That is the value of the trade in oysters to the City of London?—Yes; that is the extent of the trade to the City of London. There are other parties, to whom I particularly call the attention of the Commissioners, who receive a large number of oysters, which are called rail-borne. That oyster trade is carried on by very enterprising men in the locality of Billingsgate, and they are wholly exempt from the taxes which I allude to.

2231. You refer to oysters brought by rail?—They are called rail-borne oysters. Such is not the case with those fish we represent, which are called water-borne oysters.

2232. Do not the same parties send their oysters sometimes by rail and sometimes by sea, or are they separate branches of trade?—They—the companies only—generally send their oysters by water; but in the event of a fog, or anything which prevents vessels from sailing, then some of them avail themselves of the rail; but that is very seldom.

2233. Have the goodness to proceed with your statement?—The principal subjects which we are desirous of calling your attention to, and which we conceive press most heavily on the oyster companies, are, the meters in the first place, then the porterage and City dues. Mr. Alston, who is here, sends up to Billingsgate, probably, every year to the extent of from 35,000 to 40,000 bushels of oysters. A tax is levied upon those oysters, as I have stated, to the amount of from 1*s.* 2*d.* to 1*s.* 3*d.* per bushel. When we see that one individual sends oysters up to market to that extent, I trust you will feel it is a strong case that we present before you, and that what we complain of bears most heavily upon our particular trade.

(Mr. Alston.) I have sent up beween 40,000 and 50,000 bushels in the last year. The metage dues only would amount to about 800*l.* a year; but that does not include the porterage.

2234. What is the amount of all the City dues levied upon your own trade?—About 800*l.* a year; that is the meterage only.

2235. Adding the porterage and the City dues, how much would it amount to?—It would come to considerably more. The article is taxed, but the porterage is paid by those who buy. If the oysters come up by land there is nothing charged.

2236. Is it still worth your while to send your oysters by sea rather than by land, when they are subject to these charges?—It suits us better for many purposes. In bringing them up by water, we have a warehouse; our vessels are warehouses to us. There are many companies which carry on business, and that is all they have to depend upon; and even the profit of the business is divided amongst those companies in labour. I am an individual trader, and therefore that does not affect me.

2237. Is the City metage any advantage to an oyster trader?—Not any.

2238. If the City had not the right of measuring the oysters, would they be measured when landed from the vessel and brought to shore?—We must measure them to sell them on board. One of our principal grievances is, that our article is measured by people over whom we have no control; and we not only pay heavily for having that work done, but the public come in and pay as well; therefore the men who measure the oysters have it in their power to do us injustice, because they receive money from the public, when, in point of law, the public have no right to pay at all.

2240. Then it would be necessary, under any circumstances, that your oysters should be measured before they were sold to the public?—Certainly.

2241. Your complaint rather is on account of the charge made by the City, than on account of the fact that you are compelled to submit to a measurement?—According to the law laid down by Baron Alderson, the meters are to do the work for 8*s.* a score for the first 100 bushels; after, at the rate of 4*s.*, which they receive of us; or if they do not do it themselves, they hire people to do it. If the public pay them as well, it is to be considered not only as a gratuity, but a double tax.

2242. Supposing the public paid nothing, and the whole payment were what you paid to the City officers, would it be too large a payment?—Considerably.

2243. (To Mr. Gibbs.) Supposing you were left to yourselves, and there were no interference on the part of the City, how would it be managed?—We should then have a control over our own servants, and measure our own property. We should take care that the measures so employed were legalized by the City, and that our own men did the duty of measuring and shovelling. Such is not the case at present. We are subject to men over whom we have no control whatever.

2244. Do you think the work could be done more cheaply?—Considerably.

Mr. H. S. Gibbs, Mr. D. T. Alston, Mr. J. Wickenden, and Mr. B. Bennett.

24th Nov. 1853.

2245. Would it be done more conveniently?—It would be done equally conveniently, and at considerably less cost. We should then have power over our own servants, the men in the hold, where they shovel the oysters, and we should be better enabled to see that justice was done to the public. At present we have no control over them whatever.

2246. (To Mr. Alston.) You have stated the amount which you calculate you pay for metage at 800*l.* a year upon your own trade?—Yes, 800*l.*; but for the trade, 3,000*l.*

2247. Supposing this system did not exist, and you were allowed to measure your oysters in the way you thought best, what would be the amount you would have to pay for metage?—I think I could get my oysters measured by my own servants for half the money that it now costs me.

2249. Will you explain the item of porterage?—The item of porterage is simply this: if I have oysters up by the railway, I can go and place them in Billingsgate Market for sale without any porterage, metage, or anything of the kind. If I send a bushel of oysters out of my boat to be sold at the same place in the market, it costs me 5*d.* a bushel for meterage; then 4*d.* for having them measured, and then it costs me 6*d.* to take them up into the market by means of porters again.

2250. You talk of metage and of having them measured, as two distinct items. What do you mean by that?—We pay the meters 8*s.* a score on the first 100 bushels delivered upon each voyage to market, after, 4*s.* per score; those are sinecures. They put men down the hold, whom they ought to pay themselves, to measure the oysters, but they manage to get the public to pay them. Some of them get more than 4*d.* a bushel.

2251. What you have called metage, is a nominal measurement; it is not a real service performed?—No service at all.

2252. But the having them measured is an actual service performed by the City officers?—No; but by men, fellowship porters, appointed by the deputy meters.

2253. With regard to porterage, you must have your oysters carried from the ship to the market under any system, must you not?

(Mr. Gibbs.) No; they are sold in the boats.

2254. They are sold afloat, are they?—Yes.

2255. There must be some porterage, even if the City porters were not employed, must not there?

(Mr. Alston.) Certainly.

2256. What do you estimate the cost per bushel is, in the employment of the City porters above what it would be, if the trade were open, and any person might be employed who might be thought fit for the business.

(Mr. Bennett.) It could be done for half the money.

(Mr. Alston.) Many of the poor people who come down would do it themselves; now they are not allowed to do it. A fellowship porter takes possession of it as a matter of right. If a poor person comes and buys a peck of oysters of me, he must pay 1*d.* for measuring them, and 1*d.* for having them put on shore, and if he goes further than the dumb lighter, he must pay 1½*d.*

2257. You say you would propose that the oysters should be measured by the seller's own servant?

(Mr. Gibbs.) Exactly.

2258. Then where would be the protection to the buyer, that that servant measures correctly? The object of the appointment of a third party by the City, probably was, that he might do justice to both parties?—The buyer is present at the same time, and the deputy meters, who are deputed to carry out the object which you state, are not there. They send their servants, who are very independent about the measures either one way or the other; when they go down in the hold, they go there without any charge to the meters, who have the exclusive right of saddling the proprietors of the oysters with 4*d.* a bushel or 8*s.* a score. The men so employed in the hold are desirous to receive their 4*d.* per bushel also; that they consider is a sufficient compensation, and it frequently occurs that they will receive more than that, for the express purpose that they shall give an excess of measure; therefore, if they receive an excess of 1*d.* upon the peck, or 2*d.*, which is frequently the case, the proprietors lose, as a matter of certainty, from three pennyworth to six pennyworth of oysters.

2259. Do you know how the oyster trade is conducted in other large towns? Are there any of these meters standing between the buyer and seller?—Not one, to my knowledge, anywhere.

(Mr. Alston.) I never heard of such a thing.

(Mr. Gibbs.) It is an obstruction to the trade altogether, and I have no doubt a remedy could be provided, securing to the public, justice in the shape it desires.

2260. How are oysters sold to large dealers in oysters? Is it in barrels?—No; they are generally sold in pecks, of four to the bushel. Large dealers send their servants for so many bushels or so many pecks and they are sold afloat.

Mr. H. S. Gibbs, Mr D. T. Alston, Mr. J. Wickenden, and Mr. B. Bennett.

24th Nov. 1853.

2261. The large buyers of oysters would soon detect anything wrong in point of measurement, would they not?—Immediately.

2262. Are you to be understood that the persons who actually measure the oysters, being the servants of the City deputy-meters, cheat the sellers, being bribed by the purchasers to give over measurement?—I believe it frequently occurs; but there are several gentlemen now before you, who will speak positively to that point, they having been and are sellers at Billingsgate Market.

2263. The men who measure have no right to receive anything, you say, from the buyer?—Not at all.

2264. But they do receive a douceur from the buyer, and they are induced by that to give a false measurement in his favour?

(Mr. Alston.) They get no wages from the meters at all; they are wholly dependent upon the public.

2265. Do you mean that their whole payment consists in the fees they get from the buyers?—That is all.

(Mr. Bennett.) Yes; and that acts as a bribe.

2266. (To Mr. Gibbs.) Is there any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—There is another point to which I am very desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners, and that is the tax of 2*s.* for each fishing vessel which comes up to Billingsgate. It is levied by the Marine Society, which has an office in Bishopsgate Street.

2268. What is the Marine Society? Is it a public body?—It is a society for bringing up lads for the mercantile or the naval service.

2269. What authority have they for levying that amount?—I cannot understand what authority they have for levying that tax. Before we leave this Commission, we beg further to call your attention to the large sums of money which have been and are annually expended by the various oyster companies. We do not stop at 50,000*l.*; that is only the expenditure during the oyster season for purchasing. After that comes an expenditure of double that amount, distributed among various persons connected with the water in their different fisheries. The oyster fisheries alone have employed by those means, and do employ, from 10,000 to 15,000 persons annually, all of whom are brought up to the sea, and form by that means a nursery, which is beneficial to the nation, not only in the mercantile but in the naval department, to the extent, as I before stated, of 10,000 to 15,000 persons, men and boys. I can speak from experience, being a seafaring person myself, that they are some of the best sailors we have afloat.

2270. What is the locality of the oyster fisheries?—The neighbourhood of Colchester, Burnham, Cheney Rock Sheerness, Queenborough, Whitstable, Feversham, Rochester, and Milton. It is principally the Kent and Essex fisheries that I refer to. The gentlemen with me are more experienced in the fisheries than myself; they know the business experimentally.

2271. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—No. Our complaint is principally and urgently directed to the metage, and to not having the power of employing our own servants to measurse our goods.

2272. There is nothing in the arrangement of the stalls at Billingsgate of which you have to complain?—No; we have nothing to do with that. I may add that the corporation of the City of London are desirous, and have been for some length of time, to remedy the evil of which we complain: but it appears they have not the power at present to do so.

Mr. Clement George, Mr. Thomas D'Iffanger, and Mr. Edward Hodges having been sworn, were examined as follows.

Mr. C. George, Mr. T. D'Iffanger, and Mr. E. Hodges.

24th Nov. 1853.

2273. (To Mr. George.) In what capacity do you appear before the Commission?—We attend as a committee from the Marylebone Vestry to lay before the commission the resolution passed there, relative to the coal duties and the tax on carts.

2274. Will you proceed with any statement which you wish to address to the Commission?—The inhabitants of Marylebone complain of this tax, which is computed at 22,000*l.* per annum, being placed upon us without our having any share in the representation of the body which imposes this tax, or receiving any equivalent for it. No portion of it has been expended upon the parish of Marylebone, though the parish is in need of improvement, and the vestry are frequently called upon to vote sums of money from the rates to effect the improvements which are necessary for the sanitary condition of the population. We likewise consider that at the time this tax was imposed for the approaches of London Bridge, though there might appear a necessity to raise a tax upon coals for the moment, had the corporation funds been well managed, or had the estates at that time been placed under proper control, there would have been no occasion to impose a tax upon the locality of Marylebone, much less upon an area twenty miles in extent round the City of London. The tax specially falls upon some of our institutions; for instance, we consume in the Marylebone Baths and Washhouses a large quantity of coals; and we compute that the tax upon that establishment alone is equal to 50*l.* a year; the amount may seem small, but when we are conferring an advantage to the poor by a rate upon the inhabitants of the whole district, it seems proper that we should be exempt from a tax of this nature. I am quite certain that the great body of the respectable inhabitants of London would rather pay an improvement rate than tax their poorer neigbours, round the whole of London, upon an article of necessary use. These are our feelings with respect to the coal tax. By a petition to the Legislature last session, we laid our complaint before Parliament, but we thought as this Commission was sitting, it was a fair matter also to lay before you.

2275. The principle upon which the proceeds of the coal tax have been professed to be applied has been that of viewing the metropolis as a whole, and selecting those improvements which appeared to be most for the general benefit?—That is in some degree an error; there is a 4*d.* rate and a 1*d.* rate, amounting to 5*d.*, which the City of London have had from ancient times. We say that ought to be abolished. An 8*d.* rate was conceded during the time of the Duke of Wellington's administration, for the approaches of London Bridge. They have extended the operation of that Act from time to time under the pretence of making certain improvements in West end of London. I believe the money raised by the City was discharged in the year 1852, and the amount anticipated by Act of Parliament will have been paid off in 1856. It is in order that no further extension of the coal duty shall be imposed, that we apply to this Commission. We say that we ought to have a share in the representation which effects those improvements.

2276. At present that part of the proceeds of the coal tax which is appropriated to the general improvement of the metropolis, is distributed by the Board of Woods and Works, is not it?—It is; but no part of that has been expended upon the parish of Marylebone.

2277. Do not you think that Marylebone is benefited by the improvement of other parts of the metropolis—for instance, by the improvements in New Oxford Street?—The improvements in New Oxford Street, which is in the parishes of St. Giles and St. George, Bloomsbury, has brought over our thoroughfares a large railway traffic, which costs us thousands per annum to provide for it. It has drawn the whole of the poor into the low localities of Marylebone, and our poor rate has been increased by it very considerably. In making a great improvement of that sort as a Government measure arrangements should have been made for lodging-houses for the poorer classes.

2278. You are of opinion that the best plan to be now pursued would be to allow those coal duties to expire, and not to renew them?—Certainly.

2279. Do you think it would be expedient to anticipate the time when the coal duties will expire, and substitute for them a sort of improvement rate spread over the whole of the metropolis for general metropolitan purposes?—A general improvement rate, combined with representation at the Board, would be a very proper course. In Marylebone we are desirous of having a voice in all local taxation. It has been levied hitherto by an irresponsible corporation or by the Board of Works.

2280. Do you think that all public improvements in London could be executed by the parishes separately?—I think no persons are so well qualified as those who reside in the district, and represent the feeling of the neighbourhood.

2281. Is not it also a question of payment as well as representation? Do you think a large public improvement would be within the means of an ordinary London parish?—The amount raised by the coal duties would easily be raised by a rate. We are obliged to suffer the county rate, however extensive it may be. A short time ago they built an asylum and raised some thousands annually upon our parish to pay for the outlay.

2282. In what manner would you propose to raise the funds necessary for a large improvement, such as building a bridge over the Thames, or the widening of one of the great thoroughfares of the town?—If you can make the improvement appear to be of a metropolitan nature, then I say levy a rate upon the whole of the metropolis; if not, if it is a local improvement, let the tax be confined to the neighbourhood itself. The next point to which I wish to speak is, the tax upon carts going into the City of London. It appears by the returns of the City to be but a small sum, 5,000*l.* or 6,000*l.* a year; but no doubt as it is farmed, it amounts to considerably more. It has been the policy of the Road Trusts, the metropolitan Trusts especially, to extend the ambit of turnpikes; yet the City of London, pursuing a contrary policy, maintain the system of tolls. We do not ask for a toll for vehicles going to the Great Western Railway, though the road costs us thousands a year to keep up. A person going into the City for a carpet, has to pay for the patternof the carpet he takes with him, and for the carpet he brings back. It may be said that the sum is applied to carry out improvements in Clerkenwell; but I make the same answer to that which I did before, that monied men in Clerkenwell, would readily pay an improvement rate for the improvement, and you ought not to go to the parish of Marylebone, to make them pay for an improvement which cannot fairly be said to be a metropolitan one. These men collect the tax with great avidity. They look over the tail-board of our carts, and if they see the smallest thing they levy the tax. I think the tax also stands in the way of the City markets themselves.

2283. You admit that they have the right, but you think it ought to be put an end to?—That is the case. If I were to enlarge upon the fact that our paving is so extensively used by the general traffic to the railways, it would be a reason why we should ask for toll ourselves, but we do not do so; living in a large community, we must live and let live, and therefore we think the City of London should do the same.

Mr. C. George, Mr. T. D'Iffanger, and Mr. E. Hodges.

24th Nov. 1853.

2284. Are there any other points to which you wish to call our attention?—Not with respect to the tax upon coals, and on carts; but we wish to make one or two remarks, if permitted, upon the subject of municipalities. For the last three years I have taken a considerable part in the concerns of the parish of Marylebone.

2285. Are you a public officer?—I am one of the elected vestry. We are under Hobhouse's Act, and also special Acts, giving us the control over the churches we build, and over the poor, and over the pavements.

2286. Can you give us your opinion as to the relation which you think the parish of Marylebone ought to bear to the corporation of the City, strictly so called?—I think, for certain purposes, there should be a central board, call it what you please, a council or a corporation. I think, the less you give it the name which has hitherto existed, the more pleasant it will be to the community, and the more it will invite men of a superior class to join it. I can instance that in our own vestry. We have men of high position, in numbers, who are very eager to get elected as vestrymen, who would not like to be called common councilmen, or aldermen. We have 120 vestrymen, forty of whom go out annually, the election being by every householder, by ballot. The qualification of a vestryman is, to be rated to the amount of 40*l.* to the poor. We have no feasting. We have a glass of water only on the table when we meet, and yet we have no difficulty to get gentlemen to attend, to value the rental of the parish, to sit in appeals upon the rental, to attend to the poor and the pavements, which consist of fifty miles of carriage and eighty miles of footway, besides the highway districts.

2287. I believe the parish of Marylebone has never applied to be incorporated, in the common sense of the word?—(Mr. D'Iffanger.) No, it is not anxious to be so. I have frequently attended public meetings of the parish, and whenever anything respecting municipal institutions or privileges is mentioned, there is always applause, which indicates to my mind that the people are very anxious for it indeed.

2288. If they are anxious, why have they never formally applied to be incorporated?—In consequence of the expense.

2289. Do you understand that the parish of Marylebone wishes to be incorporated alone, or that the whole of the parliamentary borough wishes to be incorporated?—If I might be allowed to say so, we in Marylebone should be anxious that Marylebone itself should form a municipality. The City of London contains 129,128 inhabitants. Marylebone contains 157,679 inhabitants. Paddington contains 46,305 inhabitants, and St. Pancras 166,956. It would be desirable that Marylebone, St. Pancras, and Paddington should form separate municipalities, because Marylebone contains at the present time more inhabitants than the City of London, and so does St. Pancras. Paddington would consider it a very great boon, because Paddington is not in the same advantageous position that Marylebone is; they have not Hobhouse's Act,—they tried for it in the present year, and they tried for it two or three years ago, but they failed, and great fault is found with their churchwardens. In St. Pancras it would be a great boon too, because at the present time there are no less than seventeen paving trusts, which are extremely expensive; and if it were a municipality, the paving and lighting of course would be under one board, instead of seventeen boards, as at present. It would be extremely desirable if municipalities were granted to those three parishes; the voting should be the same as under Hobhouse's Act.

2290. As the law at present stands, it would not be possible for a single parish to be made into a corporation; but if there were a corporation at all for Marylebone, it must include the whole of the parliamentary district, must not it?—Marylebone is so very large,—it is larger in point of population than the City of London,—and as it is so extensive, and we are to have very soon a new Reform Bill, if those three parishes could form municipalities, it is more than probable that the Government might concede a member to each.

2291. What, do you think, would be the advantage of incorporating each one of those parishes separately, compared with the plan of incorporating the whole of the parliamentary borough of Marylebone under the Municipal Act?—The area would be so extensive. The borough extends from Highgate as far as Kensington.

2292. Is it larger than Liverpool or Manchester?—I should think there are more people.

2293. Does it appear to you that the population of that area would be too large for that municipality?—I think it would. Our present officers find that they have quite sufficient to do to regulate the affairs of Marylebone parish, and it would cause great confusion should it be incorporated; in fact it would not be a benefit if the borough were incorporated into a municipality; it would be a great boon if there were three municipalities.

2294. Do you think the existing parochial government and the parochial feeling in each of the separate parishes would resist the incorporation of the three parishes into one body?—I think they would resist it. I think they would prefer having them separate.

2295. Do you think the whole of the district of the parliamentary borough of Marylebone would desire to be formed into a corporation, or would they prefer to be left as they are?—I think they would prefer municipal government.

2296. Even if they desired to be formed into one corporation?—I think so.

2297. But they have never formally applied for the purpose?—The expense and difficulty have been so great.

Mr. C. George, Mr. T. D'Iffanger, and Mr. E. Hodges.

2298. At present the application can be only made by the majority of the rate payers, can it?—I am not prepared to say. Sir Benjamin Hall explained to me that, however desirable it might be, the expense would be greater than the public would be willing to pay; but at the present time, when it is very probable, at least so we imagine from reports, that the City of London will undergo a change, there is an opportunity for other parishes to express their desires and opinions.

2299. Supposing London were parcelled out into municipalities, each one having its separate council, or whatever might be the name of it, would it be possible in your opinion to have a combined council for the whole of the metropolis, which should embody the representative principle, and have powers of taxation for general metropolitan purposes?—I believe that persons who have considered the subject would be very desirous that such a plan should be carried out; that is the principle they would wish to see carried out.

2300. Some plan of that sort you think would not be unacceptable in the parish of Marylebone?—It would be most acceptable. The principle there is that there should always be representation wherever there is taxation.

(Mr. George.) Of course Mr. D'Iffanger has given an individual opinion. The subject has never been discussed in Marylebone, neither in the vestry nor at public meetings. We consider that the establishment of any municipality in the parish of Marylebone would take from us the amount of power which we now possess, and give us the name without the reality. In St. Pancras the case is different; they have no control over the churches or over the pavements, which we have.

2301. Your individual opinion, therefore, would be against incorporating Marylebone?—I should rather take the good example of the working of Hobhouse's Act with our local Acts, and compulsorily apply it to all sections of the metropolis, and from the elected vestry select so many persons to the central board, which might be the corporation of London, if you pleased so to call it; then, when they met, let them elect their president or head, calling him mayor, or president, or what you like.

2302. Your plan would involve a separate municipal government for each parish?—Yes.

2303. That might work very well in a large parish such as Marylebone. How would it work in a small parish?—Take the small parishes comprised in the Strand union; you there cluster certain small parishes together for the purpose of electing poor law guardians. Do the same with those and other small parishes for municipal purposes. While you are trying to reform the corporation of London, I think you should try to do justice to the whole of the parishes. There is a variety of systems afloat; in many parishes, there is what is called an open vestry; when you come to the question of voting, Sturges Bourne's Act is introduced, and the voice of the general body is swamped by the votes arising from property. Hobhouse's Act has been shown to produce a cheap and efficient government.

2304. What would be your objection to combining the three parishes of the present parliamentary borough of Marylebone into a single municipality?—I can conceive no objection beyond this, that in the arrangement of a municipality, such as I have heard described, you would take from us the privileges which we already enjoy, and give them to the central board.

2305. I will suppose the parliamentary borough of Marylebone is placed under the provisions of the General Municipal Act. In what respect would Marylebone be a loser under that system?—The general provisions of the Municipal Act they would be gainers by, because the general provisions of the Municipal Act give them the power of erecting gaols, carrying out all improvements; overseeing the supply of water and gas, and the extension of education, baths and washhouses, public libraries, and every important improvement, in fact, is by the Municipal Act vested in them.

2306. Do you think that the parish of Marylebone would in any way be the losers, if the parliamentary borough of Marylebone were placed under the provisions of that Act?—Certainly not. The only objection I can see to that is this, that in a cluster of parishes or boroughs, all merging into each other, there must be some of those matters taken from the locality and made central. For example, sewers and police. There are parties who contend that Marylebone can manage its own police, but commen sense tells me that it requires to be managed by one central body. So of general improvements; the metropolis might be fairly represented by one central board, which should be the concentrated essence of all the vestries or municipalities round London.

2307. You think that the parish of Marylebone would not object if the parliamentary borough were placed under the provisions of the general Municipal Act, and if certain subjects, such as the police, the sewers, and the administration of justice by the magistrates, were withdrawn from the separate municipalities, and placed under one general body?—It is my opinion that it would, but that of course is an individual opinion. Many would say we have all that power already, and what is the advantage in a change of name.

2308. Do you think there would be a strong parochial feeling against the combination of the three parishes under one municipal government?—They have hitherto been separate, and their interests seem to be so little in common, that I consider it would be regarded as a hardship, and would be objected to. The vestry have the choice of the guardians of the poor. We do not consider ourselves in any measure under the control of the Poor Law Board. We may be joined to parishes who have not that privilege. We have bonded debts also, which have been created for building churches, &c. Supposing we were joined with other parishes in the municipality, what would become of those debts? Would they be made chargeable upon the whole municipality? It has been suggested to me that the reason why Marylebone has not applied to be put under the general Municipal Act is because we saw that there were certain matters, such as police, sewers, &c., which must necessarily be carried out by a central board, and conjointly we should obtain no advantage by doing so. I think there is a great aversion to the titles of alderman and lord mayor. Any other name would be better; and I am certain that there are many persons of station in our vestry who would not go into the corporation of London, though they are very proud to be in their present position.

(Mr. Hodges.) Might I be permitted to say that I think, from what I have noticed, having had a great deal to do with public meetings, and the expression of public opinion in the parish of St. Pancras, and something, though to a less degree, in Paddington, that they would prefer a municipality which would include the whole of the three parishes, for this reason, that the same staff of officers and the same machinery could be used for the whole of the municipality as for each municipality. The ratepayers, of course, always look to economy in these matters as well as to efficiency.

W. J. Kearns, Esq.

W. JOHN KEARNS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:

2309. Are you connected with the City of London?—I am.

2310. In what capacity?—As wharfinger.

2311. Are you connected with the corporation?—I am not.

2312. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commission any points with regard to your trade, to which you desire to call our attention?—I have waited upon you in accordance with a request which I have received. I have no grievance to state; it is not by my own act entirely that I am here. I am aware that in matters connected with my own trade, certain grievances exist in the case of merchants and importers, arising from regulations which were originally good, possibly, but which have been outgrown by the City, and its increased trade. The metage is one of those great grievances, and it is most injurious to the port of London.

2313. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commissioners what is the operation of the metage system?—A metage upon corn and fruit, viz: nuts and apples, is claimed by the City, and often very prejudicially to the merchants. There have been serious disputes upon their being levied upon corn when only in transit. With regard to nuts and apples, it is not only injurious to the public, but it is injurious, very frequently, to the port, by preventing a foreigner sending cargoes here upon speculation, unlike Crown duties, which are not levied on goods landed, if subsequently exported to another country. The City tax is certain, while the profit is uncertain. For instance, Spanish nuts change hands frequently at 6*d.* a bag profit, out of which the metage would be twopence, and the porterage another twopence. Of course, foreigners, Spaniards more particularly, hesitate to send a cargo into this market, where they are sure to incur certain expense, and may not reap the desired profit.

2314. Might they not import them into Southampton, or some of the southern ports, in which case they would be exempt from metage?—If landed at Southampton, metage would be claimed in London if sent here viâ rail and lighter. They would then have the expense of railway carriage, because London is the great mart to which they come.

2315. What amount of difference do you calculate there is between the expense of metage, as it would be without the interference of the City, and as it is at present?—About half.

2316. Would the goods you speak of be measured on landing if the City meters were not employed?—Only a very small portion; many cargoes, the bulk of the nuts in particular, are in bags. The bulk of the dried apples are in baskets. The meter would turn out one bag, or occasionally one basket; that is the extent of what he would do; that is unnecessary, inasmuch as the matter would be settled with the Crown officers, without the intervention of the meter. The necessity which now exists for the presence of the meter very often occasions great delay. The surveyor of the customs will not arrange for the duty, possibly, because the meter has not seen them. Subsequently, when the meter has seen them, there will be a difference of opinion existing, trifling in itself, but still a cause of great delay to the public. If the matter rested solely with the customs, that difficulty would not exist. With regard to dried apples, the case is precisely the same. There may be a question as to the quantity to be taken to the bushel, and great delay may be occasioned by the absence of the meter, or the absence of the surveyor. If the matter rested with the Crown there would be no difficulty.

2317. According to your statement, the importer is now subject to a double inconvenience, to a payment for which he gets no equivalent, and to the delay caused by unnecessary metage?—Precisely so.

2318. Do you consider that the joint effect of those two circumstances acts in a manner seriously detrimental to the trade in fruit?—I do.

2319. Is it an evil of considerable magnitude, or trifling only?—It is a great evil with regard to those articles. Of course, those articles form but a very small portion of the trade of London, but on them it is a very great evil.

2320. Does the metage apply to all sorts of fruit?—No. Nuts, apples, and onions it applies to.

2321. Do you think that the City fruit meter is in any way a protection to the importer?—Not the least.

2322. Or to the purchaser?—He is not between the merchant and the buyer; he simply regulates the metage at the time of landing.

2323. Do you think the charge excessive?—The charge is excessive for porterage; it might be well reduced to one-half.

2324. What is the City gauger?—He is appointed by the City for the purpose of general reference by the merchants with regard to all wines and oils.

2325. Do you think the City gauger a useful officer?—Very.

2326. What is the distinction you are disposed to draw between the gauger and the meter?—The goods I have instanced are most of them in packages, the contents of which are ascertained and known. A cask differs very materially from other packages. The gauge of a cask is a matter which no man without great experience can tell. It requires a man of great experience to be constantly employed for the protection of the merchant. He is a check on the part of the merchant against the Crown officer, who gauges for the Customs, and also a check against his correspondent.

2327. Are the charges of the City gauger excessive?—No; they are very moderate.

2328. In point of fact, then, you think, as far as the gauger is concerned, there is no complaint to be made; but on the contrary, it would be desirable that he should be kept very much in the situation which he now occupies?—He is a very beneficial officer.

2329. Is there anything in regard to the fruit porters to which you wish to call our attention?—The fruit porters, under the name of fellowship porters, consist of forty men. Of course forty men are not at all equal to discharge the different fruit ships which now fill the port of London, and their numbers are made up by a great number of supernumerary hangers-on of those men, parties whom they allow to work with them, the bulk of whom are great thieves; men who, under the corporation banner, enter premises and ships, and over whom no one has any control. They set you at defiance,—you cannot remove them from the ship though you know that their object is plunder. There are very few of the vessels which enter the port of London but suffer in some degree from robberies committed by those men, and there is no sufficient surveillance to prevent their taking place.

2330. Has the corporation the power of exercising control over the City porters?—I presume they have over the fellowship porters, but not beyond. If complaint is made to the fellowship, they say, "We cannot help it, we have nothing to do with those extra men," though they, the fellowship, allow them to work with them.

2331. Then where does the control reside; is it with the company or with the corporation?—I have often endeavoured to find out, but have never succeeded; they have frequently defied me. I have watched a man, and been perfectly satisfied that his object was plunder, and attempted to remove him from the ship in consequence; but the police have refused to interfere unless I gave him in charge, which could only be done after a robbery had been committed. The "extra man" would appeal to the fellowship, who would say, "This man is about to work, there is his knot;" and he would retain his place, while the moment he had his opportunity he would pocket whatever came in his way. I convicted one of these men last year, a man whom I had known for some six or seven years working with the fellowship, and I was not aware till I had him taken in custody that he was not a fellowship porter. It then turned out that he was one of those hangers-on who had been so long mixed up with them that it was impossible for the wharfingers, or the merchants, or any other persons to know that he was not one of the men known as a fellowship.

2332. Your complaint is, that there is in reality no efficient control exercised over those fellowship porters and their followers, whom you are obliged to employ?—Yes.

2333. Do you consider that you are put to considerable inconvenience in consequence of being obliged to employ those fellowship porters, instead of being at liberty to employ the porters whom you would yourself select?—Individually I am put to no expense; the merchant has to pay the fellowship for transporting those goods. I think he pays fifty per cent. perhaps more than he should do. The wharfinger is at no expense, but runs great risk of being robbed by the men thus forced upon his premises by the City.

2334. You think he pays double the amount he would pay under an open system?—Yes, exactly double.

2335. Besides the inconvenience of having less control over the porter than he would have under an open system?—Certainly.

2336. As a wharfinger, are you acquainted with the manner in which the navigation committee of the corporation discharge their duties?—I am aware of the parties who are connected with the navigation, who are taken from the common council, and from what I know of the names and professions of some of those parties, I think the whole of the experience of that navigation committee is comprised in two gentlemen, Mr. Turnley and Mr Phillips, who are no doubt very excellent men for the purpose, and practically acquainted with the subject. Out of the twenty-nine members who form that navigation committee, I think they are the only two who really would know what was proper to be done.

W. J. Kearns, Esq.

24th Nov. 1853.

2337. It has been stated to the Commissioners, that although the navigation committee is pretty much as you have described it, yet they have selected a very good harbour master, in whom they have confidence; and the result is, that the duties of the committee are performed in a satisfactory manner. Have you any reason to doubt the accuracy of that statement?—I think the harbour master is well selected, and that he is a clever man; but I think the river is of such vital importance to the port of London, that it ought to be placed under better surveillance. No fault can be found with the arrangements of the harbour master or his deputies, which, considering the extent of the river, are excellent; but I cannot combine in my mind the duties of the harbour master with the deliberations of the navigation committee. The harbour master has simply to enforce certain regulations, and provide proper moorings and anchorage for the shipping, &c. The duties of the committee, I think, are of a higher order, and comprehend not merely the safety or the convenience of ships, but the properly preserving such lines of demarcation as shall ensure safety to the buildings on the river's banks, and the bridges, piers, or watercourses which might be injured by improper alterations or encroachments. My impression is, "from the present mark of the tides at high water," that if straight lines are adopted, and stone or brick walls are permitted to take the place of old piles, where the water now flows, that a useful river will be converted into a rapid current, and the result be most disastrous. In fact, my impression is, that the river Thames is of too much importance to be entrusted to men, who, however respectable, know nothing of its sets of tide, of its currents, eddies, bights, points, banks, or bottoms;—who never think of the effect of a strong northerly gale, or the possible consequences of a month's rain. I do not pretend to offer any scheme to men of greater talent, and better position than myself, but should be happy to see a navigation committee formed entirely of practical men, at whose frequent deliberations either an Admiralty officer presided, or that it should be imperative that any or every alteration, "however slight," should be reported to a Government board.

2338. Is there any other point connected with the corporation of London to which you wish to advert?—I would say one word with regard to the magistracy. I think it would be impossible to improve their police courts. I have occasionally been present there, and have always found great patience exercised by the magistrates, and great desire to arrive at the truth, and none of the petulancy which the press sometimes have repressed in the paid magistracy. I am perfectly unacquainted with the gentlemen, not having the honour of knowing a single alderman, but I have always fancied they were exceedingly well selected to fulfil the duties of the station they hold, and, from living among the people, they are prepared to know the habits of those who are brought before them. They also appear well supported on points of law by the gentlemen who assist them, and to be able to meet the cases as they arise.

H. Bateman, Esq.

HENRY BATEMAN, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2338*a*. Are you connected with the City of London?—I am connected with the City of London, as being a merchant in the City, and of course a freeman, which I have been for the last thirty years, and a liveryman of the Goldsmiths' Company.

2339. Are you a common councilman?—No.

2340. You are an inhabitant of the City of London?—My business is in the City of London.

2341. What is the nature of your business?—I am a timber merchant.

2342. Are there any points connected with the corporation of London to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—Very many. As a person who has been thirty years resident there, and who has taken generally, for the last twenty years, some little and not inconsiderable interest in the business of elections in the district in which I live, I feel that I am qualified to do so. I am a resident in the ward of Bishopsgate, one of the largest and most influential wards, returning fourteen members to the common council. Without any boasting, I may say, that if anybody has taken an interest about the elections of common councilmen, no one has so much interfered in the matter as myself.

2343. Were you ever a candidate yourself?—No; I might have been, many years; I have oftentimes been asked to be so, which is part of the disadvantage under which I labour. My great aim has been hopeless about much reform in the common council itself, or the corporation itself, to mend it in detail. I have no interest, part or parcel, in the corporation in any way whatever, being perfectly independent of it; still I hope I am sufficiently patriotic to try to mend that to which I belong, and I have often tried in my own ward, which is a large and very influential one, to induce persons to come forward as common councilmen; but the point and gist of my remarks here is, that the office is so unpopular, so generally tainted and low in public estimation, that when I have asked anybody to become a member of the council, the remark has been thrown back upon me, "Why are you not a common councilman yourself?" which is a sufficient answer to me if I ever apply to any one whom I think I should like to vote for. I have no answer to that except that I decline.

2344. To what do you attribute the indisposition to accept offices connected with the corporation?—I think in the City generally (excepting, of course, persons in the common council and the corporation, their dependants and expectants), the opinion of modern active men is that it is a tiresome, worn-out, troublesome thing, in the way of improvement, and persons are hopeless of mending it; it then comes to this, that other persons of another class have come to be common councilmen; I have myself been instrumental in getting gentlemen to become common councilmen, for whom I have great respect, as the best gentlemen of the class whom I could get, not the ones I should choose; but for lack of others, I have been obliged to ask them to come, and have generally succeeded in getting them the situation; but the misfortune is here, that when that class comes to be grouped together, the men we want or think would be desirable will not join them.

2345. Are you of the opinion which has been expressed before this Commission by one witness at least, that it would be desirable altogether to abolish municipal institutions in the City of London?—A friend of mine gave that evidence, but I entertain a very different opinion from him; our present corporation I would certainly abolish.

2346. What are the outlines of the change you would desire to effect in the civic institutions of London?—The Commission has already had many suggestions, which I am afraid may come upon them as plentifully as blackberries, and they may be thought nothing of. I have put down here what I would call suggestions: "That the metropolis "be divided according to the parliamentary boundaries into separate municipalities; the "City proper, Marylebone, Finsbury, Tower Hamlets, Southwark, Lambeth, and if "Chelsea and Kensington with Belgravia should ever obtain borough rights, then that "district form a seventh municipality; each municipality to do and to be just what "country municipalities do and are, with such exceptions as are hereafter mentioned; "everything in the City of London found by the Commissioners not to be in accord with "the usage and spirit of the time, to be put aside, or altered, modified, and re-arranged, "as may be deemed expedient; whatever of vested interest or property is found to "belong properly to the City, to be preserved to it; its future duties being carefully "and specially prescribed. In the City proper, and in each borough, elections to be on "the same day, as in all county boroughs; voters, the parliamentary list only; if it be "thought expedient to reserve the right of voting in the City to the livery, let it only be "to the livery in existence at the day of the date of the Act of Parliament; in each "municipality there should be twenty-one councillors, one of whom shall be chairman or "president. Each council out of its own body to select four, to be delegated to a central "body of twenty-four, who shall be aldermen, not of the City of London, but aldermen "of London; and these aldermen, out of their own body, shall elect one to be Lord "Mayor of London for the year. Councillors so elected to be aldermen, to retain all their "rights and privileges in their own separate municipalities. In the initial proceeding "for electing the Lord Mayor, the senior alderman present to be chairman; if the numbers "on a division are even, having a second or casting vote; the Lord Mayor, when chosen, "having also the one or two votes as may be required. Committees in each municipality "elected for three years; one-third, however, retiring every year eligible to re-election. "The aldermen elected every year, eligible to re-election. All matters in any way per-"taining to the general interests of the metropolis, such as police, water, sewerage, "prisons, sanitary measures, paving, or whatever the Commissioners (afterwards Act of "Parliament) may indicate as metropolitan, can be originated in each separate munici-"pality, but cannot be carried out without report first made to the aldermen, and their "assent. The Lord Mayor shall not reside in the Mansion House, which shall be used as "the justice room for the stipendiary magistrate, for meetings of the aldermen, for the "offices of business belonging to that body, and any special municipal purpose to which they "shall think fit to apply it. A sum of money not exceeding 3,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* per annum con-"tributed in equal proportion by the metropolitan municipalities, to be at the disposal of "the aldermen to be expended in such way as shall best beseem so great a city. Dinners "to public men, literary, scientific, political, to other municipalities, to foreigners, in literary "or scientific soirées,—all to be decided and ordered by the aldermen, but never to exceed "the prescribed annual amount; nor must it be permitted that any Lord Mayor should "exceed by his own private means. Lord Mayor to preside at all meetings of the alder-"men, or if unable to attend, his nominee, being an alderman. Lord Mayor a magistrate "for the year, specially for municipal or commercial purposes. Aldermen not magistrates, "because aldermen. The municipality of the City of London to use the offices at the "Guildhall for their meetings and the transaction of their business matters. If a second "stipendiary magistrate expedient, to sit in an office at the Guildhall. Sheriffs of London "and Middlesex to be nominated at a general council of all the metropolitan munici-"palities, to be held at a stated day in the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor presiding. "A sum carefully calculated as the necessary expenditure of a sheriff to be appropiated "thereto; the sheriff to render audited accounts quarterly, which are to be immediately "paid; but the annual amount not to exceed the regulated sum. Sheriff to do his own "work as prescribed, having nothing to do with the corporation, except to report annu-"ally. If sheriffs cannot be procured on such terms, let the nomination be as everywhere

H. Bateman, Esq.

" else throughout the country ; chamberlain not necessary. Let all monies collected be " paid into the Bank of England, to the account of the Lord Mayor and aldermen, or the " separate municipalities, as the case may be ; and let all accounts be kept in every " department as any merchant or banker would keep his accounts. Three auditors to be " elected in each municipality for the separate examination of the accounts of each. The " whole number of auditors may meet together once to nominate three others to inspect " the accounts of the Mayor and aldermen. An annual report to be printed and dis- " tributed ; that of the Lord Mayor and aldermen to every voter in the metropolis ; that " of each separate municipality to each voter in the district. Power by law to make " municipal rates. Every decision by a simple majority. All elections and divisions to " be by ballot. All political matters excluded. Lord Mayor, aldermen, and councillors " to be satisfied to be as well dressed as members of the House of Commons. All tom- " foolery to be abolished." Those are my suggestions arising from an experience of thirty years. The Commission will see that I am a thorough disbeliever in the present constitution of things. I have seen the working of the system, seen their elections, witnessed Lord Mayor's day, seen the sheriffs' day, dined with the Lord Mayor ; and I only wish to say, as one of an outside body, I am sure I speak the sense of a great many thousands of citizens, that it is a grievous offence to them, and nothing would be so acceptable to them as that it should be changed ; I am sure that is a calm and quiet announcement of a simple fact. I have seen common halls and know how they are packed. I would suggest to the Commissioners, if they want to know more about those 'long-shore men, which are so great a grievance and scandal in the City, that they should ask such a man as Mr. Rose respecting them. Some of the City men who come up here will tell you who he is. Gentlemen, men of thought and feeling, do not often go there. Those 'long-shore men used to be originally watermen, boatmen, and men of that order ; but it has come to be the descriptive name now of a certain class of poor livery men, who are to be obtained by a day's wage, as they call it, something which hires them to do certain work. Those men fill the halls, control the elections, get shows of hands, and altogether make the whole of the elections of the City of London a great mockery.

2347. Do you think it desirable that the livery should retain their votes for the City officers ?—I do not. I am a liveryman ; but I know how liverymen are made. In the olden time the institution was good and right for its then purposes ; skilled men of the different trades banded together, and the men who then were skilful in their hands, or thoughtful in the construction of anything, were considered to be fitting men to be taken care of, and to be put in some position. I belong to the Goldsmiths' Company, but I am not a goldsmith ; I am a timber merchant. The liverymen of the Goldsmiths' Company are very few of them goldsmiths. The Goldsmiths' Company is a great political organization ; high Tory. They will not elect a man who is not a high Tory. They make votes, and they have votes for the City officers.

W. S. Masterman, Esq.

WILLIAM STANLEY MASTERMAN, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2348. Are you a practising attorney and solicitor ?—I am.

2349. Where do you reside ?—My chambers are at 15, Clifford's Inn, Fleet Street.

2350. Have you any statement to make in respect to the exclusion of attorneys and solicitors from the Lord Mayor's Court ?—I have some suggestions to make in reference to the Lord Mayor's Court of London. Having understood that the Lord Mayor's Court had been thrown open to the legal practitioners of England, I went to the Lord Mayor's Court office, and there signed a roll, as we do at Westminster, thinking, as an attorney of Her Majesty's courts at Westminster, I should be at liberty to practise in that court, by some order, as I understood, of the common council. I have, however, learnt that there are six attorneys who have hitherto enjoyed the exclusive privilege of practising in that court, similar to that possessed by the attorneys which we had in the Palace Court of old ; and that in consequence of some one of the new attorneys beginning to practise, arising out of this resolution of the common council, one of the six has commenced an action against him. I believe it was Mr. Cox, who is an attorney in Broad Street, and also a member of the common council. That being so, I felt I should scarcely be safe, notwithstanding this resolution of the common council, in presuming to practise in that court, because I did not wish, of course, to bring upon me an action-at-law. I have therefore abstained from doing anything in that court. If the Commissioners will excuse me I would observe, that we see the perfect inefficacy, practically, of the Court of Common Council coming to any such resolution as this, which leaves attorneys open to an action to be brought at the instance of one of the six exclusive attorneys. I have been told that those six attorneys, or their predecessors, actually paid the corporation for those offices. It is then put by them to their brethren, " Is it fair, we having paid for those offices, that you " should be allowed to come in and sweep away our privileges ?" Assuredly, it appears to be a very unjust thing that the Court of Common Council should have taken away those privileges from those six gentlemen without giving them any compensation. We remember that the Legislature, in regard to the Palace Court, compensated the particular attorneys practising there ; but it would appear, though I do not know the fact, that these attorneys of the Lord Mayor's Court received nothing whatever.

2351. Have they all paid for their situations?—I cannot say.

2352. The Commissioners were informed that in the case of the pleaders, as the offices fell in, the corporation declined to resell them?—I hope the Commissioners will understand that I am only stating what is floating about as a report. Of course, it is very difficult to get at the facts. With regard to the practice of that court, a client of mine was served with a process out of that court. It is a notice that A. B. has entered a plaint, and that if there is any cash of the alleged defendant, or anything of the sort within the confines of the City, an attachment will be put upon it. Before an appearance can be entered to that process, as in the superior courts at Westminster, and a man can defend that action, he is constrained to find heavy bail. In the case of which I speak, which was a case of an alleged debt, for there was really a valid defence to the action, unless my client could find bail for 500*l.* he could make no defence whatever. See, then, the injustice done to the whole body of creditors. Here one man may possibly get hold of a sum of money in the hands of a banker or solicitor, or whoever else it may be, exclusive of the general body of creditors. I humbly conceive, therefore, that this practice is extremely mischievous, looking at the general policy and wisely improved condition of the laws of England.

2353. Is there any other point connected with the franchise of the freemen of the City to which you wish to allude?—Yes; I happen to be a freeman of London. I thought it right, as many other gentlemen appeared to be freemen of London, that I should become so. I went through the necessary ordeal, being then one of the householders in the ward of Farringdon Without. I think I have exercised my right to vote for the common council upon one occasion; but on the 1st of August, 1849, an Act passed the Legislature, which professed to give greater privilges to freemen than they had hitherto enjoyed; in fact that was the pretence for this particular Bill. In the preamble of the Bill, it states that the Legislature thinks it wise that those advantages should be extended and enlarged; but I find by the second clause of the Act, that not only are you to occupy warehouses, cellars, or shops, or something of that kind in the City of the value of 10*l.*, to enable you to vote for this class of officers, but you are also to be upon the parliamentary list of voters in addition; so that supposing, by mere accident, a man is excluded from the parliamentary list, he finds himself entirely excluded from this list of voters for corporate officers. So he has a double duty to perform: he must see that he is on the parliamentary list, for if he is not there, he does not make his appearance upon the list made out under the new Act for the regulation of municipal offices. Why parliamentary rights should be mixed up with municipal rights, I, as a lawyer, never could understand, and as a freeman I think it unfair. If I have an office in the City of London, for which I am paying 30*l.* or 40*l.* a year, it appears to me very hard that I cannot go to the Old Bailey or wherever it may be, and give my vote for the gentleman whom I prefer. I live at Croydon, which is beyond the boundary (seven miles), and therefore I lose my vote, not only for parliamentary purposes, but also for municipal purposes. In the fifth clause, which states the qualification of a common councillor, we find exactly the same ingredient, that you shall not only occupy within the City or liberties a counting house, &c., but you shall also be on the parliamentary list of voters for the City of London. The result is, to my personal knowledge, that they positively keep only a certain knot of persons filling those offices, to the exclusion of gentlemen, who I think would feel a delight and pleasure in endeavouring to do any gratuitous amount of good which they might be able to do to the City of London. I think, therefore, that that is a very unfortunate statute. I know the corporation had the conduct and government of this affair, and I say the Act does not come up to what it professed to be. I mentioned it to one of the representatives of London, and took the liberty of saying I thought it was a mistake. He said he understood it would be rectified. Certainly, after paying one's fees, one hopes to have the privileges for which one bargained.

2354. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—There is an office still in being, known as the secondary of London; there were two. On the death of the late Mr. James, who had been secondary some years, Mr. Potter, being his colleague, who is now the remaining secondary, considering myself fit for that office, and having some knowledge of Mr. Cotterill, who then was one of the sheriffs, I took the liberty of writing and offering myself to succeed Mr. James. I saw Mr. Cotterill upon the hustings on one occasion in Guildhall. He said, "I have received your letter, and if the office were in my gift, I would appoint you." He then asked the under sheriff a question touching this appointment, and he was told that the appointment was in the gift of the common council, and not with him as sheriff. I would take leave to remind the Commissioners that here is a state of things which is very different to that existing in the other counties and cities of England, where we see the wholesome and wise practice pursued of pricking for sheriffs, who appoint their own under sheriffs. The effect is, that in London there is a constant monopoly, and we find that instead of the sheriffs of London and Middlesex being always what we should like to see them, the office is too often made a kind of job. We find two or three solicitors, who are usually under sheriffs of London and Middlesex; and at the present moment a member of my own profession, Mr. Sheriff Wire, who is actually in practice, is an alderman and sheriff of the City of London; and Mr. Anderton, who has been under sheriff once or twice before, is again under sheriff. This appears to me to be a course of practice which is fraught with mischief. I conceive that it is not proper that practising solicitors should have the execution of writs in sheriffs' offices. It is likely to be a very injurious practice to the community, and we know that in no other county or city can we, as practising solicitors, be either magistrates or sheriffs. I hope I shall be excused for calling your attention to these facts. For these reasons, I conceive I may be permitted to add, that if some wholesome change were made by Act of Parliament for the better government of the corporation of London and its privileges, it would be an acceptable boon to the freemen of London.

2355. Before that Act of Parliament was passed, which professes to amend the 11th of George I., was not it necessary, in order to qualify a man to be a voter for aldermen and common councilmen, that he should be a householder in the City?—I cannot remember the exact words.

2356. If that were the case, this Act of Parliament did in some measure extend the right?—Yes; but I believe that the question was never well understood. If a freeman resided in a room in the City of London, I think he was permitted to vote.

2357. If, before the Act passed, a person who occupied a warehouse or shop in the City, but did not reside there, was nevertheless entitled to vote; then this Act of Parliament would rather cut down his right?—Exactly so.

2358. If, on the other hand, by the 11th of George I., in order to entitle him to vote, he must have been an actual householder, that Act of Parliament extended his right?—Yes.

Adjourned to to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

Friday, 25th November, 1853.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

Captain W. J. Williams.
25th Nov. 1853.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM JOHN WILLIAMS having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2359. You are one of the prison inspectors?—I am.

2360. How long have you filled that situation?—About eighteen years.

2361. You are on the Home Circuit, are you not?—I have had the Home Circuit for six years.

2362. Do the City prisons come under your jurisdiction?—Wholly.

2363. Have you been able to form an opinion of the manner in which they are conducted?—I have.

2364. Are you in the habit of regularly inspecting them?—Very regularly indeed. I go very frequently through the whole of them.

2365. Will you have the goodness to state what prisons are under the control of the corporation of the City of London?—The prisons under the jurisdiction of the City of London are as follow: Newgate, which is the county gaol for Middlesex and a gaol for the City of London; the New Prison at Holloway, which is the house of correction for the City of London; the City Bridewell, which belongs to the Bridewell Hospital, but to which the aldermen of the City have the right of committing in conjunction with the chamberlain, and as I have lately understood, the comptroller of City lands. There is also the Debtors' Prison in Whitecross Street, for London and Middlesex; and also the Borough Compter, which is now disused, but which was lately occupied by women. In consequence of the great influx of female prisoners, I recommended that they should be removed there; but some doubts having entered into the mind of the Secretary of State, as also of the City authorities, as to the power of the City magistrates to commit there, prisoners were removed by the order of the Secretary of State under the statute, after conviction from the Giltspur Street Compter to that prison. Those are all the prisons within the City of London.

2366. The whole of those prisons are not situated within the limits of the City, are they?—The prison at Holloway is not.

2367. With that single exception are they so situated?—They are.

2368. Will you have the kindness to inform the Commissioners what is the state of each of those prisons?—Perhaps the Commissioners will allow me to state previously how they are situated under the statute, and then how they are managed. A very extraordinary power is given to the City of London under the 4th of George IV., chapter 64, by which the Court of Aldermen are constituted a Court of Quarter Sessions at all times for prison purposes. I will read the clause of the statute, if you will allow me. It is the 13th section of the 4th of George IV., chapter 64: "Be it enacted, That all powers and "authorities given by this Act to justices of the peace in general or quarter sessions "assembled in the several counties, and all other acts to be done and performed by "justices of the peace at any sessions in pursuance of this Act, shall be exercised and "performed, so far as regards the prisons in the City of London and liberties thereof, by "the Court of Mayor and Aldermen of the said City, as heretofore has been accustomed, "and not by the said mayor and aldermen as magistrates at the general or quarter

" sessions of the peace to be holden in and for the said City, anything in this Act con" tained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding."

2369. Does that clause lead to differences of practice between the City and other parts of the country?—It does; and I think it is a power which ought never to have been given to the City of London. The Court of Aldermen have the power and they do sometimes exercise the power by which strangers are excluded from their court, which is not the case in the Court of Quarter Sessions. In fact I have been present myself on one occasion in the Court of Aldermen when the subject under discussion related to the erection of the New Prison at Holloway, and the standing order was enforced for all strangers to withdraw. Consequently this may be done where money is voted away in superannuation to the officers, and in all other cases where, it this saving clause had not been inserted in the Act, the business would have been done as everywhere else in the public Court of Quarter Sessions.

2370. Is the Court of Aldermen in the habit of voting compensation allowances to prison officers?—It is.

2371. Under what power is that done?—I suppose it to be under the Act of Parliament the 4th of George IV., chapter 64. I cannot speak upon oath as to any actual case which has occurred, in which they have voted compensation under the statute, but I know that they do not adhere to the provisions of the Act, and have not adhered to the provisions of the Act in one particular case which has recently occurred. I cannot state the particulars of it, because I have only come to the knowledge of it by hearsay; but in the case of a late superannuation or rather pension to a prison officer, the governor of the late Giltspur Street Compter, I have understood that the Act of Parliament has not been adhered to. I am not able to explain why the aldermen have not adhered to the Act of Parliament, I only state what I have heard.

2372. Was the decision by which that grant was made come to in one of the courts which you have described with closed doors, the public being excluded?—That I cannot say. What I have understood is this, that it was by a recommendation from the gaol committee. I may say, that the gaol committee is composed of the mayor and aldermen. The gaol committee reported to the Court of Aldermen.

2373. Is the gaol committee composed exclusively of the mayor and aldermen?—Exclusively. This was a report, as I understand, from the gaol committee, composed of the mayor and aldermen to the Court of Aldermen as a sessions, who confirmed the report of the committee, and the sum of 500*l.* a year was granted.

2374. What can be the object of excluding the public on those occasions from the Court of Aldermen?—I have not the least idea. I can only speak to one occasion when I was excluded, being merely a spectator; but I know it is competent for any member of the Court of Aldermen to move that the public be excluded.

2375-6. Any resolutions which they come to for the payment of money must be afterwards published, must they not?—I am not aware. I have seen no notice as to the case referred to in the public papers; there may have been. I generally watch these things pretty closely, but I have not seen it. If the Commissioners will allow me, I will state my experience with regard to the management of the City prisons. I believe there are no prisons in the country where the visitation is so well kept up as in the City. The management of the prisons generally, I think, reflects very great credit upon the authorities there; at least it has been the case since I have been officially connected with the City. The new prison at Holloway is managed in a way which I should say would almost make it a pattern prison for the entire country.

2377. By whom is the actual superintendence exercised?—By the aldermen, the visiting justices. There is a rota, and the justices visit in turns.

2378. You are of opinion that the duty is very well performed?—Exceedingly well performed. The visiting perhaps is more frequent to those prisons in the City of London than to any of the prisons I am acquainted with anywhere. The attention paid generally by the aldermen reflects great credit upon them.

2379. Is the visitation of the aldermen exercised in rotation, or do they appoint a committee of visiting aldermen?—It is in rotation. With regard to Newgate prison, its construction is such, that it renders it totally impossible, even as a well regulated-prison, to do anything with it. It really is without a single qualification, but security from escape; it is a mere quarry of stone, without any order or convenience, or the possibility of establishing order within its walls. It is cut up into a variety of dark rooms, over which there is no inspection whatever; and though every attempt has been made, and the best advice has been taken on the subject, it has been found impossible to do anything with it with respect to its reconstruction.

2380. When was Newgate constructed?—Shortly after the riots in the year 1780. It was then burnt, and the present building has the most imposing and deterring exterior of any prison that I know of, and perhaps does more good by its out than its inside.

2381. Does it remain now in the state in which it was originally built?—Pretty much so. Improvements have been effected, and everything which could be done by the magistrates has been done. It is exceedingly clean, and the prisoners are generally well conducted, except when masses of transports have been congregated there together, when the Government at times have not been able to remove them.

2382. Is it your opinion that there is only one remedy for Newgate: namely, the entire abandonment of it, and the construction of a new prison, either on the same or a different site?—It is my opinion; and I think the present Lord Mayor coincides with me. The house of correction at Holloway is most admirably situated; it is infinitely too large as a house of correction solely for the City of London. There are at the present moment, and have been since the prison has been erected, from 100 to 200 cells vacant, which it is not at all likely will ever be filled; and the removal of the Newgate prisoners to Holloway, and constituting it the gaol for the county and City would, I think, be attended with amazing advantages. Then the City would have the opportunity of building ample and more convenient courts upon the site of Newgate.

Captain W. J. Williams.

25th Nov. 1853.

2383. What classes of prisoners are now confined in Newgate?—Middlesex prisoners, who are committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court, and others from the adjacent counties, comprised within the Act of Parliament. The population of Newgate is exceedingly fluctuating. In the intervals between the sessions of the Central Criminal Court there are scarcely any prisoners in Newgate, more especially since the jurisdiction of the assistant judge of Middlesex has been so largely extended. Mr. Serjeant Adams now tries a great proportion of the prisoners which were previously tried at the Central Criminal Court; consequently, Newgate is comparatively empty, and the labours of the Central Criminal Court are infinitely less than they used to be, which renders the removal of Newgate to Holloway much easier, if this had not been the case.

2384. The prisoners in Newgate are all untried?—They are, with the exception of the City of London convicts under sentence of transportation, who remain after trial there for a short time till they are removed.

2385. Are there any prisoners at Holloway who are not convicts?—It is a house of correction; none but convicted prisoners are committed there. At Newgate there may sometimes be prisoners sentenced to imprisonment without labour; when the judge wishes to pass a light sentence of a month or a fortnight for a very light offence, he sentences the man to imprisonment in Newgate, and occasionally prisoners are there for non-payment of taxes or frauds upon the revenue. There has been one case of a man who is not yet discharged, who has been there between three and four years for frauds and defaults connected with the revenue.

2386. How long has the new prison at Holloway been open?—About a year and a half.

2387. From what funds were the expenses of its construction defrayed?—I am not aware. I have asked the question, but never could ascertain.

2388. It was built at the exclusive expense of the City, was not it?—Entirely so.

2389. The plans were probably arranged in the ordinary manner; that is to say, submitted to the Secretary of State, and approved of by him?—Yes; and it is one of the most convenient prisons that I have met with. It reflects great credit upon the City architect, Mr. Bunning.

2390. No prisoners are confined in the prison at Holloway before trial, are they?—None.

2391. What is the reason of there being so many unoccupied cells in the prison at Holloway?—I can scarcely answer that question; it was built with 400 cells. One obvious reason is, that crime has in a certain measure decreased. I have no idea that the City had any intention of removing the prisoners from Newgate there, but the unoccupied cells certainly has induced the opinion, that it would be a great pecuniary saving to the City to do so, independently of the advantages accruing from the superiority of the penal discipline at Holloway. The salaries at Newgate are enormously large. They amount to 3,953*l.* annually, besides fees and emoluments.

2392. Are they fixed by the Court of Aldermen?—They are. Some of the officers have other trifling emoluments. The keeper has 700*l.* a year, with emoluments to the amount of 35*l.* 14*s.* The chaplain has 500*l.* a year, with other emoluments which are rather curious: he receives 6*l.* a year from the chamberlain, an old bequest of Lady Barnardiston; then he has 3*l.* 12*s.* from the sheriffs, in compensation for black cloth; he receives 10*l.* also as Newgate visitor, from Bethlem Hospital, a donation which dates from or previously to the time of Henry VIII. There being no priests specially deputed to visit the prisons at that period, the priests of the priory probably took upon themselves this duty, and the ordinary now receives this sum under the hospital charter.

2393. From your official capacity, are you well acquainted with the general scale of prison salaries in other parts of the country?—I am.

2394. Comparing the ordinary scale with that at Newgate, what is about the difference?—It must be remembered that the lessening of the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court has operated to materially diminish the number of prisoners committed for trial to Newgate, and therefore the salaries now appear so very much larger than they would have done when the number of prisoners was so much greater. Now, I think we have arrived at the time when those salaries may be reduced by uniting the gaol with the house of correction at Holloway. The salaries at Newgate are very large indeed for the number of prisoners; in fact, too large.

2395. Are the officers of the prison too numerous, as well as their salaries too large?—The population is so fluctuating at Newgate, that I can hardly give an opinion. By Act of Parliament, the counties which send their prisoners to the Central Criminal Court for trial, are obliged to convey them there so many days before the sitting of the court, which swells the population for a time, but in the intervals between the sittings of the court there are but comparatively few prisoners in Newgate; indeed, just before the sitting of the Central Criminal Court, Newgate may not be half full.

2396. Do you think, that considering what the state of Newgate was when the prison establishment was formed, the salaries at that time were too large?—I think some of them were. With regard to Newgate also I may observe, that the City do not require the payment of any charge from Middlesex for prisoners committed to Newgate as the county gaol. They defray the expense of all the Middlesex prisoners committed to the Central Criminal Court, and the Middlesex debtors in Whitecross Street prison are also a charge upon the City purse. The prisoners from other counties are charged for their maintenance at Newgate previously to trial.

2397. If county executions take place in the City, at which gaol is it?—At Newgate always.

2399. What would be the ordinary rate as regards untried prisoners in other prisons?—I should think not above 20*l.*

2400. What is the reason of that great difference?—The large amount of salaries, and the small number of prisoners.

2401. Is the condition of the prisoners in Newgate at all better than in the other prisons?—Not at all.

2402. Are there any funds added to the ordinary allowance for the maintenance of the prisoners in Newgate from ancient charities and endowments?—I am not able to state whether this is the case or not. I have no doubt but that there are bequests, but none are received by the governor or chaplain, and applied to prisoners; but there is a fund called the sheriffs' fund there, of a very considerable amount. The funded property now consists of 8,100*l.* in the 3 per cents.; 2,000*l.* in the 3¼ per cents.; and 1,000*l.* in the reduced. The funds are applied very beneficially to prisoners who are tried there, and who are acquitted; and even after conviction, when they have passed through their imprisonment, they are assisted and looked after; and lately a considerable portion of those funds have been applied to assist them in emigration.

2403. How has that fund been created?—By bequests; also by subscription, and from other sources. Each sheriff annually contributes, and there are a variety of other voluntary contributions.

2404. That fund is of great utility with regard to the prisoners at Newgate?—Very great utility. It is exceedingly well managed, and very liberally managed as regards the prisoners. There are also dinners given by the Lord Mayor and sheriffs on Christmas and New Year's day, to all the prisoners in the London prisons, which are paid for from the City purse. One of these dinners I have recommended to be discontinued, as vagrants and disorderlies have been known to get themselves committed for short terms, just before Christmas, that they might partake of them.

2405. Will you now pass to the City Bridewell?—The City Bridewell is situated in Bridge Street, Blackfriars, and is an appurtenance of the Bridewell Hospital. It is one of the most inconvenient and ill-arranged prisons that I ever saw, and I may add, a most useless one.

2406. What class of prisoners is confined there?—Generally vagrants committed by the magistrates, and apprentices by the chamberlain, and, as I now understand, by the comptroller of the City lands. I was quite aware that the chamberlain committed apprentices there, but I was not aware till a short time since that the comptroller of the City lands also exercised that power. If the Commissioners will allow me, I will read a copy of the conviction by the comptroller. It is as follows:—"City of London.—To the superintendent of Bridewell, in the said City, or his deputy. Receive into your custody the body of "Robert George Barrell Shields, the apprentice of Alfred Thomas Layton, citizen and stationer of the said City, duly convicted before me, comptroller of the said City, of indifference "to rebuke, being self-willed and hardened to any expostulation, inattention to business, "and spoiling his work by carelessness, with other acts of misconduct;—whom I have sentenced to be safely kept in your custody for the space of fourteen days. Him, therefore, "in your custody safely keep for the space of fourteen days. And for so doing this shall "be your warrant. Dated at the Guildhall of the said City, this second day of August, "1853.—Thomas Saunders, comptroller."

2407. Have the chamberlain and the comptroller a criminal jurisdiction over apprentices in the City?—I was not aware that the comptroller had. From my earliest visit to this prison, I had always found that the chamberlain had, but the exercise of the power by the comptroller is wholly new to me.

2408. Do you know under what legal authority he acts?—I have made some inquiry, and I could not ascertain.

Captain W. J. Williams.

25th Nov. 1853.

2409. Are there many instances of apprentices committed by the City authorities to this prison?—They average about ten a year; they would be very much better committed to Holloway, where the prison is so much more suitable for them.

2410. Are all the other prisoners vagrants?—Yes. Chiefly boys. Confinement in the prison acts most mischievously on boys. I have repeatedly spoken of it, and the authorities are themselves aware of it. In connexion with this prison is one of the most valuable institutions that I know of anywhere; I refer to the House of Occupation, which is attached to Bethlehem Hospital, and stands close to it It is an institution both for boys and girls, where they are educated and provided for when destitute, or after having been inmates of this prison. Every boy prisoner is asked whether he will go there; but unfortunately the connexion between the prison and the House of Occupation has such influence, the boys invariably refuse to go there, supposing that it is merely a step from one prison to another. I have always urged the abandonment of this Bridewell as a penal establishment. I am happy to say that there is a disposition now on the part of the governors and magistrates of the City to allow the jurisdiction to fall into abeyance, by not committing there, so that the House of Occupation may become of greater utility in reclaiming boys and girls also, whose cases would render it desirable to send them there for reformatory training, as at the Philanthropic Society at Redhill. It would, perhaps, induce the governors hereafter to remove the House of Occupation into the country, where the boys and girls would be much better trained, and subject to fewer temptations, than they are at the present; though it is even now a most valuable institution. I may add that the present cost of the prisoners at the City Bridewell, at an average of thirty prisoners, would amount to 50*l.* for each prisoner.

2411. Are vagrants of both sexes as well as of all ages committed to this prison?—They were; but lately, from a disposition to allow the jurisdiction to fall into abeyance, and from seeing the utter inutility of it for the treatment of women, the aldermen have ceased to commit women there, and they send them now to the House of Correction at Holloway.

2412. What would you propose with respect to Bridewell?—If there is any legal authority by which the governors of Bridewell are obliged to maintain it as a prison, I should think the sooner the Legislature gave them the power to discontinue it, and diverted the funds to the House of Correction, the better. It really is the most useless, and I may almost say, absurd institution as a penal one, that I ever met in my life. The prisoners have no court-yard to take exercise in, and the whole thing is of no public utility, and acknowledged to be so by the officers themselves. I may at the same time say, that the present treasurer, Mr. Johnson, has done everything in his power, as far as the buildings will admit, to make it a useful institution.

2413. Who are the governors of Bridewell?—They comprise a great number of influential persons; the Lord Mayor and aldermen are, by virtue of their office, governors. I believe, unfortunately, there has been some difference between some of the City authorities and the governors; but I am now happy to say that it is very likely that this prison may fall into complete abeyance, by the aldermen ceasing to commit there. Still I believe, by their charter, the governors of Bridewell are obliged to maintain a prison.

2414. Are there separate estates or endowments for the maintenance of Bridewell?—I am not aware.

2415. The Giltspur Street Compter is abandoned?—It is.

2416. Does it exist as a public building?—It does exist as a public building, for the City have not disposed of it, nor I believe have they at all come to a decision as to what uses they intend to apply it, or whether they intend to sell it. The House of Correction at Holloway is the next, and I believe certainly, as I said before, it is one of the best managed prisons in the country in every respect; and it reflects, I think, great credit upon the City magistrates.

2417. When was that constructed?—Two years ago. I come now to the Borough Compter, which is no longer used as a prison, all convicted prisoners being sent to the House of Correction at Holloway.

2418. Does that building still exist?—It does. I am not aware that the City of London have as yet disposed or it.

2419. Is there any other prison?—There is the Debtors' Prison for the City of London and the county of Middlesex. The prison was erected in the year 1812; at least, the Act received the Royal assent on the 29th of July, 1812. I believe there is scarcely a prison in England which is in so bad a condition, from its injudicious construction and inconvenient internal arrangements. To show that I am not singular in this opinion, I may as well quote a Report from a Committee of the House of Commons on this prison, before it was occupied. The committee was appointed to examine into the state of the King's Bench, Fleet, and Marshalsea prisons, and into the arrangements made for the better management of the prisons of Newgate, Giltspur Street, and the Borough Compters in the year 1814. This prison was then in course of construction, in fact it may be said to have been completed. The committee expressed their opinion to this effect:—
"No part of the prison is fire-proof—neither the floor, nor the division of the rooms; and "your committee have much to regret that those who have had the management of the "building, should have suffered a prison to be undertaken upon a plan so little likely to "answer its object as that which has been adopted by the London committee. They

Captain W. J. Williams.

25th Nov. 1853.

" are also of opinion that the placing debtors in large communities in the sleeping rooms " is a great aggravation to the pains of imprisonment, and they cannot conceive a mode " by which the distressed situation of a debtor can be more augmented, or the forlorn " condition of a decent and respectable woman more aggravated, than the turning them, " on the first day of their arrival, into a room with six to fifteen persons, most of them " probably strangers to the new comers, and many perhaps of characters and manners " the most disreputable. Such, then, is the plan and arrangement of the new London " prison, which is, as far as the women's apartments and those for the debtors from the " Giltspur Street, Ludgate, and Poultry Compters, nearly completed. No alteration can " now take place. But your committee cannot approve of the plan; and they regret " that so much money has been so ill laid out." I beg to confirm every word of that report.

2420. Has any improvement been made since the date of that report?—None. I will explain the wretched arrangements of this prison: this debtors' prison comprises four prisons within its walls. There were four old prisons, called Ludgate, Poultry, the Compter, and Giltspur Street, where debtors and other prisoners were received. By the Act the 52d of George III., chapter 209, this prison was appropriated to debtors from all the City prisons and the county of Middlesex, preserving still the old distinctions and jurisdictions. It was enacted, " That when the said new prison and offices shall be erected and built " as hereinbefore is mentioned, the said new prison shall be called the Debtors' Prison " for London and Middlesex, and such one of the four parts or prisons into which the said " new prison shall be separated and divided as aforesaid, as the said Court of Mayor and " Aldermen shall think proper for that purpose, shall and is hereby declared to be the " prison for persons confined under civil process in the custody of the sheriff of Middlesex, " and shall be appropriated accordingly, and that such two others of the said parts or prisons, " as the said Court of Mayor and Aldermen shall think proper for those purposes, shall " and are hereby declared to be the two Compters of the City of London, and shall be " appropriated for the custody of prisoners confined under civil process in the custody of " the sheriffs of London; and that the remaining or other part of the said four parts or " prisons shall and is hereby declared to be the prison of Ludgate, and shall be appro- " priated to every use and purpose to which the said prison of Ludgate is now appro- " priated by law, usage, or prescription." The consequence of which is, that this prison now is, as I may say, four prisons in one, with the exception of the women, who are all huddled together without reference to particular jurisdiction. The charities, or rather the bequests, which are exceedingly large, amounting to 1,600*l.* a year, (and I believe will be still further increased,) are applied, in accordance with the wills of the donors, to Ludgate, to the Compters, and to the Middlesex prisoners;—the latter, being much the greater in number and the bequests fewer, receiving but a comparatively small proportion of the whole amount. To the Ludgate prisoners the bequests are very large, so much so that the keeper finds it impossible to apply the funds for the real benefit of so small a number of prisoners. To the Compter the fund is not quite so large; while to Middlesex, which has the largest number of prisoners, the distribution is almost provokingly small. I have here an account of the charities, showing how they were disbursed during the last year. There are a number of donations in money, which are received from the hall-keeper of Guildhall, amounting on the average to 282*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* a year. Then from the Mercers' Company, Christ's Hospital, the Merchant Tailors' Company, the Drapers' Company, the Clothworkers' Company, Captain Curtis's Charity, and the Grocers' Company, a sum is received amounting to 1,351*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*, besides several in kind, consisting of such articles as beer, beef, and other provisions; one, I observe, is the gift of Nell Gwynne, being 30 twopenny loaves to Ludgate ward the last day of every month. These donations in provisions are exceedingly inconvenient, and I think it desirable that power should be obtained by which all donations in kind might be commuted into payments in money.

2421. Is the operation of charities of this description to prisoners upon the whole beneficial or otherwise?—I very much doubt whether it is not attended with some evils in a debtors' prison. My experience leads me to believe that whenever there is a large amount to be disbursed in charity, low practitioners often get prisoners placed in prison for the mere sake of obtaining their costs from this source; the experience also of the managers of the Thatched House charity is much to the same effect. They lay down as a rule that no costs shall be paid but where a creditor is angry with a debtor; the solicitor says, "I will put the man in prison, and we will get it commuted through the Thatched House, " and whatever they allow I will engage to take in discharge of my costs." That I know has been done, and I have no doubt that the knowledge of these large charities must lead to a good deal of similar abuses. That the benefit, however, far exceeds the abuse, I have no doubt in the world.

2422. You have stated that the prison was in very unfortunate circumstances. Do you believe that it is mismanaged in any way?—Not actual mismanagement. I believe it to be well managed; a better officer or a more discreet man than the present governor I know not anywhere. The magistrates have done all that could be required in the way of ventilation. They might indeed have altered the construction and interior arrangement certainly.

2423. You attribute the defects of the prison solely to its construction?—I do. Another Act passed shortly after that, chapter 98 of the 55th of George III., which gave the magistrates the power to remedy all the defects of classification, and to place the prisoners together, under the circumstances of their being overcrowded, but this they have never done.

Captain W. J. Williams.

25th Nov. 1853.

2424. Do you mean defects in construction or in arrangement?—Defects in arrangement. The Act also requires that the charities should be strictly regulated by the bequests, and therefore the Middlesex prisoners could not enjoy anything that was left to freemen of the City of London and the other divisions.

2425. Did not you say that you thought that those who have had the superintendence of the prison have done all they could to remedy the evils which were necessarily caused by the bad construction of the prison?—Only as regards the visitation and the existing discipline of the prison. Under this second Act they certainly might have altered the classification of the prisoners and abolished the absurd distinctions still maintained.

2426. Have you ever represented to them the propriety of doing that?—I have; but it is rather extraordinary that hardly anybody connected with the prison was aware that this Act was in existence. In my last report I observed that I thought that it was desirable to apply to the Legislature for power, but afterwards I found this Act to be in existence.

2427. Were not the visiting magistrates of the prison aware of it?—I do not think they were.

2428. Does it not appear to you that when bequests are made to the inmates of a prison, the distribution of those bequests ought to be subject to the visiting magistrates and to the regulations of the prison?—I was going to refer to that very subject. I am quite satisfied that the keeper, however discreet and honest a man he may be, is not the individual who ought to be entrusted with so large a dispensation of money as 1,600*l.* a year. It gives him a power which he ought not to possess; and the cases ought to be looked into much more closely than they are. I believe Mr. Burdon to be a most conscientious man; and the time he bestows in searching out those cases, and the trouble he takes, is most praiseworthy; but, looking to the principle, I do not think the keeper of any prison ought to be entrusted with so large a sum of money as he has to dispose of. The City have instituted an inquiry into these charities at the instance, I believe, of the present Lord Mayor, and very many of them which were almost obsolete, and had not been paid for many years, have been recovered. The inquiry is not yet completed, and it is likely others may be brought forward, so that the present amount may be greatly increased.

2429. Looking at the whole question, how do you think it would be best to deal with those bequests to debtors; do you think the Legislature should interfere?—I think, under circumstances like these, they certainly should. Some higher authority should deal with those bequests rather than the keeper of the prison.

2430. Would it not be very difficult for any person, whatever his standing was, and whatever pains he might take, to enter into all those cases and judicially deal with so large a sum of money?—Yes; very difficult.

2431. The gaoler would, in some respects, have great advantages over any other person, would not he, in judging of the way in which this money should be distributed?—But he is under no responsibility for the appropriation of it. You may have a good man now; but it seems to me to be a power without any check. You want a controlling power over him.

2432. Are you of opinion that upon the whole it would be better if no such charities existed?—I am not prepared to go to that length; but I think an excess in their number and application may tend to great mischief. When they amount to so large a sum, and when distributed over so small a surface as is the case in this prison, it may lead to great abuse.

2434. You think, within certain limits and properly controlled, it is not a bad way of disposing of money in charity?—Quite the contrary; and I am satisfied that if this money were distributed among all the prisoners, including the Middlesex prisoners, who are by far the larger number and are now excluded, a great many objections would be done away with; but applying so large a sum to so few prisoners appears to me to be liable to extreme abuse, not by the governor of the prison in its distribution, but from attorneys and creditors outside.

2435. Do you think that it would be a wise course for the Legislature to take, to establish a wider field for the distribution of this money, retaining the nature of the objects to which it was originally appropriated?—Yes; I think so. Applying the funds generally to destitute prisoners, whether from Middlesex or elsewhere.

2436. Do you know whether there are similar bequests to other gaols in the metropolis?—I believe not in the metropolis. There may be to Newgate, but I do not know. I have asked the question, and the only answer I have received is, that the governor does not receive anything of the sort.

2437. Are there such bequests in other places in the country?—There are. There is scarcely a town,—particularly the Universities and where there have been religious houses,—where there are not obits and other bequests of small amount.

2438. Are most of those bequests of an ancient date?—Very ancient date. Most of them have been left in Catholic times. No doubt they arose from the dreadful state of the prisons at those periods. There are many bequests which might be recovered by inquiry. In one case at Christ's Hospital there is an unapplied bequest of 10*s.* 6*d.* for preaching a sermon on Easter day to the City debtors, which has not been inquired for for twenty-eight years, and the officers at Christ's Hospital hardly know what to do with the money. But from the late stir which has been made by the Court of Aldermen on the subject of prison charities, I suppose they are anxious to get rid of it. By whom the bequest was left, or its positive purposes, I do not know.

2439. The giving any part of those charities to the Middlesex prisoners would be in derogation of the testator's intentions?—It would be an extension of them.

2440. The money was left for debtors in particular prisons?—Specifically. Many of these charities emanated from the companies in the City of London, and are mixed up with other bequests, sometimes to freemen, sometimes to one class, and sometimes to another.

2441. The Middlesex prisoners do not receive anything because the money has been appropriated to others by the bequest?—That is the case.

2442. Is there any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—I think the City ought to have the credit of its being known that very considerable sums have been diverted from the Orphans' Fund for the benefit of the county of Middlesex. As far back as 75 years ago the sum of 10,000*l.* was paid from the Orphans' Fund for the erection of a sessions house in Middlesex, and 5,500*l.* for a sessions house at Westminster.

2443. What is the Orphans' Fund?—It is the fund to which the duty upon coal is applied.

2444. Did the City obtain an Act of Parliament empowering them to make this diversion of the receipts?—Yes; the 18th of George III., chapter 67., and 18 George III., chap. 72.

2445. Those were voluntary contributions to purposes for which they were not bound by the law to make any provision?—Quite so. I may mention with respect to the police courts of the magistrates in the City of London, that they are very inconvenient. The places for the prisoners underneath the public offices are really terrible; they are devoid of ventilation, and most improper for prisoners, under such or indeed any circumstances. The courts also are very inconvenient for the transaction of public business. If they would apply Giltspur Street Compter to the purposes of a police court, it would be a great public convenience. They might there place prisoners under remand, till they were required to be brought up, and I am satisfied that a single magistrate would do the daily magisteria duty at the police courts of the City with the greatest ease. The appointment of a stipendiary magistrate for the City of London would be, in my opinion, one of the greatest benefits which could be conferred.

2446. Do you think one stipendiary magistrate could do the business of the present two courts?—I am satisfied of it, looking to the number of prisoners daily brought before the courts. The late Mr. Rushton, of Liverpool, used to deal with 110 prisoners in one day, and even more than that.

2447. Do you think it would be advisable to substitute the jurisdiction of one or two paid magistrates, for the present jurisdiction exercised by the aldermen in the City of London?—I do. I think it would be one of the greatest benefits which could be conferred upon the City of London. Of course, under those circumstances, public business would begin much earlier than it does now. I think 12 o'clock much too late an hour for a magistrate to commence his duties.

2448. At present the aldermen have other official duties to discharge?—Yes. I think such a measure would tend to promote uniformity in the administration of justice. You would not have one boy committed for the same offence to a fortnight's imprisonment one day and to a month's imprisonment another, which may arise under the present circumstances. Having been for many years inspector of prisons in the manufacturing districts, the benefits which have arisen from the appointmemt of stipendiary magistrates have been to me most manifest.

2449. Do you know how many stipendiary magistrates there are now in the country?—There are not so many as there might be. Having been inspector at Manchester and Liverpool, and all the manufacturing districts, I have found the confidence in the administration of justice very much increased by such appointments; and even the local magistrates themselves, who were often called upon to decide matters in which they were personally interested, were very willing to acknowledge the benefit. It has been regarded as a most valuable privilege, wherever there is a large and close population; and I cannot but think, looking to the peculiar circumstances in which the corporation of the City of London are placed, that the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate would be one of the greatest benefits which could be conferred upon them. I have always been treated with the greatest courtesy by the present magistrates of the City; but I cannot forbear giving my opinion upon a point of public utility which appears to me so obvious.

2450. You spoke of the propriety of discontinuing the committals to the Bridewell. It is stated in the report of the late Commissioners that the chamberlain of London in his judicial capacity "Has power to commit either master or apprentice to Bridewell, or to a place of temporary confinement in the Guildhall, now little used." If they were committed anywhere else but to the Bridewell, probably the chamberlain's jurisdiction would drop also?—Yes. I have that object purposely in view in urging my recommendation.

Captain W. J. Williams.

25th Nov. 1853.

2451. It is stated also in this report that part of the comptroller's duty is "To perform "the functions of vice-chamberlain, so far as regards matters connected with the admission "to the freedom, enrolment of apprentices, or settlement of disputes between apprentices "and their masters, whenever the chamberlain is prevented from doing so by illness or "other cause, and during a vacancy in the office of chamberlain." Probably that may be the reason for what you state as to the comptroller?—Yes, that may be the reason.

Mr. Martin Pratt.

Mr. MARTIN PRATT, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2452. You are connected with the General Steam Navigation Company?—I am secretary to the General Steam Navigation Company.

2453. How long have you held that situation?—Four years. I was assistant-secretary previously for seven or eight years.

2454. Are there any observations which you are desirous of addressing to the Commissioners, in reference to the inquiry which is committed to them?—With regard to the navigation of the Thames, it is in a very imperfect state at present, in consequence of the impediments caused by numerous shoals between London Bridge and Erith. They cause great detention. The company have a large fleet of steam vessels which are constantly going up and down the river, and which are subject to detention on coming to those shoals. A vessel drawing twelve or thirteen feet of water, will be stopped when she comes up to the shoals when the tide is within two hours of low water, in consequence of the want of water over them.

2455. Do you mean you have reason to believe that proper care has not been taken to keep the river as free from shoals as it might have been?—That is my meaning.

2456. Have you formed that opinion from having heard what has been said by engineers on the subject?—Yes. The best information I can refer the Commissioners to, is the Report of the Commission which sat in 1846 on Tidal Harbours. I think Captain Washington, of the Royal Navy, was chairman. The Commissioners will find in the evidence regarding the port of London, the report of Mr. Joseph Hume, who was examining commissioner at the port of London, in which he alludes to Mr. Walker's report on the state of the river, and enumerates those shoals which I speak of. We experience very great obstruction from those shoals, and very great detention; and at times serious damage is done to our ships when the pilots venture to cross them. Some of them being of very hard substance, they affect very injuriously the vessels in passing over them.

2457. Do you believe the river to be getting worse?—No. It remains very much in the same state. About seven or eight years ago the City partially removed a shoal at Limehouse, by increasing the depth of the water about eighteen inches; but it still remained very bad, and there are others worse than that.

2458. Have you made representations to the navigation committee on the subject?—Not exactly. We have known that the subject has been before them repeatedly.

2459. You have had probably the means of observing the manner in which the harbour master discharges his duties?—Yes. The present harbour master has done his duty very efficiently. I believe, under his directions and recommendations, the water has been deepened at the tiers where the steam vessels drawing a large draught of water lie 2460. The draught of steamers is not greater than that of sailing vessels, is it?—No; generally speaking they are not of such heavy draught as sailing vessels.

2461. Therefore there has been nothing in the circumstance of the introduction of steam navigation to bring about the fact of the existence of shoals more than before?—Except that they proceed against the ebb tide when sailing vessels do not attempt it. In coming up the river against the ebb tide when the tide is within two hours of low water, we are impeded by those shoals.

2462. With regard to the regulation requiring steam vessels to carry lights, has the corporation anything to do with that?—Yes. The regulations of the corporation and of the Admiralty clash in this respect. In a list of the byelaws of the City, revised in 1851, the 38th byelaw requires that steam vessels navigating in the river Thames between unset and sunrise shall hoist a light at the masthead and a light at the bowsprit end. By the Act of Parliament last passed for the regulation of steam navigation, which is the 14th and 15th Victoria, chapter 79, power is confirmed to the Admiralty to issue regulations for steam boats to carry lights, and legalize the regulations issued by the Admiralty in virtue of the 9th and 10th Vict. cap. 10, and published in the London Gazette in July 1848, which are the regulations at present in force.

2463. Do you mean that they are at variance with the regulations of the corporation of the City of London?—Yes, for this reason: the regulation of the Admiralty requires that steam vessels shall carry a green light on one paddle box, and a red light on the other. The Act under which those regulations were enforced, in a concluding clause saves the right of the corporation. The regulations of the corporation require a light at the masthead and a light at the bowsprit end; but the Admiralty regulation is, that steamers shall have a light at the masthead, a light at the starboard paddlebox, and one on the larboard paddlebox.

2464. So that there are two contrary regulations actually in practice on the river?—There are. A representation was made from the Steamship Owners' Association of London to the corporation, pointing the discrepancy out, but it had no result.

2465. How do you manage under those circumstances; which regulations do you comply with: those of the City of London or those of the Admiralty?—As all our vessels are seagoing vessels, we follow the Admiralty regulations.

2466. And not those of the corporation?—We do not.

2467. Does the corporation interfere?—They have not done so.

2468. Practically you disregard the corporation regulations, and they take no notice of it?—That is so; all our vessels are seagoing vessels.

2469. Do you apprehend that legally both those authorities have the right to lay down rules?—Yes; I cannot conclude otherwise. The 38th byelaw is very distinct.

2470. Is that the case with other steam vessels belonging to other companies besides your own?—Precisely.

2471. They all comply with the regulations of the Admiralty, and neglect those of the corporation?—I observe that the river steamers comply with the regulations of the corporation. The 49th section of the Act I speak of, which confirms the regulations published by the Admiralty, is to this effect—"Nothing in this Act contained shall "prejudice or derogate from the estates, rights, interests, privileges, franchises, juris-"dictions or authority of the Mayor and commonalty and citizens."

2472. Does the Trinity House make any regulations upon the subject?—Not on the subject of steam vessels carrying lights.

2473. Is there any danger or inconvenience in one set of steamers carrying one set of lights on the river, and another set of steamers carrying another?—There is always some danger arising from it. The regulations published in 1848 led to the most serious inconvenience; it was not known for a long time, and it is only now being understood.

2474. Do you consider the corporation of London to be a fit body to exercise the conservancy of the river?—I think not. From the constitution of the committee, which is changing every year, and composed of a class of gentlemen who are not supposed to be conversant with the subject, great inconvenience arises. With respect to the removal of the shoals I speak of, we conceive that there should be an efficient professional engineer attached to the committee, to point out how they should be removed.

2475. Do you think the functions of conservators of the river would be better exercised by the Government?—No doubt of it.

2476. Are there any City dues which interfere with your trade?—Yes; in regard to certain stations particularly. There are certain compulsory dues upon grain; I allude to metage dues, and fillage, and lastage. On some stations where we compete with the railroads, if we were to put ourselves on an equality by offering to pay the compulsory dues, we should forfeit one-third of the freight.

2477. Do you mean that the dues amount to one-third of the freight?—Yes, they do; the same grain brought from the same place by railway would be exempted from such compulsory dues.

2478. Does it appear to you that the conservancy of the river bears any resemblance to municipal duties; is there any body of persons whose rights can be said to be directly affected by that jurisdiction?—I cannot say that it is so.

2479. Supposing, for example, it was desired to introduce the representative principle into the management of the river, can you point out any class of persons whose interests are more affected than those of others?—Of course the shipping interest is very largely interested in the arrangement.

2480. The shipping interest is hardly susceptible of representation separately?—There are a variety of interests mixed up with the conservancy question.

2481. Is there any point connected with the coal duties to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—Yes; by the Act of the 1st and 2d Victoria, chapter 101, we had the power to claim a drawback of the whole of the dues levied on the coals when they are exported in quantities exceeding 20 tons.

2482. Do you mean exported to foreign countries?—Though not actually exported, if they are not landed, but put into steam boats, they give us the advantage of their being regarded as coals exported and permit the drawback. By the 14th and 15th Victoria, chapter 146, the drawback was reduced to 1*s.* per ton on the same quantity, not less than 20 tons, the duty being 1*s.* 1*d.*

2483. Then you lose 1*d.* a ton?—Yes; we lose 1*d.* a ton upon the whole quantity.

2484. Upon what ground was that alteration made?—I believe some reference was made to the expense of the office or the expense of the collection. I merely wish to mention the fact that we are at a considerable loss from this circumstance.

2485. It has been stated that the cost of collection is estimated at 1*d.* Of course, if the duty is drawn back it must have been collected; therefore, it is possible that the cause of the difference may have been that it allows to the City the expense of collecting the duty?—I believe the reduction was rather made to meet the circumstances of the import by railways.

Mr. Martin Pratt.

25th Nov. 1853.

2486. Is there any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—There is a company called the Watermen's Company in connexion with the corporation; they have great privileges; they have the exclusive working of all craft on the river. The consequence is, that the business of the river generally having increased so much of late, there are not craft sufficient to do the business in a proper way.

2487. Do you mean that there are not vessels enough?—There are not barges or craft sufficient to discharge and load the vessels lying in the stream.

2488. What is the nature of the privileges of this Watermen's Company?—I am not so thoroughly acquainted with them probably as many gentlemen who have been before the Commission. We know that no barge can be navigated on the river except by a freeman of the Watermen's Company. The consequence is, that they are not only very independent but they are limited in number. What with the want of barges and the want of lightermen, we have great difficulty in getting our cargoes unloaded in sufficient time to leave again at the appointed time for starting. The only remedy which we can suggest is, that the trade should be thrown open.

2489. Do you think it would be a great saving of expense to you if the trade were thrown open?—Yes; we should make more voyages with our vessels if we could load and discharge them in less time than is now possible, owing to the insufficient number of craft. A short time ago there was a strike of the journeymen lightermen on the Thames, which nearly threatened the suspension of the entire business of the river.

2490. Are you allowed to employ the men on board your own boats if you do not hire other people?—Not in navigating craft; there must be a freeman of the Watermans' Company in any craft which is navigating the river.

2491. Have you had any experience of the privilege of porterage in the City?—No; I believe the lightermen themselves would admit that the business of the port of London is so large as to overwhelm them.

2492. Do you understand the Watermen's Company to be a close corporation, or that anybody who wishes it and is prepared to pay the admission fee can enter it?—I believe the entrance is by servitude.

2493. The numbers are limited?—The numbers are necessarily limited.

2494. If you have any complaint to make of the conduct of members of the Watermen's Company, to whom do you make it?—To the court and wardens of the company.

2495. Have you ever had occasion to apply to them on any subject?—Not that I recollect. The complaint is a general one, and we know there is no remedy except that of throwing the trade open to strangers.

J. Matthews, Esq.

JOHN MATTHEWS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

2496. You are a solicitor, are you not?—I am a solicitor, having my offices in Arthur-street West, London Bridge.

2497. You are desirous, are you not, of making some statement to the Commission on the subject of the state of the river?—During the last twenty years I have had frequent occasion to apply to the authorities connected with the conservancy of the river Thames on behalf of clients who have either requested some privilege to be conceded to them, or have had some complaint to make concerning obstructions or erections in the river Thames.

2498. Were your clients engaged in trade upon the river?—Principally.

2499. As shipowners?—As warehousemen or wharfingers.

2500. Will you have the goodness to make any observations which you are desirous of bringing before us?—My experience during a period of between twenty or thirty years, in the course of that time having had many interviews with the party managing the conservancy of the Thames—I mean the navigation committee—is, that they either want authority or that they are incompetent to the proper discharge of their duty to the public.

2501. On what grounds do you make that assertion?—I arrive at that conclusion from the practice, as it appears to me, of the conservancy endeavouring to effect a compromise on almost every occasion, without reference to the rights of the parties litigant, or they avoid altogether the matter referred to them, or they delay it; or, if they are forced to come to a judgment, execution does not follow, and consequently relief is not obtained.

2502. You say you have had personal communications with the navigation committee?—Frequently.

2503. When that was the case, with whom did you come into communication?—I came into communication with a sub-committee first, and afterwards with what is called the grand committee.

2504. Of how many members was the sub-committee composed?—I think about twenty.

2505. Upon that sub-committee were there persons who had any professional knowledge of those subjects?—If I exclude the officers, the water bailiff, and the harbour masters, I should doubt if there were any parties who possessed a knowledge of the river Thames beyond what they would acquire as committee men.

2506. Were the harbour master and water bailiff present to advise the sub-committee?—No doubt they would do so; but I am not aware that they were called in, or that they sat with the committee as assessors. No doubt, when required to attend, they appeared before the committee.

2507. The duties of the harbour master and the water bailiff require their presence upon the river, do not they?—Yes; to carry out the orders of the committee.

2508. They have their executive duties to perform?—They have; and I may say, so far as my experience of those officers goes, they are most competent to discharge their duties, and very attentive; but I believe they require power to act, and they defer to the administrative part of the navigation committee, and thence arises the mischief.

2509. What is the nature of the cases which you have brought before the sub-committee?—I will mention the last. A client of mine, of the name of George Simmons, occupies on the southern part of the river Thames, at Gravesend, warehouses and premises where he carries on the business of a mast and block maker. He and his predecessors have occupied those premises for nearly a century, certainly above sixty years. The premises front the river on the north, and they have also a river frontage on the east, so that on the east side the river ebbs and flows and forms a sort of small bay or harbour, or lay-by place for small craft, wherein my client and his predecessors have from time immemorial placed their masts, for the facility of carrying them off to ships when they were required, the business being chiefly that of supplying ships which have lost their masts from stress of weather, and which require new ones at the moment,—my client having occupied these premises between thirty and forty years, and, as I have said, their predecessors for more than sixty. In the year 1850 Mr. Simmons was surprised upon finding that an application had been made to the navigation committee by a powerful neighbour for permission to enclose that part of the navigable river of which I am speaking, wherein were placed his spars, and where the fishermen belonging to Gravesend and the river Thames were accustomed to anchor.

2510. Do you mean that there was an intention to turn it into dry land?—At low water the land was uncovered, and at high water the tide flowed over it.

2511. The object of enclosing it was to turn it into dry land, and use it as such?—Yes; and to attach it to his own estate, which was immediately opposite.

2512. In the form of land or water?—In the form of land, for the purpose of erecting houses; he desired to take as much of the river Thames as would make a wharf, as an addition to his premises. Much of that kind of encroachment has been accomplished, and many such applications granted up and down the river in various places, but in this case it so happened that it would be destructive of the business of my client, and would necessarily drive out the fishermen and watermen from their anchorage. I ought to explain, that in the time of Henry VIII. a fort and powder magazine, called the Block House, were erected 200 yards more eastward, my client's premises being then the easternmost of the whole town, his site and the fort forming a kind of bay or lay-by place. Upon this application being made to the navigation committee, my client naturally appealed to them, and said, "I have been in possession of this property so long, you surely are not going to deprive me of my business." And the watermen and fishermen also appealed to the committee in like manner. There was a petition signed by about 330 watermen and fishermen, begging the navigation committee to have regard to their rights to use the navigable river, and to respect the comfort and convenience of the public. Of course my client also urged the same. On the other hand, the wealthy and powerful neighbour of my client made his application to the City, and I believe I may say the navigation committee were greatly pestered with applications on both sides, till it was almost impossible for them to understand what the merits of the case might be. They ultimately went down to Gravesend, and, having viewed the locus in quo, it was supposed justice would be done. This was in December 1850. On the 3d of April 1851 the navigation committee (having been in the interval occupied with the applications of the various parties on either side) determined to make no grant, but they intimated that it would be an advantage to the neighbourhood to fill in the spot, and that it would not be detrimental to the navigation. Upon that hint the party who desired to obtain the soil, lay by till August, which is the holiday month in the City, when most parties are away, and the courts of law are closed, and he then began with a large number of men to pull down some old houses he had, and fill in the bay or place with the rubbish, and he did so to a considerable extent, driving out the fishermen and watermen, and driving out also the stock in trade of my client. Applications were made to the City upon this. Information was given to the City authorities, but we could get no redress; and the result was, though my client was by no means desirous of going to law, he was compelled to apply to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain his neighbour from enclosing the shore of the river to his and the public detriment. In March 1852 the injunction was granted, upon condition that my client tried the question at law as to whether he had the right, with others, to use this portion of the river, or whether the party who set up a right to take it was a person so entitled. It was tried before a special jury at the Guildhall, on the 23d of December in the year 1852. Some of the City authorities attended, and other officials; and I may here say that the City authorities gave me every possible facility for the purpose of trying that cause. I was allowed access to their books and documents, nothing was reserved, and having investigated their proceedings for more than a century back, I was led to the conviction that the management of the conservancy of the river, however defective at the present moment, had been very much improved during the last quarter of a century. The result of the trial was a verdict for my client, establishing his right to the use of that part of the river. The defendant having pleaded a custom by the owners of adjoining property to embank the shore between high and low water marks, that custom was negatived; and ultimately on the 5th of May of the present year the Court of Chancery granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant and all other persons from depositing or casting rubbish, or dirt, or anything of the kind into that part of the river. I have also the record of the verdict at law. That being concluded, though at a vast expense to my client, I addressed the water bailiff, and called upon him in the exercise of his duty to cause to be removed the earth and rubbish so filled in.

2513. Did the City take any part whatever in this contest that went on between your client and his neighbour?—No part whatever, except to watch the progress of the cause.

2514. Did they express any opinion whatever?—They privately expressed an opinion to me, of which I had no doubt whatever, that there was no custom for any person having adjacent property to enclose the shore between high and low water mark of the river Thames; beyond that they did not go. I called upon the water bailiff to remove, or cause to be removed, the obstruction, which at that time, after the decision at law and the decision in equity, I thought I was perfectly justified in requiring, especially as I found that in May 1847, the City and other places were placarded with the information under the signature of the water bailiff: that, by a certain statute, any person throwing rubbish, earth, &c., into the Thames, or on the shore below high water mark, or from any wharf, quay, or bank adjoining the Thames, was liable to a penalty of 20*l.*, and that the above penalty would be strictly enforced. In pursuance of that, I called upon the City to exercise their authority. I served the water bailiff with a copy of the decree for injunction; and I had a note from the water bailiff, to say that he would refer my letter to the Thames navigation committee. On the 2d of August, again, that part of the year in which nothing can be done, I received a letter from the town clerk, which I hold in my hand, and which I will read: "Guildhall, 5th August 1853.—Sir, I am directed by the Thames "Navigation and Port of London Committee, to inform you that they have considered your "letter of the 18th of June last, addressed to the water bailiff, relative to Block House "Dock at Gravesend, and to state that the committee are of opinion it is not desirable "for that officer to interfere in the matter.—Your obedient servant, H. A. Merewether." The result of that is, that the obstruction still continues; the fishermen are deprived of their anchorage, and my client, I will not say has been ruined, but has been most grievously injured.

2515. Your client has no power to remove this obstruction?—None specially.

2516. The decision he has obtained merely establishes the fact that he has received damage?—That he has received damage.

2517. It gives him no right of positive interference to remove the obstruction?—I dare say he might lawfully remove it, but it would be attended with an expense of 40*l.* or 50*l.* It is a mortifying thing that he should have to do it at his own expense, when the conservators of the Thames receive a large income for the purpose of removing such obstructions, and it being their especial duty to do so. I have a book with me, in which laws against encroachments and obstructions are specially laid down as framed by the City, published in 1746 by Mr. Roger Griffiths, the then water bailiff. From that time to the present the City have claimed the right, as conservators of the Thames, to prevent encroachments and to remove obstructions. What I complain of is, that the City do nothing where a difficulty arises. They are very polite and kind; but when a case comes before them like this, where two parties cannot agree, and which is incapable of compromise, and the City are called on to exercise their power, nothing is done.

2518. Do you conceive that your client, if he is willing to incur the expense, has a legal right to remove that obstruction?—I have no doubt of it, because it is rubbish thrown contrary to the statute on a portion of the navigable part of the river Thames, and obstructs it.

2519. Has he any right to remove an obstruction from the navigable part of the river Thames?—Possibly the conservators of the river would say, you shall not do anything—you shall not carry away the soil or bed of the river; but my remark was made upon the assumption that it could not be considered the soil and bed of the river, inasmuch as it was rubbish and dirt unlawfully thrown there.

2520. The injunction which had been obtained from the Court of Chancery would not give him the right of removing an obstruction?—No.

2521. Did the other decision give him any right?—None.

2522. Then in virtue of what would your client have the right of removing that obstruction?—I apprehend that a person possessing waterside property, if another comes there and throws something in the river which creates a nuisance, or which is altogether unusual, the occupier may take it up and throw it away. Here, however, is a large body of earth, and it is so settled down now, that it would be attended with considerable expense to remove it. If that is to be considered as part and parcel of the shore, undoubtedly he has no authority; but looking at it as a mere temporary and unlawful lodgment of earth and rubbish, I think anybody might remove it. The City, claiming the conservancy of the river Thames, and also claiming the right to the soil between high and low water mark, induce the public, or a certain portion of it, to rely upon their proclamations and upon their powers, and to confide in them; but when a case like this comes before them, but we find that either they have no authority, or that it is a disputed title, or a doubtful one, or that their officers cannot get instructions to enforce it; and so nothing is done. The time I think has arrived when a complaint may be very fairly made against such a tribunal.

5523. Your complaint is of their inefficiency in cases where their interference would be not only useful, but just, in conformity with the legal rights of the parties?—It is.

2524. Is there any other case of the same sort which you can mention?—I have had occasion to solicit in Parliament bills for the erection of wharves and piers on the river Thames. I always find on those occasions the City are upon us, and they not only require a clause reserving their rights as conservators of the Thames, but they insist upon plans being lodged, and their previous approval of those plans; in fact, they interfere very much with parties who are seeking the authority of the Legislature to make such advances into the river Thames. I do not complain of that; but when these requirements have been submitted to, and a great outlay has been made, I find that the City on the other hand do not interfere to prevent encroachments set up by way of competition to those larger and legalised establishments. The town pier at Gravesend was erected in 1833, and a certain toll became necessary to pay for the cost of erecting it. The public advanced their money; but, such has been the effect of what has been done in the way of competition, that even the interest at the present time cannot be paid. That has partly arisen from the encroachments made in the immediate vicinity of it, close to it, indeed, in the spirit of competition and not for any public convenience or necessity. If I may use the expression, those "little goes" can afford to land the summer visitors at a very small cost, because, by running out a construction at an expense of 200*l.* or 300*l.*, they can very well compete with a commodious and safe structure, which may have cost 30,000*l.* I find last year a petition was presented by myself on behalf of clients interested in that pier. Among other things, I find it there stated: "That with the consent and under "certain restrictions and control, and subject to the rights and privileges of the corporation "of London, the said pier was erected at a considerable cost, and more than 25,000*l.* has "been borrowed, and is still due upon the security of the said tolls and dues, and upon "the faith of the Acts of Parliament, and of the rights and powers of the said City. That "the said Acts were passed, and the consent of the corporation of London previously "obtained thereto, upon the representation and belief that no pier or projection into the "river Thames between high and low water marks could be made without the express "licence of the said City. That very recently projections into and encroachments on the "river Thames at Gravesend between high and low water mark have been made without "the consent of the said City, and in some cases against its consent, and in defiance "thereof. That your memorialists are aggrieved by the erection of a floating pier known "as Lightfoot's Pier, which has been recently constructed to the west of and within forty-"two yards of the said Town Pier, and there is now another pier or projection into the "river constructing within seventeen yards of the projection called Lightfoot's Pier, "and called or intended to be called the Cross Ferry Pier." I represented to the City that those were not necessary works and erections for the advantage of the public, and were only put up to enable individuals to obtain money at the expense of those who had advanced the funds for a useful public work. To that memorial no answer whatever has been returned that I am aware of. The same thing occurred at Greenwich some years ago. I had a client who lost 7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.* there, in consequence of a similar erection being made by the watermen, who felt they had been aggrieved by the pier rendering the hire of small boats to land passengers unnecessary, and therefore they set up a small rival pier, and the result was to deprive the shareholders or the persons who built, under the City conditions, the Greenwich pier, of a great portion of their capital. A client of mine of the name of Bryan lost a large sum of money thereby.

2525. When those large piers were erected, was there an agreement made with those who advanced the money that they should have the monopoly of the passengers, and that no other pier should be erected within a certain distance?—No; but the tendency of my observation is, that the Conservators of the river ought not to permit any erections to be made which are not for the public good. If it were to be tolerated that anybody could run out projections into the river without reference either to the authority of the Crown or the conservators of the Thames, the whole shore of the river would be filled with speculative projections of that kind. The City do prevent projections in many cases where they are not resisted; but if a person chooses to defy the City, it appears that they either want the authority to exercise their power, or they are not competent to enforce it.

2526. If a person comes before Parliament with a private bill for running a solid pier into the Thames, does the City remembrancer interfere and require clauses to be inserted in the bill?—I have always found it to be so. Upon the point of obstruction I will read to the Commissioners an extract from a report made on the 20th of January 1842. It is a report from the navigation committee to the Court of Common Council, and it says, "That serious complaints have at different times been made to the committee of various "projections occasioning obstruction to the navigation. That these projections have been "erected, not only without the sanction of the committee, but in some instances in avowed

J. Matthews, Esq.

25th Nov. 1853.

"defiance of their authority. The committee recommend that they should be authorised "to confer with counsel as to the means of enforcing the City's authority."

2527. In that report they speak of themselves as having authority in cases of that kind?—They assume that they have the authority. I believe the real state of things so described by the navigation committee in 1842 exists at this moment. I am driven therefore to the conclusion, seeing I can get no redress on the part of my clients, who have occasion to complain of obstructions, that the City feel they have a defective title or have no title, or it is a disputed title, or they have really no authority to enforce the powers they claim a right to exercise.

2528. Has the City in no instance interfered to prevent improper encroachments upon the river Thames?—Their practice, formerly, was to allow no party to encroach upon the river Thames without a fine or rent; but in later times I believe there are many instances, in fact I know some, where parties have said: We do not care for the City; it has no right at all, and we will make what we consider to be or choose to call an improvement; and project our piers or do something of the kind, without reference to the City. In those cases I believe the City authorities have not in recent times interposed by indictment or otherwise, and I suppose for the reasons which I have just assigned.

2529. Are you able to state that that has been universally the case in recent times, that in no instance the City has interfered to prevent what they considered to be an improper construction and encroachment?—I am not aware of any encroachment which has been made that has been removed by the City. They interdict it as far as they can; but in the cases of those persons who have thought for themselves, and resisted the authority of the City, they have not interfered by the actual removal of the encroachment.

2530. You say that the City shows a desire to exercise its rights when parties yield; but where they are met by resistance, they afford no effective protection?—Decidedly.

2531.—Do you think the corporation of London well qualified to perform the duties of the conservancy of the river?—No. I think it is absolutely necessary that there should be a tribunal connected with so important a matter as the navigation of the river and the conservancy of the shores, consisting of a permanent chairman with legal acquirements; and that there should be infused into that committee or court of conservancy, some parties especially connected with shipping, similar to the Trinity masters, as in the instance of the Admiralty courts. There should be parties also on the committee who should be competent to advise their less experienced brethren as to what ought to be done in reference to embankments; but above all, it requires that the committee should be composed of men of sufficient moral courage to enforce the law when a breach of it has been made.

2532. The conservancy of the river is a matter which concerns the metropolis at large, is not it; it does not refer to the City proper, especially?—No.

2533. The corporation of London, therefore, in exercising that right, must be considered as representing the entire metropolis?—No doubt.

2534. Does not the conservancy and navigation of the river also imply some special and professional knowledge?—Yes.

2535. On either of those grounds do you think the present corporation is fitted to discharge the duty, either as representing the entire metropolis, or as having a special knowledge of the metropolis?—If the officers be excluded, I should say they are not; and I suspect that the officers do not feel themselves at liberty to act without the directions of the committee; therefore, excluding the officers, I should say the committee is not a properly constituted authority.

2536. Does it appear to you that the conservancy of the Thames has anything about it of a municipal nature, or anything which would cause it to be properly exercised by a municipal body such as the corporation of London?—Only as it may have reference to the port. Supposing the City to be owners of the port of London, it would be their duty to cleanse the port, &c., and they must have all the powers necessary to maintain it.

2537. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—As a citizen of London, I do not agree with many gentlemen who think that the rights and privileges of the City should be interfered with. I would purge the corporation of all anomalies and incongruities, and correct every possible abuse. That is no doubt necessary; but I would otherwise keep the City intact. It appears to me that the citizens have well earned their privileges and immunities, and I do not see what benefit it would be to other parts of the metropolis to endeavour to make a fusion with the City with respect to City property or City rights. The other portions of the metropolis without the walls of the City might, if it so pleased the Legislature, be formed into municipalities; but I think, looking to the history of the City and to its antecedents, it would be an extraordinary measure indeed if the rights of the citizens and their privileges were wholly removed from them, or that strangers were incorporated with them. It would lead, I think, to a great deal of confusion. Indeed, it appears to me that when once you touch the constitution of the City with the view to removing privileges, you must do the like to all other municipalities in England and Wales.

2538. To what privileges do you particularly refer?—I do not know that I can define them. There are a great many exemptions and privileges,—the right of voting within the City, for instance; the right of electing municipal officers; the distribution of charities; the management of estates; the patronage of appointments to office; the control of the police, and such matters. As far as regards the administration of justice, of course that would be a matter in which the Government would always take care that there should be no defect. J. Matthews, Esq. 25th Nov. 1853.

2539. Supposing the present boundaries of the City were preserved, and the governing bodies properly constituted, would you preserve such a privilege as that of metage or porterage, for example, or the privilege of preventing any person who is not a freeman of the City exercising a retail trade within the City?—No, not altogether; but I would distinguish between a man who has served his time to a freeman and acquired a perfect knowledge of his business, and a man who comes into the City merely for the purposes of trading, without reference to his qualification. I would require that man to pay something in the shape of a fine, or otherwise take up his freedom.

2540. Would you think it right that the City should retain any privileges which are found to be injurious to the general commerce of the metropolis?—Certainly not. I consider that much good would be attained were there a public auditor of the City accounts, one who should disallow all illegal payments; and there might be an appeal to the recorder, so that the public then would have a view of the expenditure, and could correct through their representatives any improper application of the immense funds which the City have at their disposal.

2541. Is it your view that the municipal institutions of London should be preserved, but that whatever is connected with them which is injurious to the community should be put an end to?—Certainly.

2542. When you say that a public auditor should be appointed, by whom would the appointment be made?—There should be a Government auditor; it should be an audit on the part of the whole nation.

2543. At present the City appoints its own auditors. What you propose is, that the Government should appoint an auditor of the City accounts, and that there should be an appeal from his decision to the recorder?—Yes; I would have a public auditor associated with the City auditor; his province would be not merely to cast up columns of figures, but to see that sums of money were not applied contrary to the trusts imposed upon the City, or for illegal or notoriously useless and improper purposes.

2544. You would, in short, provide for a really independent audit of the City accounts?—I would. So I would have an independent official connected with the conservancy of the Thames, and with respect to all other great and responsible branches of authority over which the City have control, there should be a competent head to direct and carry out a faithful execution of duties.

2545. Do you know anything of the system of City brokers?—I do not.

WILLIAM MILLER CHRISTY, Esq., having made a solemn affirmation, was examined as follows. W. M. Christy, Esq.

2546. You are connected with the City of London?—I am.

2547. Do you carry on trade within it?—I am not in trade at present in the City of London. I am a liveryman of the City of London.

2548. Do you reside in the City?—Occasionally; I generally reside at Kingston, but I have accommodation for lodging in the City.

2549. Have you ever taken any part in the business of the corporation?—I have not.

2550. Have you any observations which you are desirous of addressing to the Commission?—Yes; I wish to speak generally of what I consider to be abuses and defects in the City management. With the large income of the corporation I think they should do many things which remain undone, the want of which is a very great disadvantage to the community at large. I think they should have a house of refuge for the destitute of all ages, from infant children up to old persons. I am not aware that they have any institution of that sort. It has been a matter which I have mentioned for many years past, that there should be a place of refuge for the destitute, from which, when rendered decent and cleanly, the inmates might be drafted off to places where employment can be had, otherwise they are obliged to be passed to their parishes, however distant, and great evils follow. I think, with the very great property which the corporation possess, it would not be a burden at all serious to it to provide such accommodation. The City paupers are now otherwise provided for.

2551. Is not the City bridewell used partially for the purpose you are describing?—I do not know.

2552. Your suggestion is, that there should be a place of refuge within the City to which vagrants might be sent?—Yes; one or two.

2553. Is not it the duty rather of the City unions than of the corporation to provide such an asylum; the corporation have not charge of the relief of the poor?—The City unions are obliged to proceed according to the statute law. The corporation may act upon its own laws; but I think, apart from what the poor law unions can do, the corporation might do a great deal. The vast number of paupers and destitute persons who find their way into London as the winter approaches, is a very great evil, and I think should be dealt with very promptly. It is most pitiable to see the destitute children from the earliest ages who are in considerable numbers about the streets, courts,

W.M. Christy, Esq.

25th Nov. 1853.

and alleys of London; this continues till the summer comes round again, and then a large proportion of them disperse and overspread the country parts.

2554. Are there many vagrants of the class which you describe within the City proper?—A great number; and among them are many young thieves, whom you may see standing about the Mansion House and other public places. They are objects of pity, not to be dealt with harshly, but there should be some provision for them, using them kindly, and finding employment suitable for them in the sea service and in other channels. It is wanted exceedingly; and for London, which is the largest and probably the richest metropolis in the world, to be without something of that kind is very extraordinary.

2555. Are there any other points to which you wish to call the attention of the Commission?—There are a variety of matters chiefly with reference to the improvement of the state of the City. I think London should be a model in its police and social regulations for all other cities, and particularly the cities under the British Crown. The streets are now so crowded with vagrants and petty thieves, and blocked up with carriages and carts, public and private, that it is an interruption to the traffic of the City going on in a regular and orderly manner. It is a perfect nuisance that such characters can so occupy much of the foot pavement all day long; following no proper calling, they turn into the streets and pace about from morning to night. I think the corporation should have effectual means of dealing with all cases of that sort.

2556. Is not that rather the duty of the police than of any other authority?—I think not, as I have questioned the police many times, and they say that they have no instructions to deal with common and street beggars. The courts and alleys are in a neglected and filthy state, and so are the public stairs and entries; they are badly lighted, badly cleansed; and I think, both for decency and health, and also for the convenience of persons having to pass through them, they should be kept in good trim, lime-washed every year, and the sides painted every two years. Those things are, I think, altogether withdrawn from the care of the corporation. I do not find that the corporation make it their business, except at their own pleasure, to see to them.

2557. Would not that be rather the care of the sanitary board of the City?—I think it might be so, but it would be a hardship to throw everything of that kind upon the sanitary commission.

2558. You are generally of opinion that a large portion of the City funds should be devoted to the improvement of the abodes of the poorer part of the population of the City and the improvement of the streets and alleys?—I think so; a large portion of their funds should be used for purposes of this kind, which would make the state of the City very different from what it is. The street orderlies have been lately displaced. They were a very useful body of persons, and kept the streets very clean where they were suffered to go, but it was not a system that was sufficiently extended over the City.

2559. Do you think there is reason to complain of the way in which the duties of the police are discharged in the City?—No; I think, from the crowded state of the streets, the police have very difficult duties to perform, and that they do their best under the circumstances. Their jurisdiction and authority is not so extensive as it might be to advantage in removing interruptions and obstructions; but they follow the instructions, I suppose, of the commissioners or the inspectors, and do not interfere with nuisances in general. Nuisances since the street orderlies have been withdrawn have increased wonderfully. It must be supposed, where there is such a large traffic, the manure or droppings from the horses must be ground to powder, and render the streets very unhealthy, if suffered to remain over many hours. In dry weather their state is the worst of dust, and in wet weather also most objectionable. For a small saving, such as the withdrawal of the street orderlies occasions, I think it is unworthy of the City. The other scavenging or sweeping of the streets, I think, proceeds in a very improper way; it should be done at nightfall, or very early in the morning. It is very easy to get relays of persons to work through the night, on suitable or extra pay. The other scavenging in the City is by carts, with the coal ashes and dust from the houses, now allowed to be done at all hours of the day; whilst brewers' drays and others are obliged to unload before 10 o'clock in the morning, under penalty for non-compliance; there is much more need of the scavengers getting their business out of the way by that time, or earlier, say 8 to 9 o'clock in the morning. I think the paving should be all done apart from the hours of business; in the summer time, and not in the winter; and should be done by relays from two or three o'clock in the morning, when it begins to be light, and closing at eight, when business comes on, so that the streets may not be blocked up at any time, when the regular business and traffic of the City is coming forward. You can always have labour in the night as well as in the day; paying, of course, an increased price. I think also that the gratings of the public drains should be all properly trapped. These are details, but they are very important. At present London abounds with a great many nuisances of one kind or other, which might be got rid of without any great difficulty. Persons from the country coming into London are perfectly bewildered with the noise and confusion in the streets, and dangers of crossing them. There should also be proper urinals established, as there are at Paris. These are small things in some respects, but I consider them to be important ones; and the corporation seem to be so much asleep in respect to them, that unless they are stimulated from a higher quarter, I question whether they will not remain very much as they are.

W.M. Christy, Esq.

2560. Do you believe the City to be worse off in those respects than the rest of the metropolis?—Yes; I believe, from its narrow streets and crowded state, the City has lost very much of its retail trade, and has been losing it for forty or fifty years. When I was a youth, I recollect the west end was thought very little of for general trade, except by the fashionable world and the aristocracy; hardly any persons, except of those classes, dealt at the west end, because it was thought extravagantly dear for purchases at the shops as compared with the City. That idea is now very much changed. The bridges are most insufficient for the traffic. Any bridges which are closed, I think should be opened by purchase, upon proper valuation; and at least one or two more bridges for the accommodation of the town are required. With respect to burial grounds in the City, I had hoped they would have ere this been closed (under Lord Palmerston's direction), in a great degree at least, but I see they are not in some places. St. Paul's Churchyard might be made one of the greatest accommodations to the inhabitants of that part of London, by giving up the space around it to public use, well flagged, and by placing the railings or others flush against the cathedral; thereby showing to all pedestrians more of the elegance of its architecture. We do not now see it to its basement at any time, and pedestrians can hardly see it at all as they pass along. Another important consideration is, the loss of time which occurs to persons in business. They cannot now count upon keeping their engagements in general, while the streets are in their present narrow and very crowded state, unless they go on foot, as, if in carriages, persons may be blocked up for hours. I think that Temple Bar should be removed; it certainly is a great obstruction. If a barrier be required, it is easy to have one of a handsome kind, and much more convenient than that which exists, and in a recess on one or both sides of the street, to be brought forward on state occasions only; but none would be the greatest improvement. I think there should be lads, from 14 to 15 years of age, and upwards, who might have a stand at the ends of the principal streets, to do small services for the public, at the charge of a penny up to a shilling; and be registered, each wearing a label with their respective number thereon.

2561. Is there any other point to which you particularly wish to call our attention?—The City is a nuisance in other respects. Lately, in particular, the foot pavements have not been fit to walk on. It is put upon 10,000 persons, more or less, or on every householder, his or her, each to scrape the pavement before their own doors. Why should not the scavengers be required to do it, and before eight in the morning; now it is very partially done, and by most perhaps not done. I think the vagrant laws require great consideration and revision. That applies as well to London as to other parts of the country. There is a vast mass of crime arising out of the neglect of many of these matters. The ready mode too of licensing public houses and gin shops, in my opinion, claims especial attention and curtailment. I think these social improvements are deserving of attention as much as some larger matters.

P. Richardson, Esq.

PHILETUS RICHARDSON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2562. You are a solicitor, are you not?—I am.

2563. Are you connected with the City of London at all?—I carry on my profession in the City of London.

2564. Are you a member of the corporation?—I am not.

2565. Have you ever been a member of the corporation?—I have not.

2566. Was not there a newspaper called the Citizen set up some time ago in the City of London?—Yes. The paper was established I think in the latter part of the year 1848, or the beginning of 1849.

2567. Were you connected with the newspaper at all?—I was subsequently professionally employed on the purchase of the copyright of that paper.

2568. For whom?—For Mr. Benjamin Scott and Mr. Toulmin Smith.

2569. From whom was the copyright purchased?—It was purchased from a man named Peet.

2570. Have you any objection to state whether the corporation of London had anything to do with the purchase of that newspaper?—I have not the least objection to state what I conceive I am properly authorised in stating; and I have instructions from my clients Mr. Scott and Mr. Smith to do so. I do not know exactly with whom the idea of purchasing the copyright of the Citizen newspaper originated—whether Mr. Scott or Mr. Smith; but I think Mr. Scott. They did not establish that paper as I mentioned; but Mr. Scott I believe communicated his ideas to Mr. Smith, and it resulted in Mr. Scott and Mr. Smith becoming the purchasers of the copyright of the paper.

2571. Have you any objection to state whether you have reason to think that any part of the expense of establishing that newspaper, came out of the funds of the corporation of the City of London?—I think a portion of the funds necessary to carry on the newspaper were furnished by officers of the corporation.

2572. Do you mean furnished by those officers by contributions in their individual capacities, or furnished out of the corporate funds?—In the first place out of their individual funds; but whether they were recompensed their outlay wholly or partially, I cannot state as a fact. What occurred was this: Mr. Scott was extremely anxious, as an active member of the corporation, that some efficient report, from time to time, should be made of the proceedings of the Corporation. The reports of the proceedings of the common council were, he thought I believe, very inefficiently given, and sometimes almost wholly suppressed from one circumstance or another. He thought it would be desirable that the corporation should have some organ—I believe that is the proper term to use—wherein their proceedings might be reported, and reports of the committees published, and I think expression given to the views, in some measure, of the corporate body. I think that was his object.

P. Richardson, Esq.

25th Nov. 1853.

2573. Do you mean by newspaper articles in the ordinary way?—No; I mean principally by reporting their proceedings.

2574. Was it intended that the Citizen newspaper should be confined to the publication of reports, or were there to be leading articles also in it?—Not wholly to the publication of reports, I believe. If the design were that there should be leading articles published on behalf—so to say—of the Corporation, it was not, I think, carried out. The paper had a short life. A representation was made to the Lord Mayor of this supposed want, that is, the want of a proper report of the proceedings of the corporation. I believe it was presented by the Lord Mayor to the Court of Common Council. I was not present on the occasion; it was ordered to be referred to the consolidated committee. and was so referred, and the committee considered the subject. But what decision they came to I do not precisely know; but I know this, that the solicitor of the City and Mr. Scott did, I believe by authority, wait upon Mr. Toulmin Smith, with a view to obtaining his services as editor of that paper.

2575. Do you refer to Mr. Charles Pearson?—Yes.

2576. Did Mr. Toulmin Smith act as the editor at any time?—He did; he superintended for a short time the general management and publication of the paper.

2577. You stated that certain officers of the corporation subscribed money for the purpose of purchasing this newspaper and for establishing it; but you were uncertain whether they recompensed themselves or not from the funds of the corporation?—That was not precisely my statement. My statement was, that Mr. Scott and Mr. Toulmin Smith were the purchasers of the copyright of the paper, but that officers of the corporation did, by subscription I apprehend, among themselves, support the paper after it was so purchased. Whether they were recompensed the expense so incurred by them out of the City funds I do not know.

2578. Do you remember what officers of the corporation subscribed for that purpose?—I have no certain information on that subject.

2579. Have you any belief on the subject?—Yes; I believe the remembrancer did so, Mr. Tyrrell.

2580. Have you any belief with respect to any other person?—I think Mr. Scott also by contributions may have endeavoured to support the paper with the object I have mentioned.

2581. Did not you say that Mr. Scott was the purchaser of the copyright?—He was, jointly with Mr. Smith.

2582. The paper then did appear, did it not?—The paper appeared. I think ten numbers in all were published; perhaps eight of them after the purchase by Mr. Scott and Mr. Toulmin Smith.

2583. Were there leading articles in those numbers?—Yes; there were.

2584. Were they devoted chiefly to corporation matters?—Yes; they were.

2585. You stated that Mr. Toulmin Smith was applied to to be editor of the newspaper?—He was.

2586. You also mentioned that he was one of the parties to the original purchase. What was his inducement for purchasing, with Mr. Scott, the copyright of the paper?—Mr. Toulmin Smith had given a great deal of attention to the subject of municipal corporations. He had, entirely gratuitously, previously to this purchase, taken up various matters connected with the City. He was desirous of doing so in the most effectual way, and I think upon the strong representation of Mr. Scott of the utility of this paper in advocating his general views as well as Mr. Scott's general views, he was induced to become the purchaser.

2587. Do you remember for what length of time the newspaper appeared?—I think there were about ten numbers published in all, about eight numbers after the purchase by Mr. Scott and Mr. Toulmin Smith.

2588. What was the reason why it was discontinued?—The reason, I think, was this: I think Mr. Toulmin Smith's views as to the management of the paper did not accord with those of the officers of the corporation who were interested in the establishment of it.

2589. Have you any objection to state what was the amount of the sum given for the purchase of this newspaper?—I think, if you will pardon me, I would rather refer that question to Mr. Scott, who has desired me to say that he will answer any questions which you wish to put to him.

Mr. SYDNEY HEDLEY WATERLOW, having been sworn, was examined as follows.—

Mr. S. H. Waterlow.

25th Nov. 1853.

2590. You are a citizen and liveryman of the City of London?—I am a liveryman of the Stationers' Company.

2591. There are some points connected with your trade to which you are desirous of calling our attention, are there not?—There is no point connected with my trade in particular, but a point which all tradesmen and occupiers in the City of London are, in my opinion, interested in. The point I refer to is, the continuance of the election throughout each of the twenty-six wards of the City of a score, or thereabouts, of inquest men, to serve upon the inquests for the ensuing year. The reason why I think this is an annoyance, and needlessly so, is, that the duties of the inquest have almost entirely, I may say entirely, passed into the hands of paid officers appointed by the corporation. If you will allow me, I will explain the mode of election, and then explain the duties and the manner in which they have lapsed. Some few days prior to the 21st of December in each year, precinct meetings are held throughout the wards. No public notice being given of these meetings, very few persons attend, generally two or three only, including a common councilman, who is expected to preside. Those meetings should be held in the vestry of the church where churches still exist, but they are not always so held; they are frequently held in a solicitor's office, or in a merchant's house, or even in a public house. The meeting for St. Christopher-le-Stock has been held for some years at the European Tavern. In consequence of those meetings not being known, the persons nominated are nominated in a very arbitrary manner. You have no notice of your nomination till the wardmote takes place on the 21st of December, before which you are summoned, and if you cannot show reason for exemption, either that you are over age or are a solicitor, or have served during the previous three years, you are elected as a matter of course. You are then required to take an oath and have a charge given to you, a copy of which I now put in—(producing same.) Almost all the matters with which you are charged you are no longer required to perform, but still you are required to hold and attend meetings. The first charge is, that you shall see that the Queen's peace is kept. That we leave in the hands of the police, thinking they can attend to it much better than we can. The second portion is, that you shall take care that no common ground of the City is taken. This is always looked after by the surveyor or the commissioner of sewers. The third is, that you shall see to the weights and measures. This has been taken away by the appointment of an inspector of weights and measures, who attends, I believe, very efficiently to his duties. The City also appoint annually certain ale conners, who are privileged to see to the measures of the publicans, and who get a small fee for doing so. The other item is, that you shall see that no parties keep shops in the City who are not freemen. There is no necessity for the inquest men to attend to this, because the Court of Aldermen have ordered that the beadles in each ward shall give in returns of parties so offending. Inquest men continue to be elected, although their duties have been transferred to the hands of other persons.

2592. It is an antiquated form which is kept up, and which causes trouble without serving any useful purpose?—Yes. There is one duty which the inquest men still perform; but when I stated that their duties had all lapsed, I did not consider that, because it is not contained in the charge which they are bound to follow. The duty consists of walking round the City in silk gowns with furred edges, going into the shopkeepers' shops and merchants' counting houses, asking for contributions towards charitable funds. The inquest men are expected to do this, and if they do not, they are looked down upon very much in their wards. This part of the duty they are not obliged to do. However, large sums are collected by these means. In the ward of Broad Street more than 400*l.* a year for the last few years has been collected.

2593. The inquest men do go round soliciting contributions?—Yes. Their annual collections from this source amounted to over 400*l.* for the last few years in the ward I have mentioned.

2594. How are those contributions applied?—In charitable purposes, at the discretion of the inquest men.

2595. Those are voluntary contributions?—They are.

2596. Does not the arrival of a deputation of that kind place many persons in a situation in which it is almost impossible to refuse?—Yes; that is one of the annoyances to the citizens which I complain of. The deputation present themselves, headed by the beadle in his gown and with his mace; he thumps at the door, and says, "I have come for a contribution to the inquest." To get rid of them some parties give more and some less.

2597. Is there any other point to which you wish to advert?—The inconvenience is that citizens should be elected upon the inquest at all. The only thing I think which sustains it is, that they always manage to elect about one-third, who they expect will not serve, but who they hope will be willing to pay the fine of five guineas for not serving. This fine was exacted in the ward of Broad Street from seven or eight persons this year. These fines the inquest men think they have a right to do as they like with. The fines have been always understood to be compulsory, and have been paid by many gentlemen. The governor of the Bank of England, only a few years ago, was elected upon the inquest, and five guineas was demanded from him for non-attendance. As foreman of the inquest this year, I was anxious that all those who did not attend should be placed upon the same footing. Having been told that those fines might be legally demanded, I called upon the Court of Aldermen to enforce them against an absentee who refused to pay the five guineas. I then found, in pressing the question, that the Court of Aldermen had no power to enforce the fine. All they could do was to compel the inquest man to take the oath of service, and then if he neglected his duties they could bring an action against him for the damages which might be caused to the ward by his non attendance. But inasmuch as those duties have all lapsed, no damage can accrue. I make these statements upon the credit of a member of the Court of Aldermen, thinking, perhaps, if this were generally known, that the inquest might die a natural death.

Mr. S. H. Waterlow.

2598. You were informed that there was no power of enforcing the fine of five pounds?—Decidedly.

2599. Do you see any reason why those inquests should be maintained?—None whatever. I think if there is any charity to be dispensed throughout the several wards, it would be much better done through a body of half-a-dozen persons who may voluntarily associate themselves for that purpose.

ARTICLES of the CHARGE of the WARDMOTE INQUEST.

The Queen's Peace.—Ye shall truly enquire if the peace of our Sovereign Lady the Queen be not kept as it ought to be, and in whose default, and by whom it is broken or disturbed.

Suitors.—Ye shall truly enquire, by the oath you have made, of all the suitors that owe suit to this Court.

Ale-houses, &c.—Ye shall truly enquire if any person keep any gaming house or other house of ill-fame, or keep an ale-house or victualling house, or sell beer or ale without a license.

Officers.—Also, if any officer by colour of his office do extortion to any man.

Encroachments.—Also, if any man encroach or take of the common ground of this City.

Way, Watercourse.—Also, if any common way or common course of water be foreclosed or letted, that it may not have its course as it was wont, to the annoyance of the ward, and by whom it is done.

Weights and Measures.—Ye shall diligently make search and enquiry whether there be any person or persons within this ward that do use, or keep in his, her, or their house or houses, any measures which be unsealed, and do sell thereby, or by false scales, weights, or measures.

Freemen to show their Copies.—Also, forasmuch as it is thought that divers and many persons dwelling within the liberties of this City daily occupy as freemen, whereas indeed they be none, nor never were admitted into the liberties of this City, ye shall therefore require every such person dwelling within this ward whom ye shall suspect of the same, to show you the copy of his freedom, under the seal of the office of the chamberlain of the said City; and such as ye shall find without their copies, or deny to show their copies, ye shall write and present their names in your indentures.

Freedom.—Also, if any have fraudulently or unduly obtained the freedom of this City.

To meet twice or oftener.—You shall assemble yourselves twice, or oftener if need require, so long as ye shall continue of this inquest, and present the defaults which ye shall find to be committed concerning any of the articles of your charge, to the end due remedy may be speedily applied, and the offenders punished as occasion shall require.

Presentments.—And in making your presentments, your clerk is carefully to write the Christian name, sir-name, and addition or calling of every offender, and the name of the parish wherein the offence was committed, and some certain time how long the offence hath been continued, in order to the better prosecution thereof; and also to write in the margin, on the side of every presentment, the name or names upon whose evidence you make such presentment; and that you set down at the bottom of your indenture the names of one or more persons, either among yourselves or others, whom you shall agree on to prosecute your presentments.

GOD SAVE the QUEEN.

The OATH of the FOREMAN of the INQUEST.

You swear that you shall truly enquire and true presentments make, of all such offences and nuisances as shall come to your knowledge, to have been committed against the Queen's Majesty's peace, within the ward of contrary to the articles now given you in charge. The Queen's Majesty's Council, your fellows, and your own, you shall keep secret and undisclosed. So help you GOD.

The OATH of the rest of the INQUEST.

The same oath that your foreman hath taken on his part you and every of you shall well and truly observe and keep on your part. So help you GOD.

Mr. BENJAMIN STEELE, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

Mr. B. Steele.

2600. Are you connected with the City of London?—At the present time I am not.

2601. Were you ever connected with it?—Yes, I have been in some measure connected with it. I have filled various offices in it, and am tolerably well acquainted with its general management.

Mr. B. Steele.

25th Nov. 1853.

2602. What offices have you held connected with the corporation?—I have been collector for consolidated rate. My claims to the consideration of this Commission are founded upon the circumstance of my birth taking place in the ward of Farringdon Without—my education in the ward of Farringdon Within and Cripplegate Without, having fifty out of sixty years of my life slept in the City of London, and taken an active part in all its proceedings. As a further claim, I have been harassed and tormented by corporation spies for carrying on a trade within two hundred yards of the place of my birth and education; and was consequently compelled by the Corporation to collect its taxes, and subsequently became a corporation spy. Those are the positions in which I have stood in the City of London; and I am now here for the purpose of making some general complaints against them, with a view of proposing certain matters as remedies.

2603. Will you state the general nature of the complaints which you have to allege against the corporation?—I shall make but little complaint against the corporation as to personal matters; but I have to complain of their accounts, founded upon the knowledge I have acquired of the first four rules of arithmetic. I find there is a great variation between commercial and corporation arithmetic; for according to Cocker, when the government of twenty men cost twenty shillings for one year, the expense of fourteen by the rule of proportion would be fourteen shillings; but by the City arrangements, I find that the expense of a less number is much more extended than that of a greater. In 1752 the income of the City was under 50,000*l.*, and with that sum its hospitalities were maintained, and a population of 200,000 citizens were governed, giving a product of five shillings a head. In 1852 the population was reduced to less than 130,000, and the income increased to 213,000*l.*, yielding a product of twenty-five shillings' charge for every citizen's government. The City have always found the means of expending all the money which has come to their hands; so that if they should proceed in the next century upon the process which they have adopted in the previous one, 125*s.* will be the cost in the course of that time. As the Commissioners have heard so much upon the City accounts, I will only just notice one other item in them; that is an item which runs thus, I think:—"To Mr. Scott, for preparing the City accounts for the auditors, 100*l.*" This Mr. Scott was recently an unsuccessful candidate for the office of chamberlain; he being one of his principal clerks, his principal claim for filling the office was founded upon the situation which he held. I apprehend it is the duty of the chamberlain and his clerks officially to present and to prepare the accounts for the auditors, and to have them in a state of readiness for the auditors' examination, without any after cooking process by Mr. Scott in his individual capacity. Mr. Scott has the power—I do not say he has exercised it—of substituting a false document for a real one, in the preparation of these accounts. I do not charge him with having so done; but he has that power, and therefore there may be the possibility for an individual who is the servant of the corporation, who was to prepare an account after it has passed out of the hands of the Chamberlain, to substitute one word for another, the amount remaining the same; or to substitute an item in the place of that which was originally supplied to the corporation. I therefore object to Mr. Scott preparing the City accounts for the auditors, contending that it is the duty of the chamberlain to place those accounts in the state in which the auditors should examine them, without the intervention of any other person. I have to make some few observations upon what I consider to be a little misunderstanding of the true state of the case in which the corporation is actually placed, which has led in some measure to the issue of this Commission. I have to endeavour to show that the corporation consists of three parties or sections, two of which—in the language of Mr. Pulling—form integral parts of it, the common council and the trading companies. The third part are the freemen of London. In the joint names and on behalf of all those parties, the property of the corporation is vested. Among those three parties an intestine war has long existed, the settlement of which has puzzled Her Majesty's ministers so much, that they have appointed a Commission to inquire into the cause of the complaint of the citizens. The trade companies, the second integral part of the corporation, are opposed to all reform. The third party are the freemen, who like myself have no more rights in the City of London than in the City of Canton. The corporation of London are favourable to a certain degree of reform, and in the behalf that that reform could be carried out, they applied to the liverymen of London for their support. The liverymen of London decided that no reform was necessary, and thereby neutralized the efforts of the corporation to accomplish that object. I appear here as a citizen of London to make the following propositions: that the trading companies of London have become wholesale shams, and are unserviceable for all the purposes for which they were established. That the money and estates left to them in trust by the older citizens should be amalgamated, and the objects of the donors carried out in the spirit of the givers; but such money or estates as may have been acquired by the collection of rates, fines, or contributions, be devoted to the promotion of education under the superintendence of the corporation. That, as every poor man pays at the rate of one halfpenny per cwt. of coals in the shape of a tax, it would be expedient to retain that duty for the purpose of applying its produce to giving land and bounties to builders or societies, for erecting in every district wholesome habitations for residence, in which a suitable room may be let at sixpence per week, and that the summit or basement of the building contain rooms suitable for infant and other schools—a room for reading or instruction for those who dwell in the range of buildings, so that morality, cleanliness, and education may characterize the humblest of the community, and thus diminish vice, crime, and destitution. That the societies or individuals who accept the bounty of the corporation, shall give ample security that no person receive more than five per cent. for the capital invested; and when the period for which the land might be granted has expired, the renewal of the lease shall be continued as long as the buildings are devoted to the objects for which they were erected. That the ancient duty of the corporation to superintend gaols and prisons, be left to the executive government; that duty to be exchanged for the superintendence of the sanitary condition of the public buildings and all educational establishments, so that the labour and intelligence of a reformed corporation shall be more devoted to the prevention of crime than its punishment. That the income of the corporation from estates, tolls, and fines, amounts to 200,000*l.*; but by an effectual reform, 100,000*l.* may be annually devoted to public objects, by the removal of turnpikes, erecting bridges, widening streets, embanking the Thames, forming works, and other objects of public utility; but should chartered rights be advanced as an impediment to public improvements, the same respect should be paid to their claims which the corporation have displayed towards the charter of the fair of St. Bartholomew. That to secure an effective body of local representatives, they should be chosen from a large area, and it would therefore be expedient to extend the boundaries of the City of London five miles round the General Post Office; to divide that space into twenty-five wards and 100 precincts—each ward to return one alderman, and each precinct two representatives, so that an undivided jurisdiction may govern and regulate the interest of the whole community.

Mr. B. Steele.

Adjourned to Tuesday next, at 12 o'clock.

Tuesday, 29th November, 1853.

The Right Hon. HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., in the Chair.

Capt. F. Bullock.

29th Nov. 1853.

Captain Frederick Bullock, being examined, deposed as follows.

2604. You have been employed by the Admiralty in the survey of the port of London, have you not?—Yes; both of the Thames and Medway.

2605. When did you hold that appointment?—From the year 1830; but I have not been employed all the time in these rivers, but have surveyed all the coast; to Great Yarmouth on one side, to Portsmouth on the other.

2606. But during that time you have occasionally visited the Thames and Medway, with a view of ascertaining the condition of these rivers?—Not the Thames; but I partially surveyed the Medway fourteen years after its completion.

2607. You have surveyed the Thames, have you not?—Yes.

2608. Why did you re-survey the Medway and not the Thames?—The Medway was re-surveyed on the report of Mr. Gooden, who represented the Medway to have fallen into such a state of decay as to threaten its destruction.

2609. Beginning with the Thames, will you have the goodness to state what, in your opinion, is the condition of the Thames?—I have no means of making a comparative estimate of the present condition of the Thames, as there has been no authentic survey prior to mine, which is now the standard. It remains with the Lord Mayor as conservator, to give to the public and to science the advantages of a comparison; and I may here observe, that I have always advocated periodical examinations, as the only means of attaining a practical knowledge of the changes which take place in this important river.

2610. Have you any means of knowing whether the duties of the conservancy of the Thames have or have not been efficiently exercised by the City?—As I do not pretend to know what are the precise duties of that corporation, I cannot presume to give an opinion.

2611. Can you describe what is the actual state of the river with respect to the navigation?—There are certainly many shoals, that at times impede the navigation, and ought to have been removed long ago. I remember to have given evidence before a former committee upon this subject, when it was proved that the City had not the right to remove shoals, as they were claimed by the corporation of the Trinity Board. But before I proceed further, I must, in justice to the City of London, remark, that I believe this generation has done more towards the improvement of the Thames, than any other; for that in 1841 it was proposed in Parliament to embank the river between London and Westminster, and in 1842 a commission was appointed, under the direction of their energetic solicitor, Mr. Charles Pearson,—consisting of Mr. James Walker, president of the civil engineers; the principal harbour master, and other officials,—in which I was associated, and desired to report upon the condition of the Thames, as well as upon the best means of improving it.

2612. Do you mean that the navigation committee of the City of London employed you to report upon the state of the river?—Yes; and this is a copy of that report (producing the same).

2613. This report bears date of 1842?—Yes; it does.

2614. Do you know whether the recommendations you made in the report have been carried into effect?—I believe not, and for the reason that their Bill proposing to carry out these recommendations, and which was presented to Parliament in the session of 1845-46, was rejected by the Legislature.

2615. Are there any of the recommendations contained in this report which could have been carried into effect without the aid of Parliament?—I think not. The City, as I have said, have not the right to remove shoals; as the Trinity House claim, by their charter, all the soil of the river for ballast, and are bound to supply the port of London, but not to remove shoals.

2616. Is there any authority which has the power to remove shoals?—Yes. I believe that power to be in the authority of the Lord High Admiral; but I question whether that high power would not find opposition in the chartered rights of the two corporations, the City and Trinity.

2617. Do you mean that you understand that it is a matter of dispute on whom the right and duty of removing shoals in the port of London lies?—I mean to infer that it has been alleged that the City corporation has not the right, or they would not have applied to Parliament for authority to exercise it. The Trinity Board could remove shoals, and do, when their product serves for ballast; but otherwise they have no funds to apply for that purpose; only it seems to me therefore to be, in reality, vested in the Government, not only to improve the river or Queen's high way, by removing every obstruction to the navigation of it, without reference to corporate bodies; but to direct and enforce such sanitary measures as would help to maintain the health of the metropolis; and which is, I may be allowed to suggest, of much greater importance than disputes about the vested rights, real or assumed, with which the Government has lately had to deal. I beg here to allude to the report of 1842, in which we endeavoured to illustrate the advantage of an uniform embankment of the Thames; by which all the corrupt mud banks that abound in the vicinity of London, and pollute the atmosphere, would be covered in; and the unsightly steam-boat piers which at present disfigure the Thames, be replaced by safe, ornamental, and commodious landing-places.

2618. Have you surveyed any other river than the Thames and Medway?—Yes; both in America and England.

2619. Are you acquainted with the general state of the navigation of rivers?—Yes; but I do not think there was one, except the Thames and Medway, likely to afford instruction or useful data.

2620. What is the condition of the river Medway?—With respect to the embankment, it is in a bad condition.

2621. Is that in consequence of neglect, in your opinion?—No one takes an account of its decay. The proprietors of the marsh lands through which the river runs, do not generally think them worth preserving at a cost necessary for the purpose. I beg to impress upon the Commissioners the difference of condition of the two sister rivers, viz., that the Thames has been embanked within substantial sea walls from the time of the Romans, and is well guarded by parliamentary enactments. The Medway, on the contrary, has been allowed to pursue its own natural way towards the sea, through unprotected marsh lands, which, occasionally overflowed, and exposed to the devastating effects of strong winds, as well as high tides, are daily falling into the river; and must, therefore, in the end be inevitably submerged. (Vide Report on the Medway.)

2622. Are there any measures which, in your opinion, could be taken to prevent this injury occurring to the river Medway?—They are of so costly a nature, that we can hardly suggest such a measure now-a-days. The Thames was walled in, or embanked by the Roman soldiery, as I before observed; but although we have no soldiers to spare for such a purpose, we have convicts, who could be thus usefully employed by the State; but even then it would be at an enormous outlay.

2623. Are there any traces of embankment having at any time existed in the Medway?—Yes; on the Bishop's Marsh, which appears to have been entirely enclosed by sea-walls; but these have yielded to the effects of natural causes, as I have before explained, and are now in a dilapidated state; so that this marsh suffers like the rest. There are some other marshes walled in.

2624. Is the navigation of the Medway rapidly getting worse?—No; the river remains perfectly navigable, nor have we found any material alteration since our survey of 1837; but the unprotected edges of the marshes are falling into the river, and have a tendency to contract the river. The depths are maintained throughout its course.

2625. The injury then is to the marshes, and not to the river?—Not to the river, certainly.

2626. Those marsh lands are private property, probably?—All of them, I believe.

2627. It has been stated to us that there is some inconvenience from the conflicting nature of the signals, which are carried by steam vessels: some carrying the signals prescribed by the Admiralty; and others, those prescribed by the corporation of London. Have you any knowledge upon the subject?—I believe there is a discordance, but I do not know to what extent. I remember to have stated to the Admiralty, some time ago, this defect, and recommended uniformity in night signals—not only national, but international.

Capt. F. Bullock.
29th Nov. 1853.

Mr. F. Whistler.

Mr. Frederick Whistler, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2628. You are connected with the wine trade, are you not?—Yes; and also Portugal and Brazil merchant.

2629. Where is your house established?—In Sise Lane, Bucklersbury. I have been there and in that neighbourhood forty-six years. I should state, perhaps, that I am a freeman and liveryman of the Merchant Tailors' Company. Having lived upon that spot many years, of course one is known, and I have had the honour of having had a proposition twice made to induce me to become a common councilman. On the last two occasions of a vacancy, an alderman's gown was proposed to me if I would take it. I mention these things as having occurred, but the paramount duty of attending to my own business forbade me; and also, in my opinion, an alderman should be in independent circumstances, and have time at his command to devote to the duties of the office.

2630. Are there any points connected with your trade as an importer of wines which you desire to bring before the notice of the Commission?—I do not know that there are. There are orphans' dues, about 2*s.* 4*d.* per pipe, which are received by the City, but to those I make no objection. I only allude to them as one of the sources of revenue of the City. Among other articles, we import extensively oranges and lemons, and such like produce of Portugal, and we have sometimes felt rather vexed that 2*d.* should be charged on a trifling package in however decayed a state it may be, perhaps when the thing is hardly worth the money. I thought it right, as there is a large trade done in these and other things subject to metage, to wait upon the City solicitor some time ago, and ask him if he had a tariff as a guide to what those meters should charge. I found he had not, but he said I had better consult the meter. I was received very courteously; he said there was an old Act of Parliament in the time of James I.; he said, "It is not too hard "upon this foreign produce, when you consider that every sack of potatoes also pays 2*d.* "brought coastwise." I have volunteered to come before this honourable board as an old citizen, wishing that justice should be done to the City in what is represented to you, not doubting that every gentleman who has been examined may have spoken as he feels. But I think it would be very unjust and very ungrateful towards the City to sweep away the City corporation with its rights and immunities. That there wants a great reform there is no doubt, and one of the causes or reasons why I think so I beg to state, and it is this; the improvements in the City of London have been exceedingly slow. We are now in that state in the City that one can hardly move from one part of it to another, and we want another bridge. The corporation are very slow in coming to a conclusion, but if we do not have another bridge, we shall soon be brought to a complete stand-still. I have not been able to read the whole of the evidence before the Commission, but I see our police have been touched upon. Now, I beg to bear testimony to the excellent arrangement of our police. We have rather a large establishment, and under the old system of watchmen I think we paid for our premises about 10*l.* per annum. We now have both day and night watch by this most excellent police, admirably regulated, and it costs me about 5*l.* a-year, and has done so for many years successively. They are a very effective force, in one particular too much so. The serjeants walk abreast, which I believe the Guards do not do, and so occupy the narrow parts or paths of the City. With respect to the navigation also, I believe I am warranted in saying that there are no shoals in the river Thames which ought particularly to be complained of. There is one at Limehouse Reach, which is a part of the bank. It runs out, in fact; but the City very wisely some years ago, instead of allowing all the colliers to remain in that neighbourhood, distributed them in twos and threes almost as far down as Gravesend, so that there is a free navigation. I cannot help remarking upon what was said by the General Steam Navigation Company. I know that that company runs its large ships, even at low water, at a considerable risk. The Steam Navigation Company cannot expect that at low water they can bring up their heavy ships. With respect to lights, I think it is most commendable in the City of London to order a light to be placed on the bowsprit. It appears that the General Steam Navigation Company act under the Admiralty regulation, and they have only the two paddle-wheel lights and one at the masthead; consequently there is much more danger in those large ships coming up the river rapidly. I only regret that the City of London do not prosecute them for not carrying out their regulations.

2631. Are you yourself a ship owner?—No; but I have a good deal to do with ships. There is a complaint made that there are not sufficient watermen and craft for the loading and unloading of the goods and conveying them. There are upwards of 6,000 licensed men who are all lightermen and watermen, and able to steer a craft. I look upon it that if I effect an insurance at Lloyd's, if I were to employ an unqualified man, a man who did not understand well the navigation of the Thames, and the craft were lost, the underwriter would not be liable for the insurance. It is absolutely necessary that a man should be educated and serve his time to know the various currents and sudden turns of the Thames. With regard to the magistracy, I certainly have heard that some very respectable and intelligent gentlemen have given their evidence that it would be better for us to have a stipendiary magistrate. For my own part I quite differ from that. I have never in my forty-six years heard a complaint of the decisions of the magistrates of the City of London, and I have heard some of the first judges of the land admire and praise the manner in which they got through their business. I think therefore an alderman who has gone through the various paraphernalia of office, and arrived at that high position, is a very fit man to occupy it. In drawing a distinction, which I have heard one gentleman draw, between an alderman magistrate and a country magistrate, with all due respect to the latter, I conceive that an intelligent alderman, who has been in London so many years, with so much experience, is a much more able man to preside over cases which may come before him. At the same time, with regard to the aldermen, we certainly are in a very unpleasant position. An alderman is elected for life. If he falls into a dilapidated condition, he remains still a magistrate, and presiding over his fellow-men when he himself perhaps is under the lash of the law. Great complaints are made that we have not a higher class of persons in the council, and it is to be lamented; but, at the same time, I think, as by the effect of the Reform Bill the freedom costs very little, the gentlemen who find so much fault ought to be willing to pay that small sum, and so have an opportunity of being in the council. However, they do not do so, and it is very true that there is a want, in my humble judgment, of a larger number of men who are perhaps in a different position in life to bring in their experience, and I can conceive, if I may be permitted to make the suggestion, scarcely any other way of accomplishing it than that of throwing open the franchise, or, in other words, taking away the right of freedom, not making that the qualification, but saying that the man who is qualified to vote for a member of Parliament shall be qualified to be admitted to the council. If that were done, it might perhaps be wise to have it stipulated that when a man is elected he shall serve or be fined. Then we should have many of those gentlemen in the council who make such great complaints of the paraphernalia of the Lord Mayor's show, and of the eating and drinking. I certainly do complain of the heavy rates we have to pay, and particularly the consolidated rate, which may have come under the notice of the Commissioners. It is excessive, and I believe the corporation have an Act of Parliament which gives them great latitude, and very often in that consolidated rate the expense of sewers is included, notwithstanding we have a heavy sewer rate. Certainly greater control is required over the finance of the City in my judgment, and that would be accomplished, I think, by doing away with the freedom, as by that means we may have gentlemen in the council who hitherto have not been so. I say, from positive knowledge, that in the City of London we have not water enough. The water may be said to be very good—it is supplied by the New River Company. In days gone by the City of London, by an arrangement, had plugs opened in the streets, which were flushed as well as the sewers, but now that is never done. The supply of water is shorter in the houses than it was. I know that to be the case from my own experience. I think it is a disgrace to the City of London that we have not better markets. When you visit Liverpool and Manchester, you find in those great populous places there are wholesome good markets, but the City generally, with its immense means, manifests great apathy. There is Leadenhall Market for one, and Newgate Market for another. They are really pests. There is an immense mass of eatables there, but so crowded that people can hardly move, and the waste is very deleterious to health. The rentals, not only of the markets, but the houses round about, no doubt bring in a great income, but I conceive the City might get as large an income if they were to rase the present markets to the ground, and build proper and suitable places. I have said that I am a freeman of the Merchant Tailors' Company, though I am not in the court. I believe there are erroneous impressions prevailing with respect to the companies. The funds of those companies I believe are most virtuously and righteously administered. Indeed it is delightful to see what our forefathers have done in the way of leaving money to their poorer brethren. With respect also to the City funds, I have no doubt the corporation exercises its trusts rightly; but it requires to be spurred on, if I may say so, from time to time, and I do not see any other way of doing it but by bringing in a different class of men to those who at present occupy the position of members of the corporation.

T. Rogers, Esq.

THOMAS ROGERS, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2632. What is your connexion with the City of London?—I am a solicitor. I have been a solicitor in the City of London for nearly thirty years.

2633. Are you connected with the corporation in any manner?—I have been connected with the corporation. Having lived nineteen years in the ward of Bishopgate in the year 1839, I was returned to the common council and served during that year.

2634. You are not now in the common council?—No; but I am a liveryman of the Spectacle Makers' Company.

2635. While you were a member of the common council did you take any part in the business of that body?—Yes; a very considerable part.

T. Rogers, Esq.

29th Nov. 1853.

2636. Will you have the goodness to state any points to which you desire to call our attention, particularly with regard to the working of the common council?—In the first place I think the practice of the common council is as nearly as possible that of the House of Commons. It is presided over by the Lord Mayor; the recorder is called the mouthpiece of the corporation; he takes the votes when anything is to be regulated as to the number of the common council, then an Act is passed as was the case shortly after I left. There was an Act passed to reduce the number of the corporation from 243 to 206 or 203 I forget which. The mode in which an Act is passed is this:—A member brings in a bill. It is read. A copy is sent to each member; it is then considered in committee, and it is afterwards gone through clause by clause and passed.

2637. Were you a member of any of the committees of the common council while you belonged to that body?—I was.

2638. Have you any observations to make with respect to the working of the committees of the common council?—I was on two committees; the coal, corn, and finance committee, and the general purposes committee. Those committees are ward committees; that is, each ward sends a committee man. Those committees have the right of calling before them any officer in the corporation; and, although the navigation committee, as I have seen it stated here, might not have a merchant upon it, yet if they require any information, they have four harbour masters to send to, who can give the proper information in respect to the point on which they desire it. If any of those committees require for instance any knowledge on municipal law or general law, they send to the clerk. If they want information upon the statute or common law, they send to the solicitor. If they want any information about opposing any bill before Parliament, they send to the remembrancer.

2639. Are the proceedings of the committees conducted with closed doors?—I have seen persons present, but very seldom. I think I may say strangers are excluded.

2640. Are the proceedings of those committees published?—No.

2641. Are any divisions which take place in them published?—No; minutes are taken.

2642. Are those minutes regularly laid before the common council or the Court of Aldermen?—Yes; the book is laid before the Court of Common Council.

2643. Are they printed?—No.

2644. Are not the reports of those committees which are made to the common council ever printed?—There was one report during my time which was printed. It was with respect to the coalwhippers.

2645. Was that by a special vote?—Yes.

2646. What were the functions of the committee for general purposes?—The functions of that committee were generally as to the Mansion House, the furnishing it, and various matters; furnishing Guildhall, and upholstery generally.

2647. Do you mean that they controlled the miscellaneous expenditure of all kinds?—To a certain extent. The whole of the Mansion House was under their supervision.

2648. Are they a finance committee?—No; there is a coal, corn, and finance committee.

2649. Can you give us any idea as to the manner in which those committees are composed; do you consider that persons who are acquainted with the different subjects referred to the committees are placed upon them?—Not in general. There are some special committees appointed, but in general in the ward committees they do not look at that at all.

2650. They do not look to any special fitness in the persons appointed?—No.

2651. Is there any regard to special fitness in the person selected as chairman?—There is. By the rules of the court a person cannot be elected as chairman till he has served two years in the committee.

2652. Reverting to the committee for general purposes, do you recollect what allowance was made to that committee while you were on it?—Not a sixpence, so far as money is concerned. I can show you what was expended for dinners.

2653. What was the amount of allowance made to that committee for the purpose of dinners?—The City lands committee were allowed 400*l.*; the committee for general purposes were allowed 200*l.*, and the coal, corn, and finance committee 200*l.*

2654. How was that sum of 200*l.* spent when you were upon that committee?—It was spent in this manner: in order to induce the members to attend punctually the chairman waits five minutes, and then his hammer falls, and all who are then present in the monthly meetings have a right to dine together; all who come after the five minutes are excluded from the dinner.

2655. This dinner is once a month?—It is. Though the committee may meet four or five times in the course of the month, there is only one dinner. The chairman orders that dinner, and 200*l.* is spent for the purpose in the course of the year.

2656. Do you think that the system of dinners for the committees is a good one?—I think it is.

2657. On what ground?—On the ground that it brings various members of the committee to the consideration of questions brought before the committees who otherwise would not be brought there; and besides that, they are gentlemen generally who have to leave their house for the whole of the day. The dinner hour of those gentlemen is generally past before they break up.

2658. You think it produces a larger attendance than would otherwise take place?—I am sure it does. If that committee do not attend to their business, there must be a steward or some officer paid for managing the business, and I think the business is particularly well managed by the committees.

2659. Are the guests at the dinners exclusively composed of the members of the committee?—The chairman has the right of inviting two friends generally from his ward. Aldermen who are upon the commission attend, and occasionally one of the officers of the corporation.

2660. You say that these dinners only take place after the monthly meetings, but the committees meet on intermediate occasions; have you observed that the attendance is fuller on the days on which there is a dinner than on the days on which there is not?—I think so.

2661. Do you speak confidently?—I have no doubt of it.

2663. The members of the sub-committee are not so numerous as those of the committee generally?—No.

2664. Then the comparison would not be a fair one?—No.

2665. Are there any meetings of the committees on the intermediate occasions?—Yes; in the coal whippers' business there were various meetings.

2666. Did you observe that the attendance on the days on which there were no dinners was less full than on the occasions on which there were dinners?—No; that was a committee which was considered of some interest and importance.

2667. When there are questions of interest and importance your experience leads you to state that the members will attend without the inducement of a dinner?—I do not think the dinner has any effect then.

2669. Are you speaking of his private charities?—Yes; and I have no reason to suppose that the other aldermen do not do the same, perhaps not to the same extent, because he is a most liberal man. As justices of the peace, I should be very sorry indeed to see them superseded. I think perhaps as a class they are the best magistrates in the country, and I think they ought to be so from their previous education, many of them in the Court of Common Council, and many of them in the Court of Aldermen, and their sitting for three months in the course of a year by the side of the judges, the best school I should think a man could have for learning the magisterial duties, and a superior school to that which any country magistrate enjoys, for he only sees the judges twice a year if he attends the assizes, whereas those magistrates are there from fortnight to fortnight. They attend according to rota, and, so far as my judgment goes, they make admirable magistrates. I will not mention any present magistrate, because that would be invidious; but I will mention that I have frequently seen with much satisfaction the late Alderman Gibbs presiding at the Mansion House. I think for tact, for an aptness in the administration of justice, and for seizing the salient points of a case, I never saw a man of more ability in a magistrate's chair; it was perfectly beautiful to see the way in which that gentleman conducted his business. It is very easy to say that these magistrates shall be superseded, but they stand upon very superior grounds to any magistrates in the country; and I think there is a charter which will prevent anything like a supercession. That charter is very short, and I will read it. In 1461 King Edward IV., in his first charter to the City of London, grants—"To the mayor, recorder, and aldermen to be "justices of the peace for putting all ordinances for the preservation of the peace and the "good government of the City and the suburbs thereof, as well by land as water, in "execution; and that the said mayor, recorder, and alderman shall be justices of Oyer "and Terminer, and that the mayor for the time being, and his successors, shall be of the "quorum. The sheriffs in the City are to be attendant on the said justices." Suppose you say these gentlemen are not fit for the magistrates' chair, are they fit to be justices of Oyer and Terminer? No magistrates in the country are justices of Oyer and Terminer.

T. Rogers, Esq.

29th Nov. 1853.

There is therefore a great distinction between the two. These magistrates sit along with the judges.

2670. Do they exercise any of the functions of justices of Oyer and Terminer?—They can give their advice.

2671. Do they practically exercise the functions of justices of Oyer and Terminer?—I have seen them interrupt and ask questions, but very seldom; still they are there as justices of Oyer and Terminer.

2672. Have you ever observed them ask a question of a witness in court?—No.

2673. Did you ever see them take any part in the trial of a prisoner under the commission of Oyer and Terminer?—I cannot say that I did. I have heard them speak to persons in court as judges.

2674. Can it be practically said that they take any part in the trial of prisoners under the commission of Oyer and Terminer?—No further than assisting the judge.

2675. Do they practically give him any assistance?—Of course they allow the judge to take the whole of the management upon himself.

2676. Can it be said that they do render him any assistance?—Yes; by advice and counsel frequently.

2677. By oral suggestions do you mean?—As to various practical points which the judge may not understand.

2678. Do you think it desirable that the aldermen should sit in court to make private suggestions to the judges while they are trying prisoners?—I should not suppose that any person would make private suggestions against a prisoner.

2679. Then what part is it which they take; if they do not take any part in public and do not make private suggestions, what is it they do?—They never deliver judgments, but they sit there as judges. I have frequently seen in the Queen's Bench the judges deliberate together, but only one gives judgment.

2680. Does the judge deliberate with the aldermen in the same manner that the judges do in the Court of Queen's Bench?—Very frequently.

2681. Do you speak from personal observation?—Yes; I have been in those courts, and have observed it.

2682. Will you proceed to any other point to which you wish to call our attention?—I wish to say that I think it would be a very difficult matter to deprive this City of any part of their charter, which is considered one of the brightest gems belonging to the corporation. I am quite sure it will he fought quite as earnestly as the proposal with regard to the police, which happened in my year of office. In that case the Minister of the day, Lord Melbourne, brought in a bill to unite the City police to the metropolitan police; it was objected to by the corporation. They petitioned the House of Commons. They saw that the Minister was determined. They then addressed the Crown, and a gracious answer was given; but they understood its nature. The Minister was still determined, and they then acted on the French maxim, "Help thyself and Heaven will help thee." They immediately fixed their town clerk in New Palace Yard; they gave him a large body of assistants, and instructed him to communicate with every corporation in the United Kingdom. The consequence was, by the influence of those country corporations, the Minister found that his support fell like a rope of sand. He gave up his measure, and the police of the City has been in the hands of Mr. Commissioner Harvey since that time; and you have just heard how the gentleman who has just preceded me has spoken of the police.

2683. What was the nature of the communications made to the country corporations?—I do not know; I was not on the committee who superintended the business.

2684. You say that the town clerk was established at New Palace Yard?—Yes; as a solicitor would be to watch any important affairs.

2685. And he made communications to the country corporations?—He made communications everywhere to obtain strength.

2686. And in consequence of the feeling produced in the country corporations, the Government desisted from its intentions?—It did.

2687. What do you suppose was the nature of the representations made to the country corporations?—That an attempt was being made to take away from them a portion of their duty, that is, the preservation of the peace; just the same representation, I have no doubt, would be made with respect to the attempt to take away the justice business.

2688. How did the country corporations influence the Government?—It is not for me to say how; but the thing was done. We all know how these things are done in the country; what influence those corporations have upon members of Parliament.

2689. In dealing with the other corporations in England by the Municipal Reform Act, Parliament thought itself justified upon the ground of public policy in interfering a good deal with the judicial functions of the magistrates of those boroughs, did not it?—It did.

2690. Can you see any reason in point of principle, without entering into the question whether it would or would not be right to alter the situation of the aldermen in London in that respect, which ought to deter the Legislature, if they think it for the public advantage, from dealing in like manner with the corporation of London?—In point of principle I think the objection lies in the charter against it.

2691. Were not there charters in the case of some of the country corporations?—Very recent charters only; not beyond the reign of Charles. T. Rogers, Esq.

2692. Do you think that a charter of the reign of Edward ought to be respected when a charter of the reign of King Charles should be regarded as a more modern document?—Yes, I do; because the practice under the charter has been longer 29th Nov. 1853.

WILLIAM EDWARD HICKSON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows. W. E. Hickson, Esq.

2693. Have you given much attention to the subject of the corporation of London?—The subject of the corporation of London and municipal institutior s generally, as connected with the City and the metropolis, is a subject to which I have given very great attention.

2694. I believe you are the author of various articles which appeared in the Westminster Review some time ago, and have since been reprinted as pamphlets?—Yes. I was formerly commercially connected with the City, and have been acquainted with City affairs from my youth upwards. I am not at present so connected, and have not been for many years; but I still retain a personal and pecuniary interest in the reduction of City local burdens, as an owner of property in the City. I am a ratepayer to some considerable extent in the parish of St. Dunstan, Fleet Street, and the local rates I am called on personally to discharge every year, somewhat painfully remind me of the necessity of a Commission of Inquiry, such as that before which I now appear, and of efforts being continually made for the improvement of City local administration.

2695. Were you ever an inhabitant of the City of London?—Yes. But it is perhaps fifteen years since I was an habitual resident. I still, however, retain chambers in the City; and when in town occasionally sleep there.

2696. You do not now carry on any trade in the City?—I do not. I have not done so for the last fifteen years. Since the subject of the Westminster Review has been mentioned, it may be as well to explain that I carried on the old series of the Westminster Review, as proprietor and principal conductor, for a period of eleven years. During that time I endeavoured to make that organ subservient principally to questions of administrative improvement, and among those questions of course matters relating to the corporation of London with which I was familiar, naturally engaged my attention; and I frequently wrote myself articles on that subject, several of which were reprinted and extensively circulated.

2697. Were you ever yourself a member of the common council?—I never have been a member of the Court of Common Council.

2698. Will you state generally the view you take of the defects of the present system?—I should state that the object I have always had in view, and the object of those who have acted with me in reference to this matter, has not been so much to make out a case against the corporation of London, as to show the necessity of a better system of local government generally for the City of London, than now exists, both for its internal affairs and in its relations to the whole metropolis. I wish also to state, that I have never been solicitous to prove charges of corruption against any member of the Court of Common Council or the Court of Aldermen. I do not think that the charge of personal corruption does apply, generally, to the members of either court. I think, on the whole, the members of both courts may be regarded as a fair average of the middle class of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. There are among them as honourable men as I am myself, and as are to be found in any municipal constituency of this empire. The case is not that of corruption as against individual members of those courts, though of course there may be corruption in that body as there is, more or less, in other bodies similarly constituted; and we all know that corruption has been brought home in former times (we will say nothing of the present) to Government departments. The gist of the matter is this: we are eaten up in the City with establishment expenses. It is an instance of the principle of divided management and conflicting jurisdictions, carried out to the reductio ad absurdum. The question of City reform is not one chiefly affecting particular abuses, but a question of consolidation; consolidation of useless establishments and general simplification. It is like the case of a man who, having had a large fortune left him, calls in all his friends and neighbours to assist him in its management. Though his friends and neighbours might be perfectly honest men, somehow or other it would happen at the end of the year, from the interference of so many persons, little would be left for himself; and that, on the contrary, perhaps that he would be called upon to discharge a heavy bill of expenses. I have investigated the municipal institutions both of this country and the continent, and am of opinion that there is not a City in the world in which local burdens ought to be so small as in the City of London, nor one in which, instead of being light, they are so heavy, and overwhelmingly so, as they are in the City at this present moment.

2699. Do you mean by City burdens the rates paid by the citizens of London, or do you mean that taking into consideration the great amount of property which the City has, the expenditure is unreasonably large?—I mean both. I speak with reference to the direct taxation of local rates, and with reference to the indirect taxation; also to the immense trust estates available, or which ought to be rendered available for municipal objects.

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

29th Nov. 1853.

2700. Are you able to substantiate those statements?—I believe I am; and in proceeding to do so, perhaps I should begin by requesting the attention of the Commission to the mode of keeping the accounts of the corporation. Here is an account before me which the corporation publishes annually; it is called a statement of the proceeds and expenditure of the City estate. In this, as in everything else in the City of London, we find the same principle of a divided management; so that it is extremely difficult to get, and no person but those who have studied the subject for many years as I have done myself, can get, such a complete view of the whole as could be obtained in a few minutes from the accounts of any large municipality on the continent, or even in this country, from those of provincial corporations since the passing of the Municipal Reform Act. The account of the City estates relates principally to the rents collected from real property in their possession, the proceeds of the 4*d.* coal duty, and the markets; altogether amounting to 200,000*l.* a year. When the last Commission of Inquiry was sitting, a corresponding account was produced before it, and the officers of the corporation referring to that account stated that the income for which the corporation was then answerable in its corporate capacity, amounted only to about 150,000*l.* They made a distinction, to the fallacy of which the last Commission was not sufficiently alive, between what they call their corporate estate (that is, the estate for which they are responsible as a corporate body), and the funds which they administer under Acts of Parliament, which they call Acts of Parliament funds. Now, nothing relating to Acts of Parliament funds is to be found in this account of the City estate; and the officers of the corporation endeavoured to impress the minds of the last Commissioners with a conviction that their inquiry related only to matters connected with this account as that of funds which the corporation held in its corporate capacity. Unfortunately that impression was made upon the minds of the last Commissioners, those of 1837, who passed very lightly over the question about the management of funds administered under specific Acts of Parliament, and reported that the annual income of the City corporation was about 148,000*l.* This was at a time when it was perfectly known to those of us who had taken an active part in the matter out of doors, that the corporation of London ought to have been considered financially responsible, in both capacities, for something like 600,000*l.* per annum instead of this 148,000*l.* This was stated one day by Lord Brougham in the House of Lords, and in consequence of it there was a shout of incredulity raised the next day by the members of the corporation. Members of the House of Lords and of the House of Commons were personally waited on and assured that the noble Lord had been most grossly misled; that the City expenditure was nothing of the kind; and that they might see in the Commissioners' report of 1837, that the estate of the London corporation really amounted to this sum of 150,000*l.* a year. The result was, that the City reformers, like myself, have more or less been subjected to the imputation of having very greatly exaggerated the gross receipts of the corporation, and that the reform of the corporation has been postponed till now as a question which did not press. This impression that there has been a great exaggeration on our part both of corporation receipts and expenditure is, I have no doubt, the very honest belief at the present time of many honourable men both in the Court of Aldermen and the common council, whom personally I myself respect; and it arises from this mode of keeping the accounts of the corporation; that is, so divided and sub-divided that they become almost unintelligible. Here is the last statement of the City estate, showing a revenue amounting now to 200,000*l.* for the year 1852; but, turning to one of the pages in this very book, we find a list of balances, showing that all the funds that pass through the hands of the corporation or the members of the corporation are embraced in no less than sixty different accounts or more, kept by the City chamberlain; and as he presents no annual balance sheet showing the gross aggregate of his receipts, the members of the common council really know little or nothing about the matter. The most active and inquisitive members of the court have but an imperfect idea of what a business-like balance sheet would reveal. It is like the case of a fly on St. Paul's, setting itself to consider the magnitude of the stone upon which it has alighted. It sees the stone and can calculate its dimensions, but can form no adequate conception of the size of the whole building. This will give the Commissioners an idea of the reason why there is always a great discrepancy between the statements made out of doors and the statements put forward by officers of the corporation. The chamberlain never presents a balance sheet in which all the receipts that come into the hands of the officers of the corporation appear as they ought to do upon the one side and also all the expenditure upon the other.

2701. When you talk of all the receipts that come into the hands of the corporation, do you include such receipts as the 8*d.* for coal duty, of which the corporation are the mere recipients, but which they immediately hand over to other parties who are not accountable to the corporation?—I shall be happy to speak to that point; the more so as I perceive, from the nature of the question, the evidence hitherto submitted on the subject has not been exact. I must entirely demur to the statement that they are the mere recipients of the 8*d.* duty, and that all they have to do with it is to hand it over to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests; but before I come to it let me observe, that in taking up any one of those accounts, there is scarcely an item which is not calculated to mislead. For instance: one naturally looks for items of establishment expenses. Taking first the office of Lord Mayor, the sum that appears in this City estate account is 6,000*l.*, as paid out of the City cash to that officer; and persons accustomed only to take a superficial glance at accounts of this kind, would at once set down the salary of the Lord Mayor at 6,000*l.*; but it is well known, and a fact which will not be disputed by any member of the corporation, that in addition to this 6,000*l.*, the Lord Mayor receives about 2,000*l.* in fees at the Mansion House; his real salary being 8,000*l.* in round numbers. This 2,000*l.* does not at all appear in the account of the City estate.

2702. Does that sum of 2,000*l.* which is received in the shape of fees, appear in any City account?—It does not.

2703. Does not it appear in the City account which the corporation gave to the last Commissioners of the emoluments attached to the office of Lord Mayor?—It may do so; that is very possible. I have not lately referred to that part of the report.

2704. Does it occur in any of the annual financial statements of the City?—I am not acquainted with any in which it occurs.

2705. Would an item showing the fees which are received by the Lord Mayor properly appear in an account of the receipts and expenditure of the City?—Yes; in all well regulated municipal establishment, the fees of office appear in the accounts of the office; and latterly, in the case of several City officers, in whose salary some reduction has been attempted, the subject of their fees has been taken into consideration by the Court of Common Council. As a mere matter of account, I think they ought to appear, because they are really burdens upon the public, and the public has a right to know what it pays in all shapes, whether in fees or any other way.

2706. Though a burden upon the public, it may not be a receipt of the corporation?—I think the object of this inquiry and the general object of City reformers is to discover, not merely how much goes into the hands of the corporation in a corporate capacity, but what the public pays altogether, directly or indirectly, to the officers of the corporation. There are many items I might take up to illustrate the general complexity and obscurity of the corporation accounts to which I have referred. With regard to the City tradesmen, it is well known that the office of City tradesmen in some instances is worth upwards of 1,000*l.* a year, but the bills of the City tradesmen are never stated, so that the gross amounts of them can be ascertained. They appear in fractions such as 5*l.* in one place, 6*l.* in another, 14*l.* in a third, and so on. Tradesmen's bills are sent in to different committees, and the different committee classify the accounts in their own way, so that the members of one committee do not know the expenditure of another.

2707. Does divided management necessarily imply divided accounts?—It does not, of course, necessarily imply them, but in this case we have to do with a simple fact. In reference to this subject of fees, a return has been recently given of the salaries and fees received by the different officers of the London corporation. A report has been printed, dated 28th July 1853, of the nature of the emoluments and salaries of officers of the London corporation at the present time. This report, I see, has been quoted in the evidence before the Commissioners now sitting, and therefore I am desirous of referring to it to explain a misconception. It is an incomplete report, although there is not a word of intimation in it from the committee appointed in March last to inquire "Into officers' "salaries and emoluments" that the return is imperfect. This return amounts to 55,000*l.*, which persons unacquainted with the subject would naturally suppose to be the whole amount of the salaries and emoluments of the officers of the courts. Such a supposition, however, would be altogether a mistake. The incompleteness of the return may be seen at a glance. In the first place, we have the chief officer of the corporation omitted. Neither the Lord Mayor's salary nor the Lord Mayor's fees of office are stated in this return. We look for the officers of another important branch of the administration of the corporation, and we find that the commissioner of police of the City, who receives 1,000*l.* per annum, and his chief officers are also omitted. We search for those of another branch of the administration, and we find that the district surveyors and their fees, which are considerable, are omitted; officers connected with the metage charges are also omitted. In fact, salaries and emoluments of officers connected with the corporation of London to the amount of at least 50,000*l.* are not included in this return. And yet this report of the committee does not make any reference whatever to its incompleteness.

2708. Does that return profess to be a complete return?—It does not. The headings of the columns are: "Name of office, salary, and emoluments; sources of emoluments, "whether under Act of Parliament or otherwise." It is an instance of that suppressio veri which in its effect, unintentional perhaps, is tantamount to the suggestio falsi. The report is silent upon its omissions; and my attention was drawn to it by seeing that one of the witnesses had quoted it as if it were complete. This has induced me to bring forward a statement which I drew up some years back, after going through the figures with Mr. Williams, M.P., when member for Coventry; who had at a former period been a member of the court, and had taken great pains to ascertain what the salaries and emoluments of the officers of the corporation really were. I will re-produce that statement for the purpose of throwing a little light upon the subject, and also with reference to a very important branch of the question—namely, the compensation which the Commission will have to contemplate if any extensive reform should be carried out. This is a statement of the patronage of the London corporation:—

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

29th Nov. 1853.

A STATEMENT of the Cost to the Public, in the year 1833, of the Officers and Clerks of the London Corporation, in Salaries, Fees, and Office Allowances, from Returns signed by the Officers themselves, and presented by them to the Revenue Committee of the Court of Common Council in 1835 :—

	£	s.	d.
Legal Staff, (consisting of appointments held by solicitors, barristers, proctors, and attorneys' clerks)	38,067	19	6
State Officers, (the Lord Mayor, chamberlain, sheriffs, yeomen, trumpeters, &c.)	24,187	2	9
Officers of Customs and Market Dues	29,338	12	8
Officers of City Gaols	4,330	7	2
Officers of Public Works	5,403	12	5
Miscellaneous Officers, (including hall-keepers, beadles, Irish Society, Port of London, &c.)	9,653	5	3
	£110,980	19	10

Even this account was incomplete at the time it was rendered; but it was made from returns by the officers themselves, and signed by themselves. There is a general impression that since the report of the committee to which I allude, published in 1835, a great change has taken place for the better. One of the witnesses before the Commissioners, for whom I entertain a great respect, Mr. Dillon, who acted with me about that time in the promotion of City reform, stated in his evidence that he believed matters had much improved since then; and that they have so, is generally given out by the Court of Common Council. I have looked a little into the facts, to ascertain for myself how far the impression sought to be conveyed of an improvement is well founded, and the facts are these: there has been some reduction of office expenses, and there has been some increase of them. Some offices have been abolished, and new offices have been established. There has been in several instances a composition of salaries. Salaries have been given in lieu of fees. The fees in 1835 amounted to something like 70,000*l.* a year, received by officers of the corporation in sums not at all passing through the City accounts; that amount has now been somewhat reduced.

2709. Do you mean including metage dues and receipts of that sort?—Including the fees connected with the metage dues.

2710. Do you include the trade dues?—Not all the trade dues. I speak not of dues credited by the corporation in their accounts, but of fees of the same miscellaneous class as are received by the Lord Mayor at the present time, of which Sir Peter Laurie made a return in 1833. These fees have been in various instances reduced, but altogether the amount of salaries and fees, so far as I can satisfy myself on the subject, is now not less than it was in 1835, and I believe it to be in the gross considerably more. I will not take upon myself to say how much more, but if I were to state the sum received in salaries and emoluments by officers connected with the London corporation at 120,000*l.* per annum, it would not, I think, exceed the amount, but rather be within it. That is my bonâ fide impression. Of course, like all other human beings, I am liable to err.

2711. Are those fees received by different officers of the corporation in their individual capacity, or are they received by the corporation and put into the general funds?—In a few cases the fees go into the hands of the chamberlain, and appear in the City accounts, but that is not the general rule.

2712. Do you include, for instance, in the sum you have named, fees received on the admission of freemen?—No; the amount of them is now small; and regarding the subject of fees as a minor point, I have not prepared myself with all the figures that I might have done to show the details. If the Commissioners wish to obtain an accurate account of these receipts, the question of the compensation to be given City officers is one of the first matters upon which it will be necessary to decide. It is rather hard to call upon any man to make out a case against himself. If you ask an officer to give an account of his fees and emoluments, when he knows that your object is to consolidate useless establishments and save the public money at his expense, you must expect a natural reluctance to disclose the truth under such circumstances. In the former case, as soon as the returns of 1833 were added up, and the public got an idea of the grand total, there was a general expression of regret among the officers of the corporation that they had given accounts so fully as they had done. No member of the Court of Common Council has been able to obtain a corresponding return from that time to the present; nor will this Commission succeed any better, unless it first grapples with this difficulty of how officers of the corporation are to be indemnified when the existing system is abolished, or so greatly modified as to supersede them. It is a rule, I believe, with committees of the House of Commons, when they call upon a witness to give any statement which may criminate himself, to agree beforehand to a resolution that he shall be protected from any consequences which might otherwise follow. Of course this Commission cannot indemnify witnesses, but as far as its report is concerned, I think if it were understood that the Commissioners would recommend, as I would myself suggest the propriety of their doing, a liberal scale of compensation to all officers superseded, they would get at a greater amount of truth than is likely otherwise will be brought out. I know at the present time there are many honourable men officers of the corporation painfully situated, desiring to give the fullest evidence on this subject; but, feeling the necessity of having some regard to their own personal position and the interest of their wives and families, they will appear with great reluctance before this Commission. I would myself recommend the principle that was carried out on the abolition of the six-clerks' office in the Court of Chancery, that is to say, the principle of a very liberal compensation, believing that the public would be very largely gainers by it. I would recommend that a retiring pension to the amount of two-thirds of existing salaries and emoluments should be given generally to officers likely to be superseded under the provisions of any bill which may be passed in consequence of this inquiry.

2713. Do all officers deriving any personal emolument from fees which they themselves receive, give a complete account of those fees to the corporation?—They do not at the present time.

2714. Is it your statement that at the present the corporation do not know the amount annually received in the shape of fees by many of their own officers?—Undoubtedly that is my statement.

2715. Can you specify any of the officers so situated?—I would rather not do so, because it would be invidious to single out individuals, and too much in the nature of personal accusations. I wish to confine myself as much as possible to general principles.

In connexion with this subject of officers' salaries and fees, there is one other point to which I wish to call the attention of the Commission, and that is, the importance of endeavouring to obtain accurate returns not merely of the salary and emoluments of each individual officer, but the expense of each individual office, which is the more important question. For example, with reference to the office of chamberlain, if any member of the Court of Common Council be asked what is given to the chamberlain for his services, the answer is 2,500*l.*; but the fact with which the public have to do is, that the office of chamberlain costs 4,600*l.*—2,500*l.* are given to the chamberlain, but 2,100*l.* besides are given to the different chief clerks and under clerks in his office, who practically do the work.

2716. Is 2,500*l.* a year the entire sum received by the chamberlain himself?—His salary is now limited to that amount; he is entitled to make as much profit as he can by the interest of the money in his hands; but he is required by the last resolution of the court to hand over the surplus above the 2,500*l.* to the corporation. Including, however, his clerks, &c., the office costs at least 4,600*l.*

So with regard to the office of town clerk and his emoluments. If you look over the returns of July 1853, which I have just handed in, you will perceive that the town clerk's salary received out of the City estates is put down at 900*l.*, and his emoluments 982*l.*; but turn to the City estates account, and there you will find that over and above this sum of 1,882*l.*, his clerks and the office expenses are charged at the rate of 2,787*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, showing that the office of town clerk costs 4,679*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* Now, that rule applies more or less to all the offices of the corporation of London. There is a salary, generally a large salary, given to the chief officer in the shape of cash. In most cases he is allowed besides certain emoluments in the shape of fees; and over and above that, there is as much given to the clerks in the office and as much spent for general expenses as, in any other municipal constituency in the kingdom, or I may say in the world, ought to be considered sufficient for all the expenses of the office.

Having made these general remarks with reference to the corporation of London, it may be useful to put in evidence the accounts of some other municipal bodies, having similar duties to discharge. The first statement that I have drawn up with this view, is an abstract of the accounts of the municipal borough of Leeds, for the year ending Sept. 1st, 1853. The borough contains a population of 172,270 persons; which is 50,000 more than the City of London. Inhabited houses, 12,805. The aggregate expenses of the municipal borough of Leeds are but 17,603*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* It is arranged under these items: expenditure in reference to police, 8,737*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*; expenditure in reference to justice, including the prosecutions of criminals, and committals at quarter sessions, and also at York county assizes, 729*l.*; the borough gaol account, 2,439*l.*; the county lunatic asylum, 1,261*l.* Salaries and allowances for the whole of this business, including the town clerk, 500*l.*; the recorder, 200*l.*; the coroner 269*l.*; sundry officers, and office expenses, 290*l.*—making 1,259*l.* (The same was delivered in, and is as follows):—

The above is exclusive of the cost of paving, cleansing, and lighting, and of the relief of the poor under separate management."

I should observe that this account is of course only to be applied by way of comparison to some branches only of the expenditure of the City of London. It does not include the paving, lighting, and cleansing; nor does it include the poor's rate, which is under separate management.

2717. Does the City account include the poor's rate?—It does not; but the account which I shall now present, the account of the parish of Marylebone, does include the poor's rate.

2718. Neither the Leeds account nor the City account includes the poor's rate?—No; but it appears in this of Marylebone, which is a very important account. The parish of Marylebone is a remarkable instance of comprehensiveness in municipal matters of administration. Its governing body is known only by the humble title of a parish vestry, and yet really enjoys, in reference to useful matters of expenditure, much more power than the corporation of London. It takes, for instance, which the corporation of London does not, the management of the churches. Included in the accounts of the parish of Marylebone are seven different churches and chapels. It receives the pew rents for those churches and chapels, and pays the ministers' stipends, lecturers' salaries, and visitation fees out of the general funds; and it includes all the more customary branches of municipal administration for the whole of a very extensive district. The population of Marylebone is 157,696; inhabited houses 15,826; area 1,490 acres, more than twice the area of the City of London; which is subdivided into 110 different parochial districts. 110 different parochial districts in the City of London occupy only an area of 600 acres, while the one parish of St. Marylebone contains an area of 1,490 acres; an extraordinary anomaly in our metropolitan system of municipal government. The rental as assessed to the poor rate is 866,454*l.*; as assessed by the police commissioners and county magistrates it is 987,548*l.* The expenditure for this parish in respect to lighting is 11,711*l.*; the police commissioners 24,688*l.* There is a difference in respect to the police as compared with the City, of 20,000*l.* per annum. Although the area to be watched in Marylebone is more than twice the area to be protected in the City, the expense is less by one half or nearly so.

2719. The parish of Marylebone pays its quota of the general expense of the metropolitan police, does not it?—The parish of St. Marylebone pays the expense of the police, and hands the sum over to the police commissioners for the metropolis; it is charged upon the poor rate, as is also the county rate, a fact of some importance to attend to; because, otherwise, we should be misled by the figures as to the burden of the poor rate.

2720. The amount which Marylebone pays of the expense of the metropolitan police has nothing to do with the parochial management; it depends upon the rental of the parish, and the amount which the commissioners decide the parish should bear of the general expense of the metropolitan police?—They have no share in the management of the county rate nor in the management of the police.

2721. All that the vestry of Marylebone do in respect to the police is, to pay the sum which they are called on by the commissioners of police to pay?—Exactly so. I refer to it now as part of the general question of consolidation. It was proposed, when the Government first established the metropolitan police, to place the whole of London under it; and the metropolitan police commissioners estimated that the City might be watched for the sum of about 25,000*l.* per annum. The corporation by their influence resisted that proposition, and succeeded in getting the management exclusively in their own hands, and the result is, confining myself to the financial question, that the City police cost 40,000*l.* per annum, and the Marylebone police, watching twice the extent of district, 24,000*l.* per annum.

2722. You say that the police commissioners calculated that they could take care of the City for about 25,000*l.* a year?—Yes.

2723. Where does that appear?—It appears in some of the parliamentary blue books, but which I have not with me.

The account referred to by the witness is as follows:—

2724. Does it appear to you that a comparison between the expenditure of the corporation of the City and the parish of Marylebone can be fairly instituted on account of the great difference between the expenses which are defrayed in each case?—I do not attempt to institute a close comparison between them.

2725. The corporation of the City maintains its own prisons, does it not?—Yes.

2726. Is not that a very large expense?—It is.

2727. There is no corresponding expense in the parish of Marylebone, except as it contributes to the county rate?—No; therefore, as I said, I do not attempt to run a close parallel between the gross expenditure of Marylebone and the City.

2728. Then, again, there are expenses connected with the separate administration of justice in the City, which do not fall upon the parish of Marylebone?—There are many expenses which fall upon the City which do not fall upon the parish of Marylebone. As I said before, it is impossible whether you compare Liverpool with London, or Leeds with London, or the parish of Marylebone with the City of London, to institute a close comparison, perfect in all respects; the comparison can only properly affect particular items of expenditure; but I submit this account as suggestive of the economy and advantage which result from a general consolidation of establishments in the place of a system of divided management.

2729. Are there not also the expenses of the conservancy of the river, which fall upon the corporation of London, to which the parish of Marylebone has nothing similar?—Undoubtedly.

I will now proceed, with the permission of the Commissioners, to a general view of the revenues of the City of London and its local burdens. But in producing this account it will be necessary to explain its object. I regard the present inquiry into corporation abuses as something more than a question of abolition or of modification. It is a question to a very great extent of re-construction. We want to know what kind of municipal government should supersede the existing worn-out, antiquated, and effete institution; and what powers should be entrusted to the new municipality of the City of London in its relations to the metropolis as a larger municipality. That is the view I have taken of the aim of this Commission; and if examined upon each of the items of the account which I hold in my hand, I shall be better able, in giving my reasons for it, to explain the principles which I think should be embodied in a new municipal constitution for the City of London than by any other means. It is "An account and in part an approximate

"estimate of the sums collected for public and charitable objects by different local bodies "within the City of London for the year 1852." All objects which, I think, should be embraced in the new municipal government to be provided for the City of London; not in all cases to the extent of exclusive management, but to the extent at least of a general supervision. In the first place, I have considered the items of indirect taxation levied through the officers of the corporation of London. That indirect taxation amounts to 333,702*l.* 8*s.* I begin with the coal duties. First, there is a 4*d.* duty on coal, which the corporation claim as their private property, 57,591*l.* 10*s.*; the 8*d.* duty on coal, 113,559*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*; the 1*d.* duty on coal, 14,297*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*,—amounting altogether to 185,448*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*

2730. What is the term for which the City have that 4*d.* duty?—The tenure, according to the statement of officers of the City corporation and Acts of Parliament which they quote, is for ever. The chamberlain says: "The 4*d.* duty was given to the corporation "for ever by the 5th and 6th of William and Mary." The market duties are 20,598*l.* The street tolls as farmed amount to 5,810*l.* I think we may add to that at least one-fourth for contractor's profit. We ought, perhaps, to add more than one-fourth; perhaps one-half. The corn dues levied by the City of London amount, according to my estimate, to 53,639*l.*, of which 10,600*l.* goes into the account of the City estate. The rest is an estimate from figures which have been already laid before this Commission, and which I have gone through years ago. Then there is the charge for fruit and potatoes, oyster metages, wine dues, and sundry other matters, which amount to 15,856*l.* If these figures were put down at 30,000*l.* I should not be surprised were the latter sums to prove nearer the mark. Then sundry corporation charges, such as weights and measures, brokers' rents, freedom fines, sheriffs' fines, and fees on ditto, amounting altogether to 5,899*l.* Fees to officers of the corporation, exclusive of metage charges. This is another estimate—30,000*l.* It was 70,000*l.* in 1835, but that included the meters. Freedom and livery fines to the trading companies necessary to the right of voting in common hall, strictly municipal taxes, since we cannot exercise municipal privileges without paying them, 5,000*l.*, a low estimate; very much less than used to be exacted in that form. The loss to the public by the exclusive privileges of town carmen, Thames watermen, and others, I put down at an estimate of 10,000*l.*, the whole amount of indirect taxation being 333,702*l.* 8*s.* Then we come to the next branch of the subject; that of local rates levied in the City over and above what is raised in the shape of indirect taxation, or by what may be called octroi dues. We have first, the sewers rate, amounting to 19,526*l.*; paving, lighting, and cleansing rates, 60,263*l.*; police rate, as I mentioned before, 44,298*l.*; but as the City pay out of that one-fourth from items included in other parts of the account, I have carried it out here as only 33,223*l.* Then there is the trophy tax for the militia and other purposes, some of them of a very antiquated character. I cannot tell exactly the annual charge, but I put it down at an estimate of 2,000*l.* The last rate levied in the name of trophy tax, which includes the expenses of the present militia, was twopence in the pound,—a tax which I paid myself a few weeks back, and which ought to produce 8,000*l.* Not to exaggerate the expense of this item, in the absence of any exact data, I put it down on a charge of 2,000*l.* per annum. Those are taxes collected by officers of the corporati at directly. The gross receipts of the poor's rate as divided and expended by the three City unions and the 110 parishes which take a separate share in the management of the poor's rate, amount to 88,475*l.*, being 35,000*l.* more than is expended for the relief of the poor in the parish of St. Marylebone. The ward rate, which is collected for twenty-six different wards of the City, and is in some measure a corporation tax, I estimate at 4,000*l.* Then there are church rates, tithes, and Easter offerings. It is impossible to get at anything like accurate figures for this item, for churchwardens and clergy have generally been more backward in making returns than even the members of the corporation; but I estimate this item at 70,000*l.* It forms an extremely heavy burthen upon some parishes of the City, whilst others are totally exempt from it. In the parish of St. Dunstan last year I paid no less than 1*s.* 10*d.* in the pound for church rates; that is to say, 11*l.* upon a rental of 120*l.*

2731. To whom are the tithes paid?—In some places they are paid to the parishes as rectors in their own right; in others they are paid direct to the clergy.

2732. Then they are not corporation receipts?—I am not giving corporation receipts alone, but an account of the whole municipal receipts of the City, over which a new municipal body, properly constituted, ought to exercise a general surveillance, with a view to the reduction of existing burthens. The total of the City local rates is 277,488*l.*

The next branch of our municipal administration relates to trust estates for public and charitable objects. We have first of all the real estate of the London corporation, including fines for the renewal of leases, which produced last year 99,112*l.* Then there is the Bridge House estate, which is also under the control of the corporation, 47,021*l.* Then there are the different charities, as reported on by the Charity Commissioners in 1836. The parochial charities amount to 38,703*l.* The charities administered by the different chartered companies, 85,685*l.* The five royal hospitals, 128,763*l.*; and sundry charity estates, 3,298*l.* These figures are taken from the report of the Charity Commissioners, dated 1837; and, as I think the increased value of this property since that time may be estimated at 10 per cent., I put down 25,000*l.* for such improved value upon the last four items. These trust estates for public and charitable objects,—objects usually confided, in well organized local administrations, to the municipality of the district,—amount to 427,585*l.*

Then there is another item relating to the port of London. The corporation levy river tolls, for which there appears in the last return of the City estate the sum of 8,377*l.* Their tonnage dues I estimate at 15,000*l.* There are other charges connected with the Trinity House and the Board of Admiralty, such as pilot licences, ballastage, light-house dues, and other charges connected with the river, amounting to about 45,000*l.*; total 68,377*l.*

The whole of the City revenues amount to 1,107,154*l.* With permission of the Commissioners, I will place these various items before them in a tabular form.

The paper was delivered in, and is as follows:—

* As reported by the Charity Commissioners in 1836.

Population of the City, 129,128; area, 600 acres; inhabited houses, 14,693; rental to the police rate, 1,020,000*l.*; number of parishes within the walls, 97; without the walls, 13; ex-parochial inns of court, 13; wards, 25; but including Bridge Without, 26.

2733. One of the items you mentioned was tithes. How can you speak of tithes which are paid to the clergyman of a parish within the City as City revenues?—I think in such an account as I have rendered we should include all charges relating to the church for the reason which I have stated, as necessary to a complete view of our local burdens, and because in the neighbouring district of St. Marylebone all such charges are made through the vestry. In other countries charges for church building and repairs commonly appear in the municipal accounts.

2734. Do you mean to say that it is a common practice in municipal boroughs that the parochial charities, should be a part of the municipal accounts, that the poor rate should form a part of the municipal accounts, or that Easter offerings should be a part of the municipal accounts?—I must take the first part of the question first. In reference to parochial charities, I do not know how far the term common practice may be justified; but it undoubtedly is a practice in some municipal administrations for parochial charities to be included in one common system of management, and I think a proper one.

2735. When a charity belongs to a parish and not to a borough, you think it is included in the borough account?—I shall be prepared by and by to show what is the custom and what is the principle we should now adopt in reference to such a case. We are discussing questions of municipal requirements very closely analogous to those of the municipality of Paris and other large metropolitan cities.

2736. In the case of Bristol, for instance, where there are large private charities, do you apprehend that they are administered by the corporation and not under the separate trusts to which they belong?—Permit me to observe that our municipal organization throughout the United Kingdom is full of anomalies; and to say what is done generally in the 185 cities and boroughs placed under the Municipal Reform Act, would be to commit oneself to a statement certain to be inaccurate. The rule in one municipality is not the rule in another. The defect of the Municipal Reform Act was, that it did not sufficiently define what the functions of the new corporation created under that measure were to be. The question, in fact, of the proper province of municipal administration had at the time been very little considered; and in consequence, since the passing of that Act, there has been no end to the local Acts obtained, and continuing to be obtained, by different municipal bodies, extending their power first to one branch of municipal administration not provided for, and then to another. In the present case I hope to see the bearings of the whole question considered, so that in framing a new constitution for the City of London, you will confer at once all the powers which such a governing body should possess without having hereafter to extend them; and among them, powers for controlling our present wasteful church expenditure. I should be far from proposing that this Commission should report in favour of a bill to take at once the management of the eighty City churches from the existing bodies and hand it over to a new corporation; but I should say that a new municipal board ought to be entrusted with power to take the proper steps for a consolidation of these numerous ecclesiastical divisions, by conferring with the bishop of the diocese and the clergy generally, and with their co-operation to come to Parliament with a bill for effecting the object; the first duty of such a new board being to assist their fellow-citizens in reducing the very heavy burthen now pressing upon them.

2737. In the case of the parish of Marylebone, to which you have referred, there was a special Act of Parliament, by which the rights of the Duke of Portland were purchased, and the vestry was enabled to deal in that manner with the churches within that parish?—I believe that was the case.

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

29th Nov. 1853.

2738. Your object in drawing up the statement you have put in was to collect all the local expenses of a public nature within the precincts of the City of London, whether they can properly be said to be the expenditure of the corporation or of other bodies?—Exactly so.

2739. With a view to illustrate some proposition of your own with respect to municipal government?—With a view to the general consideration of the whole question, and principally to that part of it which relates to the powers which should be given to a new municipal board.

2740. You made a statement as to a total of 600,000*l.* a year; how have you arrived at that statement?—First, by taking what is called the corporate estate, which, with the Bridge House estate, &c., amounts to 200,000*l.*; then the gross receipts of the coal duties, about 200,000*l.*; and then the rates collected, directly collected by the corporation, such as police rate, consolidated rate, and other rates which I have enumerated, with the 70,000*l.* returned by the revenue committee of the Court of Common Council in 1833, as received indirectly by the officers of the corporation.

2741. Do you know whether there is a separate item for fines and estreats and amerciaments in the City accounts?—They do not appear, to the best of my recollection, in any of the published accounts.

With respect to the first item in this account, of the coal duties, my attention has been called to some misapprehension on that subject on the part of previous witnesses. It has been stated that the 4*d.* duty was chargeable with the burthen of the City improvements. The 4*d.* duty is what the corporation call their property. The words "The property of "the corporation" occur in the last Parliamentary return of the City chamberlain in reference to this duty. The amount appears under the head of "Offices" in the account of the City estate as applicable to general purposes, but the corporation have made it chargeable with 20,000*l.* in aid of City improvements. That has been done not under an Act of Parliament, but by a bye-law of the corporation.

2742. Do you mean that they have borrowed money for City improvements and mortgaged their coal duties to that amount?— So I understand the minutes on this head of their proceedings.

2743. Do you know for what length of time they are mortgaged?—I do not.

It was stated, with reference to the 8*d.* duty, that it was simply handed over to the Woods and Forests in consideration of the cost of making New Oxford Street, New Victoria Street, and the expenses generally of some improvements at the west end. That is the general impression of the members of the corporation at this present moment, as made by their officers; but it is a very inaccurate one. Up to the present year, 1853, the 8*d.* duty was mortgaged for improvements executed within the City, and under the direction of officers of the corporation. That there may be no mistake upon that subject, I have brought the Commissioners the exact figures. Here is a statement of the loans secured upon the eightpence coal duty from 1831 to 1853. The first was the remaining part of the 96,000*l.* borrowed before, for the Debtors' Prison, 1,000*l.*; ditto of the 5,000*l.*, for the improvement of Moorfields, 1,500*l.*; the remaining part of the 80,000*l.*, for the site of the New Post Office, 61,000*l.*; London Bridge approaches, 1,000,000*l.*; removal of Fleet Market, 250,000*l.*; removing the site of the Royal Exchange, 150,000*l.*; ditto, 40,000*l.*; New Farringdon Street, 25,000*l.*—showing a total of 1,535,600*l.*, raised for improvements in the City of London exclusively, and administered by officers of the corporation of London, unless the case of the Post Office site was an exception, of which I am not certain. The whole of these loans are not, to the best of my belief, fully paid off at the present moment. They were not at least a short time ago. Up to the present time the corporation of London, or their officers, have been clearly financially responsible for the whole proceeds, or nearly the whole of the eightpence coal duty since 1831, namely 1,535,600*l.*

2744. You mean up to that time the proceeds of the 8*d.* duty would have been absorbed in City improvements?—Yes.

2745. Do you mean to say that the whole proceeds would have been absorbed if the capital of that debt had been at once paid off, or that the whole was absorbed by the annual payment of interest?—The interest and the repayment of loans have absorbed very nearly the whole of the revenue received within that time.

2746. Taking the revenue for the year 1852 from the 8*d.* coal duty, how much of it do you suppose was absorbed by payments for City improvements exclusively?—That is a question which I am not prepared to answer.

2747. That is the question, is not it?—I imagine it is not at all the question. I put down this item in my account of City revenues, because the corporation have hitherto administered the largest part of the proceeds of the 8*d.* duty, and because they are still receivers of the money. As such there ought to be a clear and accurate statement in the hands of every citizen of London, of how that money is collected, who are the parties who collect it, what charges are made for its collection, and what securities are taken that the whole of the 8*d.* duty shall first be raised, and then applied to the objects for which it has been destined by the Legislature. This is an important question, because we know that the coal duties are collected in different establishments. The corporation is obliged to employ officers connected with the railway companies. I desire to know, and as a coal consumer and a City ratepayer, I have a right to ask the question of the corporation of London,—what securities do you take against a possible understanding between some of the large coal owners and the inferior class of your officers, so that the all amount of duty which ought to be levied shall come into the public coffers?

2748. Do you know how much the 8*d.* duty on coal now annually produces?—113,000*l.* net.

2749. Do you know how much of that the City paid last year or in any recent year to the Commissioners of Woods and Works?—I do not.

2750. Is not that the whole question which you raise, namely, how much of that sum is paid over to the Government?—An increasing sum is paid over to the Government; but that is very far from being the whole question.

2751. Is that part of the proceeds of the 8*d.* duty which is spent upon City improvements so spent at the absolute direction of the City, or has the office of Woods and Works any control over that part of the money?—In some cases they have had the right of examining the plans.

2752. They have not the same control over the improvements within the City which they have over improvements in New Oxford Street and other places?—Undoubtedly not. I am quite ready to go into that question, and show that the corporation of London are not only responsible for having spent out of the 8*d.* duty within the last twenty years, 1,500,000*l.*, but also that they are answerable for having retarded to a very great extent, by the sectional and antagonistic spirit of their institutions, the progress of metropolitan improvements generally, especially at the west end of London.

2753. The portion of that 8*d.* duty which was given to the City, was strictly defined by the Act of Parliament?—No doubt the whole of the 8*d.* duty has been raised by Act of Parliament. As I said before, a sum of 1,500,000*l.* has been expended in the City out of the 8*d.* duty since 1831. The sum further secured for general metropolitan improvements on the prospective receipts of the eightpenny coal duty is 753,000*l.* The particulars I will read:—

A STATEMENT of further LOANS, secured upon the prospective receipts of the Eightpence Coal Duty.

For New Belton Street, Long Acre, New Oxford Street, and the new Street from the London Docks to Spitalfields	200,000
Ditto	100,000
For Coventry Street to Long Acre, East Smithfield to Rosemary Lane, and in aid of Improvements in Southwark and Westminster	189,000
For ditto, and General Improvements	116,000
New Street, in Southwark	30,000
Victoria Street, Westminster	30,000
New Farringdon Street to Coppice Row	88,000
Making a total of	£753,000

2754. Are not those charges principally for districts lying without the City?—Nearly the whole of them. The prospective 8*d.* duty is mortgaged for those improvements.

2755. In what respect was the statement which you undertook to correct, inconsistent with the fact?—That the whole of the 8*d.* duty is handed over to the Office of Woods and Works is an error.

2756. You think at the present time a portion of that duty is retained by the City?—Some portion of it is still liable for old mortgages.

2757. But you are not prepared to state what portion?—No, I am not. I should be inclined to think that for last year 1852 a large portion. But the statements as made to this Commission seemed rather to evade the more important fact, that up to the present time so large a portion of the 8*d.* duty as amounts to 1,500,000*l.*, has been administered by the corporation.

With reference to the 1*d.* coal duty, a statement was made that it was given to the City in consideration of the expenses of collection. That is not exact. All the coal duties are subject to separate charges to the officers of the corporation for collection, and to draw-backs upon exportation. The gross receipts of the 8*d.* duty are not applied to improvements. A portion of them is subject to charges of the corporation. So also in the case of the 1*d.* duty—a portion of it is stopped for expenses; a circumstance which ought to bring both these items into the accounts of the corporation of London, even if it were proved that the whole of the balances were handed over to other bodies.

2758. Those payments are not received net, but each of them is separately charged with the expenses of the collection?—Yes; the 1*d.* duty is the fund out of which the Coal Exchange has been built. That also has been exclusively administered by the corporation of London up to the year 1845.

2759. When was the 1*d.* duty granted, and for what period?—I am not aware. The 1*d.* duty since 1845 has been paid to the Office of Woods and Works for general improvements.

2760. Are not the expenses of the Coal Exchange paid out of the 1*d.* duty?—I thought they had been, but the return of the late chamberlain says that "The 1*d.* duty since "1845 is paid to the Office of Woods and Works for general improvements."

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

29th Nov. 1853.

The subject of these coal duties leads us to another very important question: how far the collection and administration of funds so much in the nature of national resources as these funds, should under any circumstances be entrusted to a strictly local body. My idea of municipal government is this, that every municipality should be at liberty to tax itself to any extent it thought proper, and enjoy the most absolute control over its own funds; that is to say, over the funds which the ratepayers belonging to the municipality are willing to contribute out of their own pockets; and that if they like to waste their own money they should be at liberty to do so. But it is a very different thing to allow a municipal local body to waste funds belonging to the public generally. The City of London, I think, might have the direction of City improvements to the extent of the funds which the City could raise within itself legitimately by direct taxation; but funds raised from the inhabitants of the whole metropolis ought clearly to be under the administration of a metropolitan board. The limitation of municipal expenditure to the resources of a municipality is the proper check, and it is generally an efficient one to local abuse. Of the mischief that may arise from entrusting public money to a local board there have been many striking examples connected with the administration of the coal duties. In this respect the history of the 8*d.* duty up to the present time would be a very instructive one. It is unquestionable that the funds raised by it for the approaches to London Bridge have not been economically applied; nor the funds raised for building the bridge itself. When it was determined to build a new bridge, the different architects of the metropolis were invited to compete for the design. The first-class premium for the best design was awarded to Mr. Charles Fowler, the architect of Hungerford Market, but that gentleman was not allowed to carry out his design. He was set aside through the local influence of the bridge contractors, which was exerted in favour of another architect. The appointment was determined by considerations quite apart from those of personal merit or a sense of equal justice. The erection of London Bridge was contracted for by Messrs. Joliffe and Banks at the sum of 426,000*l.* The Act for building it is the 4th of George IV., c. 50., and it received the royal assent on the 7th of July 1823. By a report to the Court of Common Council it appears that the corporation had spent up to the 3d of December 1831 upon the bridge and its approaches, 1,426,145*l.*, one million sterling more than the original contract.

2761. To what extent do you consider the corporation of the City to represent the entire metropolis?—The City of London over which their jurisdiction extends is, I believe, only about the one twenty-fourth part of the uncovered area of the metropolis, and about the one twelfth part of the covered area of London,—the area built over.

2762. Are there not certain purposes for which the corporation of the City appear to represent the metropolis; as, for instance, when they have the conservancy of the river, and when communications are made to them on public occasions and the Lord Mayor exercises hospitality, and so on; in those cases does not the City appear to be the municipal representative of the entire metropolis of London?—It appears to be so on such occasions, and of course the City, as we know, assumes more or less to represent the metropolis. That is, however, one of the prerogatives of the corporation to which it has no proper claim, and which should be taken away from the local government of the City and given to a metropolitan municipality.

With reference to the conservancy of the river and metropolitan improvements, I think it of great importance that the power of interfering with any measures that affect the interests of the whole metropolis should be taken from the corporation and otherwise lodged. It would have been well if this had been done as far back as the reign of Charle II., the date of some of their charters; and I think it desirable that I should put in, that it may be included in the report of your proceedings, and therefore be more accessible to the public than it has hitherto been, this plan (producing the same) of Sir Christopher Wren's for the improvement of the City after the great fire of London. It was owing to the obstructive spirit of the corporation of that day that the City of London, instead of becoming, as Sir Christopher Wren would have made it, the first city in the world in point of construction, is now a wilderness of entangled lanes and alleys, requiring the expenditure of million after million to render its thoroughfares practicable. This plan shows St. Paul's in the centre of a number of broad streets radiating from it to different points of a general circumference. It shows an embankment which was to have been left open for the use of the public, forty feet wide, along the north bank of the Thames from London Bridge. The obstructive spirit of the London corporation and that of the chartered companies prevented Sir Christopher Wren from carrying out his scheme. But one portion of it he secured, as he thought—the forty feet way or embankment along the north shore of the Thames. That, however, notwithstanding the security of the Act of Parliament to which Mr. Pulling has referred, the corporation of London have allowed to be gradually encroached upon and built over, so that I think there is now no river in the world, certainly no river connected with any metropolitan city abroad, with which I am acquainted, that presents so disgraceful an appearance as the banks of the Thames, looking at them up the river from London Bridge. And this process of encroachment,—notwithstanding all that has been said about the necessity of a Thames embankment, notwithstanding reports of the committees of the House of Commons in favour of an embankment on both sides of the river,—is still going on. We may see an instance of it in a building erected so recently as the year 1850 on the south bank of the Thames, which is allowed to project twelve feet into the river beyond the stairs of London Bridge, destroying the ornamental character of the bridge, and at the same time most seriously interferes with any plans which Government may hereafter seek to carry out for embanking the river on that side, so as to throw it open as a public thoroughfare.

2763. What is the building you refer to?—It is a large block, and let to different parties; partly as chambers, and partly as wharf warehouses. It stands in front of an hotel, and obstructs its view of the river. The banks of most public rivers on the continent are generally the most ornamental parts of a city. There is usually no more delightful promenade to be found, than the inhabitants of those of the capitals of Europe enjoy in their broad public quays. With reference to New Oxford Street and several of the improvements now at length going forward, I have had personal reason to know how seriously the obstructive spirit, or rather the sectional spirit of the corporation of London, from its antagonistic position to the public interest, has affected their progress. To those who have been in earnest about such improvements, the delay which has taken place in their execution has been extremely discouraging; and since the time when my attention was first drawn to Mr. Martin's plan for the embankment of the river, I have often been led to inquire into the nature of the obstacles by which the delay has been occasioned. I have found that they have arisen chiefly out of a contest about the proceeds of this very 8*d.* coal duty. The committee of the House of Commons which sat upon metropolitan improvements from 1838 to 1840, reported in favour of a number of improvements which it was thought could be effected by a surplus anticipated, of the 8*d.* duty, over and above the amount granted for the London Bridge approaches, &c. This fund, of course, was strictly and legitimately available for the object; but the corporation of London having for many years been accustomed to administer the whole proceeds of this 8*d.* duty, were extremely disinclined to relax their grasp of this impost. The Woods and Forests brought forward their plans for improvements at the west end, especially as connected with New Oxford Street; and the City of London brought forward a plan for improving the approaches to the Royal Exchange. The two parties therefore, were in mutual opposition. The corporation of London wanted to get the whole of the anticipated coal duties, which could be raised up to 1852, into their own hands, and the Woods and Forests very properly said, "It is now time that the metropolis at large should have its share; you gentlemen "have had the exclusive control of this fund long enough." This was a reasonable proposition, but the corporation were not willing to assent to it. I do not say that they passed any formal resolution to the effect that they were not willing to assent to it, but practically the fact was, that their surveyors, Mr. Richard Lambert Jones and Mr. Higgins, were continually before different committees of the House of Commons, giving evidence against the plans of the Woods and Forests, and attempting to show that many of their proposed improvements, or several of them, were really not required, and that others could be executed with certain modifications for a much smaller sum than was proposed by the Woods and Forests to be expended; the object, of course, being to secure a larger residue of the 8*d.* coal duty for the administration of the London corporation. If you turn to the report of 1838, question 137, you will find Mr. Richard Lambert Jones giving evidence against the necessity of pulling down Middle Row, Holborn, that being one of the metropolitan improvements proposed at that time to be effected by the Woods and Forests. Again, in question 1,201, you will find him giving evidence against Mr. Pennethorne's plan of a new street from Leicester Square to Long Acre; and proposing, instead, a curved or crooked line to Great Newport Street in its place; with a view to economy. In question 1,227 he is giving evidence against the line proposed by Mr. Pennethorne from Bow Street to Holborn.

The result of this, and of the influence brought to bear by the corporation upon members of the committee of the House of Commons was, that the suggestions of the officers of the corporation were to a very considerable extent adopted. They cut down the sum destined for the metropolitan improvements, proposed by the Woods and Forests, from 638,000*l.* to 390,000*l.*, and most seriously marred them, so that it is now a matter of infinite regret to every person who passes through some of the new neighbourhoods at the west end, to observe how far short the improvements realized fall of those originally contemplated. For example, it was originally proposed that there should be a new line of street from Waterloo Bridge to Upper Gower Street and the Regent's Park, of the same character as the magnificent improvement projected and carried out by George IV. and Mr. Nash in Regent Street; and that was the kind of thoroughfare the metropolis ought to have had in connexion with Waterloo Bridge. As now carried out, it is one of the most unsatisfactory improvements we have seen effected.

2764. Do you believe that the completion of that communication as originally designed was frustrated by the influence of the City?—I will not go so far back as to speak of any part taken by the City at the time of the original design. I will, with your permission, confine myself specifically to a portion of it with which I know the City did interfere, and the evidence of which is in the blue books. Mr. Pennethorne proposed that Bow Street should be continued into High Holborn by a perfectly straight line, through Mr. Houlditch's, the coachmaker. From economical considerations, suggested by the officers of the corporation, that line was given up, and it is now a crooked line made by turning round a sharp angle to the left, and widening Belton Street. The new street is both indirect and has a piebald appearance; there are new houses on the one side and old houses on the other; and the value of the frontage has been so much affected by it, that half the ground is not built upon in consequence to this day.

29th Nov. 1853.

2765. Do you remember what would have been the consequence if the 600,000*l.* had been spent upon those general improvements of the metropolis instead of not much more than half that sum; would the coal duties of 8*d.* have been continued for a longer period, or would it have had the effect of only leaving less money to be spent within the City?—I cannot now state exactly the precise sums of which the application was disputed. A number of Acts have been passed in reference to the coal duties since that time. The first question raised, was about the application of a surplus of 200,000*l.* Subsequently it was determined to extend the 8*d.* coal duty to 1862.

2766. Do you think upon the whole the money which has been laid out in the City improvements of late years has been ill applied?—I think it has been ill applied in this sense, that none of those improvements have been sufficiently considered in reference to the wants of the metropolis as a whole. For instance, I would refer to the widening and continuation of New Cannon Street. Looking at it simply as a local improvement, it may be considered a satisfactory one; but in reference to metropolitan objects, it is anything but the kind of arterial communication which ought to have been carried out. It has this great defect—it brings the whole of the traffic of the eastern part of the metropolis into St. Paul's Churchyard, and down the steep and narrow declivity of Ludgate Hill into Fleet Street; when what was wanted was a new main street avoiding St. Paul's and Ludgate Hill, and leading from London Bridge direct to Charing Cross. The committee of the House of Commons had, before this improvement was set on foot, recommended that there should be an embankment on the north bank of the Thames from Charing Cross to London Bridge. It would then have been the easiest thing in the world to have made this new artery of the City run, not into St. Paul's Churchyard, but on to a new embankment on the north side of the river at Blackfriars Bridge, and then carried the whole of the traffic destined for the west end at once to Charing Cross, by the shortest route.

2767. What would you have done with the Temple Gardens?—That is another question of the obstructiveness which I can enter into if the Commissioners wish. That, and other obstacles to constructive improvements have only hitherto been formidable from the metropolis having been left without any adequate municipal representation. We have the House of Commons, it is true, sitting in the metropolis, and to some extent it no doubt takes an interest in metropolitan affairs; but it is very far from being equal to the duties of a metropolitan municipality. In the House of Commons there are persons who come from Inverness in Scotland, and from Drogheda in Ireland; from the extreme north and the extreme south; who have no interest in metropolitan questions; and yet it is by them more or less that the metropolitan public is now governed. For instance, railway companies are largely interfering with metropolitan improvements. There has been one project carried this last year which will seriously affect the question of the arterial drainage of the northern metropolitan districts: the project for a great tunnel from the Great Western Railway to King's Cross, running down the New Road. The excavations will be twenty feet deep, and will intercept the existing lines of sewers. Yet the Act for this tunnel railway has passed without the inhabitants of the metropolis knowing anything about the matter, or that portion of the public most likely to be seriously affected by it having any voice on the subject. When projects of this kind are brought forward, what happens is this: the House of Commons is found to be profoundly indifferent. But the railway engineers, and railway surveyors, and legal projectors are not indifferent, and they institute an active canvass among the members for support. When the question comes for discussion in the House, they bring forward, through this active canvass, a number of members who have no connexion with the metropolis at all, coming from extreme parts of the United Kingdom, and they practically determine the result of a division. I think it very desirable that this state of things should be put an end to as speedily as possible, and that there should be, with regard to metropolitan improvements as with regard to other things, some previous reference to a metropolitan body, which should collect the sentiments of the metropolitan constituency generally upon them before they are submitted to Parliament.

2768. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Commissioners?—If the Commissioners will allow me, I will just advert to the question of the poor law administration as connected with municipal government. It is a great point with me, and I think with those reformers who have fairly considered the subject, that a municipal government for the City of London, without reference to the metropolis generally, would be very incomplete if there were not a change in the present administration of the poor rate. It was originally proposed, when the Poor Law Bill was introduced into the City, that the board of guardians should be formed of a committee of the Court of Common Council; that in fact the corporation, as the chief municipal body of the City of London, should take upon itself this portion of the duty of municipal government. The corporation declined to do so. When I mention that fact, I do not say that official communications were directed to the corporation, and that they officially declined; but it was the fact that the leading members of the corporation were consulted and the proposition was declined. The next proposition was that the City, for the administration of the poor rate, should be formed into one union. The intention to do so of the Poor Law

Commissioners at that time, Sir Frankland Lewis being then at the head of the board, was announced, but met with a violent opposition. This opposition was not a manifestation of public feeling, but was got up by individuals having in view the obtaining of personal appointments under the local unions they wished to create; and that was shown by the fact, that, no sooner had they effected their object, and got the City divided into three unions in the place of one, when one would have been sufficient, and infinitely the best arrangement for the public interest, than they were found in place. The fact was this—if there had been only one establishment for the relief of the poor in the City of London, all the intended candidates for office under the new bill, could not have secured appointments, but with three unions, the local influence of the leaders of that agitation was all-sufficient. I speak positively upon this part of the subject, because I was myself for several years a member of the board of guardians of one of the City unions. I am, therefore, perfectly familiar with the fact; and only that it would be invidious to do so, I could give the names of the parties who led the opposition against the Poor Law Commission, and ultimately profited by it. The result has been a very serious one to the citizens of London. A small tradesman coming into the City, and finding himself compelled to pay heavy poor's rates, is naturally perplexed to account for it when he hears how much property there is belonging to parishes and to different bodies, in the shape of charitable estates strictly available for the relief of the destitute, the care of the sick, and the education of poor and abandoned children. The reason the poor's rates are so heavy, the reason the inhabitants of the City are paying at the present time upwards of 25,000*l.* more than the citizens of Marylebone, and 20,000*l.* per annum more than any corresponding district in the United Kingdom, is principally this same defect of divided management which pervades the whole of our municipal institutions. I have calculated that this simple fact of our having three unions, when one union would suffice, or one board of guardians appointed by the corporation of London, has cost the citizens of London since the Poor Law Bill was introduced into the City, at least 300,000*l.*

2769. Do you believe, if the arrangement which you prefer had been made, the poor would have been as efficiently relieved, as they have been under the present system?—I think they would have been not only as efficiently relieved, but much more efficiently relieved.

2770. You consider that the whole of this extra expense has been a mere charge of establishment management, from which the poor have received no benefit whatever?—Quite so; on the contrary, the poor have greatly suffered by the existing system, to my knowledge. It operated in this way: the twenty-eight parishes united in the central union found themselves, by the new arrangement, left without any workhouse accommodation. All the existing workhouses of any magnitude were situated in the districts belonging to the two other unions; the consequence was that the City union, being disinclined to go to the expense of building a workhouse for the accommodation of their own paupers, adopted under the presidency of Mr. Alderman Gibbs what was called the "Shilling and loaf" system of relief, that is, the giving almost every applicant who applied for it, without any adequate test of his destitution, a shilling and a loaf to go about his business. This system naturally made the City a nursery of pauperism. Another consequence was, that adequate arrangements could not be made for the proper training and education of the children of destitute paupers, or children abandoned by their parents. It had been shown by educationists, that the proper course for training pauper children was to separate them altogether from workhouse contamination, and place them in district industrial schools; and if the three unions had consisted of but one, such a district school could have been at once formed for the children of City paupers; but the City being divided into three unions, the children had to be placed in three separate establishments, each unnecessarily costly, and comparatively inefficient. Ultimately, the difficulty has been got over, and the three unions have been consolidated into one, for this especial object. Poor children, therefore, belonging to the City of London generally, are now at the large industrial school at Norwood, under an arrangement by which the three unions unite, and contribute jointly to their support; but in other respects, the three unions still continue divided; subjecting the ratepayers to heavy establishment expenses, much larger than are to be found in any of the other unions throughout the United Kingdom, whose returns I have had an opportunity of comparing, and subjecting the ratepayers to very serious building expenses. I have calculated that the expense of providing adequate workhouse accommodation alone, under this divided arrangement of three unions, has been very nearly 100,000*l.* since the three unions were formed. And here is the account, which I believe is without parallel in the history of poor law administration, of the money which has been expended upon the City union workhouse, and the fittings up of that workhouse. This is a statement of the total cost of the union workhouse at Bow, belonging to the City union. I will not trouble the Commissioners with the whole of the items. The important result is, that 66,167*l.* has been spent in providing workhouse accommodation in that establishment. Another cause of our heavy burdens in the City is, the multitude of parishes into which the City is divided; we have 110 parishes, and in about 85 of them there is a separate staff of officers to be provided for, some portion of whose expenses is thrown upon the poor rate; so that these parochial infinitesimal divisions alone, subject the ratepayers of the City to between 7,000*l.* and 10,000*l.* of poor rate more than their fair share of this particular burden. This is an account of money expended in relief of the poor, for the years ending Lady-day 1848, and Lady-day 1852. Three City unions, exclusive of parochial expenditure, with a population of 129,000, expended in 1848, 93,781*l.*; in 1852, 78,739*l.* In St. Marylebone, with a population of 157,000, there was expended in relief of the poor in 1848, 53,524*l.*; in 1852, 47,731*l.* In the parish of Lambeth, with a population of 139,325, there was expended in 1848, 46,751*l.*, and in 1852, 33,923*l.*

2771. There are at present three unions in the City of London; the City of London Union, the West London Union, and the East London Union?—Yes.

2772. Do you believe, if there had been no corporation in existence when those unions were formed, there would have been a greater probability of those three unions being consolidated into one?—I am inclined to think there would, because the example of the corporation, and the effect generally of divided management in the City, has very seriously infected the whole district with the spirit of local jobbing. It affects also the question of expenditure in this way: the high salaries given to the Lord Mayor and the City officers generally, operate as a mischievous precedent. Every person in office, whether the duties he discharges relate to the poor or to any other municipal object, seeks to have his salary and emoluments fixed by the corporation standard. The extravagant expenditure to which I have alluded, upon the City of London workhouse, which is certainly without any parallel in the history of poor law administration, may perhaps be traced in part to a spirit of Mansion House emulation.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

W. Williams, Esq.
30th Nov. 1853.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS, Esq., M.P., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2773. You are a member of Parliament for the borough of Lambeth?—I am.

2774. You were at one time connected with the corporation of the City of London, were you not?—I was for a short time, when I was engaged in commercial affairs in the City.

2775. Did you ever reside in the City?—I did partly reside there in the winter time. I used to occupy my business premises, and go out of town in the summer.

2776. You were at one time a member of the common council, were not you?—My first connexion with the corporation was in 1830. The custom was for the common council to fix upon gentlemen to audit the City accounts.

2777. Do you mean that they chose auditors unconnected with the corporation?—The common hall of the livery elected the auditors. Gentlemen were selected by the corporation to fill that office.

2778. Do you mean independent persons, not necessarily connected with the corporation?—Quite independent persons. It was supposed to be a friendly affair; but there was nothing improper. In 1829, the auditors complained of not having sufficient information with regard to documents connected with the City accounts. In 1830 auditors were proposed, and I and another gentleman were proposed in opposition, and were elected. It was an office I did not wish for; but having been elected, I undertook the duties. The year before, the common hall passed a resolution, requiring the chamberlain to furnish the auditors with bills of particulars of the different items of all accounts. The year following when I served the office, the chamberlain did furnish bills of particulars to the extent to which he possessed them; but there were items amounting to many thousands of pounds, for which there were no bills of particulars whatever, but mere orders given to pay the amounts to the persons to whom they were due. We made an "able and important report," as they called it, compared to any report which had been given for fifty years, and gave a tolerable insight into the state of the City accounts, as far as they were laid before us; for instance, the receipts from the estates were given in round numbers, and we had no means of ascertaining whether they were correct. We took that from the chamberlain's own statement, which was no doubt perfectly correct. They gave 50*l.* a year to the auditors to be spent in dinners; but my colleague and myself declined to receive anything.

2779. Do you mean that if you had accepted that 50*l.*, you would have been obliged to spend the money in dinners?—It was a matter of custom. I am not aware that any auditor puts the money into his pocket; but he gives entertainments to his friends. We were told that they were not very particular, provided the tavern bills were sent in, as to a larger amount being spent than the 50*l.*; but I presume within reason. We received a very gratifying vote of thanks for the manner we had performed our duties, and for "the able and important report," as they called it, which we made. I presume the corporation found it inconvenient to submit bills of particulars to the scrutiny of the auditors.

For instance, we stated numerous items which we thought were very extravagant, and very likely the succeeding auditors did the same; and in the year 1834, the chamberlain received orders not to produce bills of particulars to the auditors. The auditors thereupon refused to audit the accounts, and they reported it to the common hall.

2780. By whom were those orders given?—They were in operation in 1834. It was the auditors appointed in 1834 to audit the accounts of 1833, who were refused bills of particulars.

2781. From whom did the orders to refuse those bills emanate; did they come from the common council or from the Court of Aldermen?—I am not aware; but I will read a document which will enable you to form a pretty clear opinion upon the subject. Upon the auditors presenting their report to the common hall, in which they stated that they refused to examine the accounts because bills of particulars were not furnished, the common council appointed some of their own body to audit them. Then the common hall agreed to this resolution: "Resolved—That this common hall has heard with surprise and "indignation that the present chamberlain has, contrary to the custom and practice of "the former chamberlain, and in defiance of a resolution passed unanimously by the "citizens in common hall assembled on the 24th of June 1829, refused to furnish the "auditors with bills of particulars and other monies paid by him out of funds belonging "to the citizens at large. This common hall, therefore, instructs the chamberlain to pay "in future no sums of money whatsoever, without being furnished with bills of parti-"culars, which he is instructed to lay before the auditors for inspection and examination; "and the auditors are hereby requested to pass no accounts without such bills of parti-"culars." This resolution was referred to the committee of the City lands, which is a very important committee of the common council, to consider; and I have here their report upon it. It said: "Although it appears that the bills of artificers and others were "formerly produced to the auditors on the examination of the chamberlain's and bridge-"master's accounts, the practice arose from their having been attached to such orders or "warrants for general convenience, and not in any respect from their being necessary to "such examination, and from the fullest consideration of the subject, the select committee "were of opinion, as suggested in the said report, that the auditors have no power or "authority to require the production of any bills of particulars, or to reject or disallow "any payment made under such competent authority. Were it otherwise, the corpora-"tion would become subject to the views of the auditors or the body of the livery, who "form as liverymen no part of the corporation, nor possess any right to, or interest in, "the property of the corporation." That is the pith of the report. There are some other matters which are not at all material, as regards the audit, with which I need not trouble you.

2783. Do the auditors go into the merits of any of the payments, or do they merely see that the accounts are arithmetically correct?—The fact is, they have nothing to do unless they have bills of particulars before them, except to take the warrants or orders to pay money, tick them off, and cast them up, and sign their names at the bottom. It was customary with the chief clerk of the chamberlain to draw out a report for them in accordance with what he considered to be a complete proof of the correctness of the account.

2784. The orders to pay are taken as the vouchers for the items?—Vouchers are given which are mere orders; they are a direction to the chamberlain to pay so much money by the Court of Common Council or the Court of Aldermen, or whoever has incurred the expense.

2785. Do you consider it part of the duty of the auditors to judge of the propriety of the expenditure?—I conceive they are of no use unless they do so, and report their opinion upon it to the common hall.

2786. You think they ought to go beyond the mere attempt to guard against mis-appropriation?—The auditors are no check to misappropriation in point of fact. As I said before, the accounts of the receipts from the estates are given in gross; no particulars are furnished. The chamberlains are always men of high character and men of unquestionable integrity. I merely state the fact, without imputing in the remotest degree that anything could be wrong.

2787. Will you have the goodness to proceed with your statement?—When the corporation Commissioners came into the City about the year 1833, some of the leading reformers of the City, among whom I was one, formed themselves into a committee to give such information as they were able on the subject of the corporation affairs to the Commissioners, and also to afford them any assistance in their power. I gave evidence, and Mr. Dillon, and I think some others; but although I had some little insight into their accounts from having been auditor, the Commissioners made very light indeed of our evidence; they were entirely led away by the evidence of the City officers, who knew everything and could put the best face upon everything. I must do the corporation the justice to say that the principal officers are clever men, and they have maintained the present state of things in my opinion a good deal from that circumstance. Whenever any inquiry takes place, those officers show great ability and adroitness; and I could relate circumstances in proof of it in describing their affairs. A vacancy in the common council occurred in the ward in which I lived about the middle of the year. I was strongly urged, very much against my inclination, to go into the common council by the committee I have alluded to of the leading City reformers, and also some of the influential inhabitants of the ward, for the purpose of getting at the City accounts. I should state that they refused to us any access whatever to their accounts; they would give us no information about them. There was a standing order of the common council which forbade the officers giving any account to any person about the affairs of the corporation, except to its own members. The committee pressed me to go into the corporation, if it was only for the remaining six months of the year. I consented to do so, and was elected without opposition. When I went into the common council and got access to their accounts, I was furnished with the blue books, which I dare say have been furnished to the Commissioners. Those I saw gave no account of the real amount of money exacted by the corporation in various ways from the public. I must say that the common council themselves had no idea of the extent of the emoluments received by their officers under the name of fees and various other sources. Seeing this, I moved for a committee of inquiry, and this (producing the same) is the report of the committee: "It was "appointed on the 7th of October 1834, to inquire into the duties, salaries, fees, profits, "and emoluments of the several officers of the corporation, and also the City revenue, "the various sources from which it arises, and how and in what manner it is "expended, specifying each item in detail, both at the present time and in the year 1797, "with power to call for books, papers, &c."

2788. What was the number of the committee?—It was a ward committee, with a member for each ward, the number being twenty-five.

2790. Do you remember whether upon this occasion the list adopted by the common council was pretty much the list which you yourself named?—Yes; there was no unfairness at all in the selection of the committee, and I must say that the majority of them, though not corporation reformers, acted most honourably, most uprightly and conscientiously in the discharge of the duty which had been imposed upon them. We found that there was such an immense number of officers, a number beyond what we had the most remote idea of, that to examine the whole of them would have occupied an enormous space of time. We therefore agreed to write a letter to each of the officers receiving money from the corporation in any way, in the terms of the motion for a committee which I have just read. The general committee appointed a sub-committee of seven, who co-operated with me in getting these accounts, and afterwards in arranging them. After getting them all in we presented a report to the common council, and asked leave to have the report referred back to the committee in order to enable us to give the information we had received in detail and in form, to which the court agreed. Then we had the assistance of the chamberlain's chief clerk, Mr. Scott, who, I must say, was a most able accountant and a very clever man. He was also assisted by the town clerk's chief clerk. With the assistance of those two gentlemen, under the direction of the committee, this report was formed. The whole of it was written by that able accountant, Mr. Scott,—of course the committee assisting him in suggesting the forms and a variety of matters which are contained in the account. After we had got all the materials together, some of the returns of the officers required explanation. We had them before us, and satisfied ourselves with respect to them. In this report there are schedules, which the Commissioners will see. One of them gives a list of all the City officers, by whom they were appointed, the amount received from the corporation in cash, and also from fees and other emoluments. Then follows an account of the corporation revenue, and in the next page is the corporation expenditure. The first thing we considered was the cost of the mayoralty, upon which we made a special report. That was a question of some difficulty; we took an immense deal of pains with regard to it. As I said before, some of those gentlemen were not by any means corporation reformers, but they acted the part of honourable men. The Commissioners will find every item accounted for in the return from the officers of the corporation, describing it most distinctly, and we arrived at a conclusion on the subject. The report is signed by fifteen members of the committee. I may say, that being a ward committee, there were twenty-five members, but some of the members did not attend at all regularly; they came occasionally; but those who signed the report were the working part of the committee. We reported the amount which the mayoralty cost, and, as I said before, here are the items stated and accounted for in the most distinct manner, under the handwriting of the City officers. We reported that the mayoralty cost in that year 25,034*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, and it was not at all an extraordinary year.

2791. Did Mr. Scott concur in that statement, with regard to the expenses of the mayoralty?—This is drawn out by him. We did not ask his concurrence to anything; but we had the benefit of his opinion and advice, which were very valuable. This was considered by the common council. There are two things which the common council defend, as they would a citadel: they are, the 4*d.* duty upon coals, and the expenses of the mayoralty. The Mansion House is their great feasting place, and they stand by it. There was an increase in the salary of the Lord Mayor, in 1800, of 1,500*l.* a year; and, in 1811, another increase of 1,500*l.* a year, on the ground of the great depreciation of bank notes. There is an impression on my mind that a committee of the common council recommended a reduction of one of those amounts of 1,500*l.*, on the ground that the cause for giving it had ceased; but the common council did not adopt it. We sent a request to the aldermen who had passed the chair, for a return of the money they received; but not one of them answered our request, except Sir Peter Laurie: he gave us an account of his receipts to the amount of 7,900*l.* and odd. They have sometimes what are called God-sends in the mayoralty; for instance, the number of Jew brokers was limited, and if a Jew broker died or retired, there was a great contest among the Jews to get the office. I understood that the standing price was 1,500*l.*; the Lord Mayor having the appointment, of course that amount came to him in addition to his other allowances. The common council struck off some of the items of the mayoralty agreed to by the committee, and reduced the amount received by the Lord Mayor. It is not worth while to go into details; but if any one disputes the accuracy of the report, I request you will allow me to meet him. I will satisfy you that this report is true.

2792. When you say they struck off some items, do you mean that they reduced the items in the future expenditure, or disputed the accuracy of the items in your report?—They said that the committee had put down amounts which were not justifiable.

2793. In what way did the common council express that opinion?—By a regular motion in court to take into consideration the report of this committee.

2794. Can you point out any item which they disputed?—I will mention two or three, which are the only important ones. We asked for a return of the cost of building the Mansion House. There was a market, called Stocks Market, on the spot where the Mansion House is now situated. That market was abolished to make room for the Mansion House. In the first instance it was 70,000*l.*, and 6,000*l.* almost immediately afterwards. This return was furnished to us from the chamberlain's office. Then we had before us Mr. Montague, the City surveyor, who received a salary of about 2,000*l.* a year, nearly half of which went to his clerks; and we asked him to state to us in writing what he considered to be the value of the money laid out on the building, and also to estimate the value of the ground on which the Mansion House was erected, and at what rate of interest it ought to be considered. He gave us this statement, showing it in the report. The Court of Common Council resolved that they ought only to take the value of the Mansion House at that time. We discussed that question very much in committee, but we considered that, supposing the money laid out in building the Mansion House had been laid out at interest and compound interest, it would have amounted to many millions of money, and upon due consideration we thought we were only doing what was fair in taking the amount at the per centage which the City surveyor said the building ought to be taken at, which I think was seven per cent.; and the value of the ground, which was four per cent. We had no means of ascertaining how much was lost by Stocks Market. This came to rather more than 7,000*l.* a year. The common council said the Mansion House is only worth so much. As I said before, we argued that if that money had been laid out at interest, it would have amounted to many millions sterling. Then there were certain officers of the Lord Mayor's household whom they also struck out. Some of those places were purchased, and the common council were clever enough to make a calculation of this kind: they said, those men paid at certain periods so much money for those offices, which, with interest and compound interest to this time, would amount to so much, therefore they said they had a right to strike that off.

2795. Were the sums invested in the purchase of those offices put out to interest or spent as revenue?—No doubt spent as revenue. These, I think, are the principal items which they struck off. Several officers of the Lord Mayor's household had other duties to perform. We called upon them to state how much of their emoluments belonged to the time they bestowed upon their duties connected with the mayoralty, which they did, and that is stated in this report most distinctly. I will now proceed to the statement given in this book. As gentlemen of the corporation, at the time I was connected with them, were very adroit in throwing discredit upon any statements which might be made derogatory to the good management of the corporation affairs, I have, in all the figures which I am going to state, placed everything clearly on paper, which I will present to you, and if any gentleman connected with the corporation disputes any item of it, I only hope you will do me the favour of giving me an opportunity of meeting him. I shall deal with the year 1833, but I have here also the same items for last year, which I have taken from the City accounts; but I can only say, that as far as I understand the accounts (I am not sure that I understand them, but as far as I do so), I will state them separately from 1833. The rent of premises, markets, tolls, rates, duties, fines, &c., in the year 1833 amounted to 141,031*l.* Last year the same items amounted to 213,257*l.* The fees and other emoluments received by various officers of the corporation, which do not appear in the corporation accounts, amounted to 74,440*l.* In the report to which I have referred are the details of that sum. The Irish Society I consider to be an integral part of the corporation. The City wish to separate it from the corporation, but it is in fact a part and parcel of it, it being all administered by a committee of the Court of Common Council. The amount in that year was 7,654*l.* The amount received by the corporation from the various sources I have named is 223,125*l.* Of this sum 155,000*l.* was levied on the public by taxes on corn, coal, salt, potatoes, fruit, &c., and by tolls, dues, fines, &c. These items, taking the fees and emoluments of the officers, which do not appear in their accounts, the same last year as 1833, as well as the amount received by the Irish Society, they will amount for 1852 to 295,351*l.* In addition to which, the rate for paving, lighting, cleansing, &c., amounted in 1833 to 54,937*l.*; the sewers rate, 9,718*l.*; and the watch rate amounted to 33,681*l.*; making together 321,461*l.* I consider this to be the amount of the real estate, and of the taxes levied under various denominations by the corporation. They amounted last year to 406,885*l.*; but taking 321,461*l.*, the amount in 1833, it will give 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* for each of the population of the City, which was 122,300, besides the enormous cost to the public by freemen only being allowed to be employed in various occupations, of which the fellowship porters is an example. A gentleman, who is in an extensive way of business in the City—the corporation do not exercise all the power they have in the protection of freemen, the whole system would have blown up long since if they had attempted it—this gentlemen told me, that in one department of his business, he was not allowed to employ anybody but freemen, and that they would not allow him to take any apprentices so as to supplant them in the course of time; that he paid those men 6*l.* and 7*l.* a week, because they were freemen, for doing work which, if he had gone half a mile from his place of business out of the City, he could have got done quite as well for 25*s.* or 26*s.* a week. He said he was so annoyed with them, that having another extensive business, he gave up this branch, which was a very large concern. In fact, if the corporation were to exercise the full power they claim, it would not be possible for any work or labour to be done in the City unless by freemen; but the corporation do not exercise that power in a great number of cases. As I said, taking the amount of their revenue in 1833, it is 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* a head. The population of the City by the census of 1831 was 122,300, and upon that population this amount which I have named will be 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per head, independently of those other restrictions which I have alluded to. The Government expenditure in the year 1833 was 1*l.* 17*s.* 0*d.* per head for the population of the United Kingdom, including the vast debt, our great colonial empire, the army and navy, the great public offices, and, in point of fact, all the expenditure of the Government in the year 1833.

2796. Do you mean that that is the weight of taxation?—It is the proportion of expenditure to the population in that year. This shows nearly 50 per cent. more for the municipal government of this one-twentieth part of the metropolis, as compared with the general government of the United Kingdom. In addition to that, there is the duty of 1*d.* per ton on coals, for the abolition of the sale of coals by measure, 8,498*l.* This I could have added to the other amount, for it properly belonged to it in that year; but, subsequently, the application of it has been partly changed, and a part of the 1*d.* duty is paid to the Woods and Forests. The tolls payable on boats, barges, &c. on the river Thames westward of London Bridge, amounted to 15,813*l.* The tonnage duty on shipping coming to the port of London amounted to 7,000*l.*, and the fees received by the Court of Requests amounted to 1,657*l.*; that gives the amount of 354,429*l.*

2797. You mentioned the tonnage duty on vessels coming into the river; what duty is that?—That is for the regulation of the port of London. You have heard a great deal about the navigation committee. The navigation committee have the management of the port of London. The corporation claims jurisdiction over the Thames, from Staines to a place called Yantlet Creek. The first item is westward of London Bridge, and this is for the management of the Thames eastward of London Bridge.

2798. Is it the case that every vessel coming into the port of London pays a certain tonnage duty to the corporation?—No doubt it is so; it must be so, of necessity.

2799. Do you happen to know what the rate of tonnage duty is?—I do not. Then there are what are called trust and charitable funds, of which the corporation have the management; one of them is the Bridge House estate, which in that year was 29,581*l.*; and there are sixteen other trust and charitable funds, which amounted together to 14,196*l.*, the trust funds being altogether 43,777*l.* There is also another fund, of which they have the management: that is, the duty of 8*d.* per ton upon coals, which that year amounted to 69,010*l.*; which last year amounted to 117,606*l.* That duty is appropriated, with three other items which come out of the funds of the corporation, towards the making of the approaches to London Bridge; those three items are, the duty of 4*s.* 9½*d.* per tun upon wine, amounting to 3,584*l.*; the duty on freedoms and binding apprentices, 531*l.*; and out of the City revenue, 11,500*l.*: making together 15,615*l.* The four items amounted to 84,625*l.* in 1833, and it shows the astounding increase of those coal duties, when we find that those same items last year came to 136,237*l.* They are applied to pay the principal and interest of 1,000,000*l.* sterling, borrowed of the Bank of England at 4 per cent., for making the approaches to London Bridge, and 250,000*l.* for erecting Farringdon Market. I have heard a strange history connected with it. It is too much of a hearsay character to detail it before you, or it would cause some amusement. The first estimate was 150,000*l.*; they expended that in clearing the site; the Act for erecting the market and raising the money was passed three or four years previously to the Act which they got passed to place the 250,000*l.* upon the 8*d.* coal duty, with the 1,000,000*l.* for making the approaches to London Bridge. That market, for which the people of this metropolis and many miles around have been taxed 8*d.* per ton upon coal, produced this result. I have not all the years, I happen only to have three corporation account books by me. In the year 1835 (the last time I had a book as a member of the common council), there was a loss upon this market, that is to say, the rates and the cost of maintaining it amounted to 334*l.* above the receipts. The loss in 1841 was 7*l.* 8*s.*, and the loss in the year 1851 was 79*l.* This was the result of an outlay of 250,000*l.* managed by the corporation, which is paid for, as I said, by the inhabitants of the whole of the metropolis, and a district many miles around.

2800. Was the market established as a matter of profit, or a matter of convenience?—It was no doubt a public advantage to have Farringdon Street clear, as it is now, by the removal of Fleet Market from it; but another market instead of it was not required. The reason I have heard assigned for the failure of Farringdon Market was, that the principal customers of Fleet Market were inhabitants of those very houses which were cleared away for the site of it. Fleet Market produced, the last year I saw the account, the amount of 1,300*l.*; but I cannot state whether that was the profit or the whole revenue of the year.

2801. What was sold at Fleet Market?—All sorts of things; butchers' meat, vegetables, fruit, and so on.

2802. You stated that there was an item of 77,440*l.* for fees, which did not appear in the annual finance accounts of the corporation?—They appear nowhere in their accounts, that I have been able to discover.

2803. It is quite certain, is it, that no part of that 74,000*l.* appears in what may be called the corporation blue book?—To the best of my knowledge and belief, and I have looked into it with some care, not one penny of that money appears there.

2804. How was that gross sum ascertained?—You will see in this report of the committee, in schedule A. of the account, that there are 246 officers and departments of offices, making altogether 485 officers for managing the affairs of this corporation; for instance, there are several serjeants at mace in only one item, but a great many names are included; and the sum received by each of them is put down. Then there are 152 corn meters in one line, and the amount they receive. Here is a schedule which gives an account of these 246 officers and departments of offices. In this account the cost of the mayoralty is not put down. They said the Lord Mayor is not an officer of the corporation, but a part of the corporation, which perhaps cannot be disputed. His name is on the top of the list, but the sum is not filled in. The city solicitor died a short time before, and there was no return made of the emoluments of his office. I have put the solicitor at 3,000*l.* a year, and that and the cost of the mayoralty must be added to the schedule, in order to arrive at the true figures, which I have described. The arrangement of the schedule is thus exemplified: take the recorder: the "Honourable Charles Ewan "Law, appointed by the Court of Aldermen," received from the City cash 2,500*l.*, and from other sources 661*l.* 10*s.*—making together 3,161*l.* 10*s.*

2805. Does that column, "Received from other sources," appear in the annual City account?—Not a shilling of it.

2806. How was that sum ascertained in the case of the recorder?—In the case of the recorder and all the other officers, we received a letter from them, stating in detail the amount of their emoluments, which letters are all appended to this report.

2807. In answer to a circular which you sent?—Yes.

2808. That column is filled up from statements made by the officers themselves?—Yes; by Mr. Scott, from their letters, which are all attached to this report.

2809. Then the gross sum of 74,000*l.* is made up from statements which rest upon the authority of the officers who themselves received the fees?—Precisely so. The next officer is the chamberlain. In the first column is his name, "Sir James Shaw, Bart.;" in the second, "Appointed by the livery;" in the third column, "Received 1,240*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* from the City cash;" in the fourth column, "4,226*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* from other sources;" (his great sources of income were the immense balances in his hands, which he let out upon interest;) in the fifth column, the "Aggregate amount, 5,457*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*" Then in the furthest column there is "Subject to expense of office of 962*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*" This is the form of the schedule in which the money and emoluments of all the officers is placed. The next is the town clerk, Henry Woodthorpe, Esq., appointed by the common council, received 2,216*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* from the City, cash, and 1,376*l.* from other sources, making together 3,556*l.*; those items go on page after page with that description which I have given. [The witness then explained that Mr. Scott made a deduction from this schedule of the amount of the emoluments of officers which are included in various heads of departments, in order to give a distinct amount of the cost of each department in the schedule of expenditure; therefore the amount of the officers' emoluments is put down in that schedule after those deductions are made.]

2810. Do you mean expenses of establishments?—Yes; for instance, the magistracy of London and Southwark receive from the City cash 4,534*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*; from other sources, 922*l.*; making together 5,456*l.*; then follows in the same form administration of justice, conservancy of the Thames, navigation expenses, markets, law expenses, metage of corn, coal market, charitable and other bequests, and so on. The officers in all those departments are included in the amount of the cost of each; and they are also included in this schedule, in order to give in one view the emoluments of all the officers; therefore the amount of the emoluments of the officers in those several departments are deducted from the gross amount in this schedule, and the amount of the officers' emoluments is filled in in the schedule of expenditure after those deductions are made; you will, therefore, have to take this 93,000*l.* and add it to the schedule in the next page, which amounts to 8,311*l.*, adding also 3,000*l.* for the solicitor and 25,000*l.* for the mayoralty.

2811. Has any similar report to this ever been furnished?—Never before nor since.

2812. Did the last Commissioners ever call for any such account?—No; they were pretty well content with the ancient records. I come now to the cost of the management of the affairs of the corporation—salaries and other emoluments of 485 officers, including the Lord Mayor and the solicitor, whose amounts are not filled in in schedule A of the report; they amount together in 1833 to 123,814*l.* Every one is accounted for in the report before me. Then there are salaries of ward officers in 1851; the arrangement was different in 1833; therefore I take them for the last year. Those ward officers are engaged in attending upon the aldermen and common council in the wards. They amounted to 3,487*l.*; allowances to committees of common council, 6,584*l.*; city barge and shallop, and other expenses of the conservancy of the Thames and the navigation committee, 2,000*l.* This shallop is the boat used by the navigation committee, principally in making their excursions and feasting. The City barge is the one in which the corporation make their excursions up the Thames. Most of the committees of the common council had an allowance of 150*l.* a year for what are called summer excursions. Those summer excursions are made in this barge, which is sometimes called "Noah's Ark," and the entertainments are most magnificent and hospitable. The committee treat their friends with this 150*l.* Then pensions granted by the Court of Common Council and the Court of Aldermen amount to 2,793*l.* Those items, which amount to 138,678*l.*, I consider to be an enormous expenditure for the administration of the City affairs for a population of 122,300 persons. There is an addition; pensions to deputy coal meters, 18,063*l.*

2813. Are those offices which have been abolished?—Yes, they are abolished; therefore I put them in a different line.

2814. Are the payments in the nature of compensations?—Yes; they are dying off; and I put them down rather as a memorandum. There are ten City tradesmen, and I am informed that the corporation, or probably the Irish Society, have the patronage of eighteen Irish livings. I am not able to vouch for that, but I have heard it often stated. The bills of the three lawyers, the City solicitor, 73,120*l.*, the comptroller, 69,256*l.*, and the remembrancer, 20,244*l.*, amounted together in ten years, from 1826 to 1835 inclusive, to 162,620*l.*, averaging 16,262*l.* per annum. Mr. Scott, the chamberlain's chief clerk, pressed us to take an average of ten years, because there was a difference in some of the years, and we did so. There were twenty-eight other lawyers who in 1833 received among them 22,843*l.*

2815. Who are those lawyers?—I will read you the names, if you please: the recorder, the town clerk, the common serjeant, the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, and assistant judge of the Old Bailey, four common pleaders, two secondaries, one coroner, one clerk of the peace and arraigns, two under sheriffs, three attorneys for Southwark, one comptroller of the Bridge House, five attorneys of the Lord Mayor's Court, two clerks in the justice room in Guildhall, two at the Mansion House, and one in Southwark, making, with the other three together, 39,105*l.* I have another document. I have taken out the salaries, including the mayoralty, of twelve of the City officers, and I compare them with the salaries of the twelve Cabinet Ministers. Here is a list of them in detail. Those twelve officers, in that year, received 55,197*l.*, but they make official deductions to the amount of 6,762*l.*, leaving a balance of 48,435*l.* The twelve Cabinet Ministers received 45,480*l.*, which shows a receipt by the twelve officers of the corporation of 2,955*l.* more than was received by the twelve Cabinet Ministers. In that year, however, the Great Seal was placed in a commission, and there was no Lord Chancellor in the Cabinet. I will now compare the expenditure of the City of London with that of the most populous corporations in England. I have a return here which was presented to the House of Commons in the year 1845, giving an account of the expenditure of the different corporations of England and Wales. I have taken out all those corporations whose population exceeds that of the City of London, and two whose population is less, being the two largest, I believe, whose population is less than that of the City. I have taken those two which are less, because they had some notoriety for being corrupt before they were reformed by the Corporation Act; they are the corporations of Norwich and Hull. This return is a statement of their affairs presented to Parliament for the year 1844. In Birmingham, with a population of 232,841, the salaries, pensions, and allowances to municipal officers amounted to 1,134*l.* (you will find the figures at page 7 of the return, which I will hand to you); law expenses, 691*l.*

2816. I see, besides that, there are the coroner and other officers, who are not municipal officers at Birmingham, but who still hold situations analogous to the situations which are held under the City of London. The coroner has 1,400*l.* Again, the administration of justice is an item which in Birmingham appears to be separated from the municipal officers, but which in London is paid for by the corporation?—That is so.

2817. It is difficult, therefore, to institute a very accurate comparison between Birmingham and the City of London?—Yes, no doubt; but if these amounts are added, they will not make an important difference in the comparison. The next case is Bristol, at page 9. Bristol was an old corporation; and I know in some of the old corporations a great many of the old officers were dismissed when the Municipal Corporation Act came into operation; but they were entitled to pensions, which were given to them very liberally. In Bristol the population is 137,328. The salaries in that year were 7,614*l.*, and the law expenses 313*l.* The next is Hull, at page 22. The population is 84,690. The salaries, &c. are 1,709*l.*, and the law expenses 106*l.* At Leeds, at page 24, the population is 172,270; the salaries, pensions, and so on, 1,079*l.*; law expenses, 148*l.* In Liverpool, page 26 of the return, the population is 375,935; salaries, pensions, &c., 11,864*l.*; law expenses, 13,138*l.*; and the disbursements of that year amounted to 395,779*l.* The next is Manchester, page 28. The population is 303,382; salaries, pensions, &c., 4,463*l.*; law expenses, 3,783*l.* The next is Norwich, page 32. The population is 68,195; salaries, pensions, &c., 3,429*l.*, law expenses, 1,043*l.* At Sheffield, page 38, the population is 135,310; salaries, pensions, &c., 225*l.* (this is one of the new corporations); law expenses, 723*l.* Those are all the corporate towns whose population is more than that of London, the aggregate of whose population is 1,509,908; of the salaries, pensions and allowances to their municipal officers, 31,517*l.*; and of their law expenses, 29,944*l.* I beg now to call the attention of the Commissioners to the duties on coals; they are astounding. The 8*d.* duty last year amounted to 117,606*l.*; the 1*d.* duty to 14,467*l.*; and the 4*d.* duty I have down at 60,000*l.*, but it is a trifle more than that; making altogether a tax of 192,000*l.* upon coals alone, levied upon the inhabitants of this metropolis and twenty miles round. Up to this time the 8*d.* duty has been expended for public improvements within the City, except the balance of the 8*d.* duty which I have alluded to, which has been turned over to the Woods and Forests, which I presume is to go in liquidation of the fund for making improvements out of the City.

2818. This 8*d.* duty will expire in 1862, will not it?—It will.

2819. Do you think it would be desirable to anticipate the period when that duty will expire, and substitute for it some general improvement rate for the metropolis?—With regard to the 8*d.* duty, of course it is pledged for those public works, and it must be continued to that time, or you must find some other means. It does appear to me to be a great hardship to tax the poorer classes of people upon coal, which is so indispensable a necessary of life, to such a large amount for improvements in the City; for up to this time the whole amount of the 8*d.* duty which has been expended, has been for improvements within the City. I have seen evidence given before you which would throw some doubt upon that statement,—that is to say, a direction is given to it which may lead to a contrary opinion; but if you refer to the Acts of 1829 and 1830, I think you will find the fact is distinctly as I state; the amounts for the other parts of the metropolis are regulated by distinct Acts of Parliament.

2820. Do you think the arrangement for the distribution of the proceeds of this tax, made under the last Act of Parliament, was on the whole, an inequitable one as relates to the different portions of the metropolis?—I think it is most unjust that this twentieth of the metropolis should have the power of taxing the whole of the metropolis, for the purpose of making improvements within the City to the amount of a million and a quarter.

2821. That observation rather relates to what has gone by than to the future, does it not?—It does.

2822. Do you think, starting from the present period, the arrangement made for the distribution of the proceeds of this tax of 8*d.* per ton upon coals, at the end of the year 1862, is upon the whole inequitable, supposing the tax to be continued at all?—It is inequitable in my view, on this ground, that the whole of the metropolis and twenty miles round, in a direct line from the Post Office, is to be taxed for the benefit of one small section of the population.

2823. Is the Commission to understand that in your opinion the arrangement for the distribution of the future proceeds of this tax among the different portions of the metropolis at large is inequitable?—Certainly not. For instance, here is a return presented to Parliament in the last session. Here is a sum of 200,000*l.* for improvements at Waterloo Bridge, Holborn, and so on; that is by an Act subsequently passed to those Acts, the 2d and 3d of Victoria, chapter 80. Then there is 100,000*l.* given, again, for improvements under the 3d and 4th of Victoria; 189,000*l.* for improvements in Southwark by the 4th and 5th of Victoria, and for the new street in Westminster. Then there is another grant by the 11th and 12th of Victoria. There is then, for continuing the new street from the City boundary up to Clerkenwell, 88,000*l.* The whole of the improvements out of the City under those Acts I have mentioned, amount to 753,000*l.* The 8*d.* coal duty has not yet paid off the whole of the 1,000,000*l.* for the approaches to London Bridge, and the 250,000*l.* for Farringdon Market, which is all laid out in the City I see there is an accumulation of interest upon those items for making improvements out of the City to the amount of 296,000*l.*, therefore the duty has not yet reached the amount necessary to pay off the 1,250,000*l.* In the case of the 4*d.* duty, it amounts to 60,000*l.* and upwards, and goes into the corporation funds, and is a part and parcel of the corporation revenues as much as the rental of their real estate. This 4*d.* duty is a very curious affair. In the reign of Charles II. the Court of Aldermen exercised a power, which is no doubt vested in them as much now as it was at that time, of being trustees to the property of the children of all citizens who died intestate. The City officers say that they were plundered of that, but I have always understood the fact to be this, that the Court of Aldermen lent the money, which amounted to 747,000*l.*, to Charles II. It certainly never was paid back. Then, in the reign of William and Mary they got power to raise money to pay those poor orphans the amount of which they had been plundered; and the Act of the 5th and 6th of William and Mary gave them 4*d.* per ton upon coals in perpetuity, and 6*d.* per ton for fifty years, for the purpose of paying off those claims. That 6*d.* per ton was extended for thirty-five years more by the 21st of George II. It was again extended by the 7th of George III. for forty-six years; but they found in the year 1766 that the produce of those duties was more than was required to discharge the debentures, or whatever they were called, of the money borrowed to pay off the 747,000*l.* They sought power to apply certain portions of the money in completing the building of Blackfriars Bridge, and in making the approaches to it on the City side, and also in purchasing the tolls on Blackfriars Bridge, which came to a very large amount, building the gaol of Newgate, repairing the Royal Exchange, and other purposes. However, the whole of it was wound up in 1834. In the case of the parish of Lambeth, which contains a population of 140,000, they are the largest consumers of coal of any portion of the metropolis, on account of the great number of factories in that parish consuming coal. They have no share whatever in those duties; other parts of the metropolis have had a share, but they have not had any. I do say that it is a cruel shame to impose 4*d.* duty upon them or any other portion of the metropolis, in order that it may go into the coffers of this corporation, whose funds amounted last year to 406,000*l.* in taxes and revenue.

2824. What would you propose to do, if the coal duty is to be modified or repealed, to provide for those expenses which are now charged upon the security of the coal duty?—I know the 8*d.* duty will be a difficult question to deal with, on account of the outlay already expended in anticipation of it. But the 4*d.* duty is applied as positively a part of the corporation funds. They have an officer, a very clever man, called the remembrancer, whose duty it is to get Acts of Parliament passed. They have frequently passed private Acts, and nobody but themselves has known anything about their provisions. They get inserted in those Acts such powers as will serve their own interests, and by those means they have laid hold of the public for their own benefit.

2825. Would it be worth while, in your opinion, to abolish the 4*d.* duty while the remaining 9*d.* was maintained?—The 4*d.* duty is quite distinct; it goes into the funds of the corporation as much as the rents of their estates. They may try to shuffle before you, as they have done before committees of the House of Commons, for the purpose of showing that this duty is laid out in improvements; if, however, you refer to their accounts, you will find it described as integrally a part of their revenue, and whatever is paid for public improvements is described to be out of the revenues of the City, and not out of this tax.

2826. If the coal duty is maintained to so large an extent as 9*d.*, would any effectual relief be given to the public by remitting the 4*d.*?—It amounts now to 60,000*l.*, and is increasing.

2827. The remission of the actual payment upon a ton of coal would be 4*d.* Do you think that would be a sensible relief to the consumer?—The inference is, that the price of coal would be reduced to that extent and even more; but, whether it be so or not, I say it is unjust to tax the whole of the metropolis for the benefit of the corporation of the City.

2828. Has the 4*d.* rate been specially mortgaged by the City for any purpose?—I have never heard that it is. There is 11,500*l.* mortgaged to make the approaches to London Bridge; they will very likely tell you that it is out of the coal duty, but it is from the revenues of the corporation as described in their own account.

2829. Do you know whether they have specially pledged the proceeds of the coal duty for that sum of money, or is the money raised upon the general security?—It is out of the City estates—it is described in all their accounts as a part of the City estate. Here is the description by Mr. Scott, the clerk of the chamberlain, who knew more about the corporation affairs than probably any other man. You will find this in schedule B. in "The statement of the revenue of the corporation for the year ending 31st December "1833, distinguishing such part as is derived from duties, tolls, and other charges of that "nature, and the expenditure of the same, exclusive of the expenses of the mayoralty, "arranged under several heads of establishments; and also distinguishing the sums which "are paid out of the cash of the corporation from those paid by the public or derived "from other sources." Among them is, rent of property situated in the "City of London, "Middlesex, and Surrey, 46,000*l.*; receipts in the several markets, 12,000*l.*; Billingsgate "Market, &c., 2,315*l.*; package and scavage dues, amounting altogether to about 10,000*l.*" Then 4*d.* per ton on coals brought into the port of London, pursuant to the Act of the 1st and 2d of William IV., in lieu of metage and other duties on coals formerly payable to the corporation, 33,900*l.* Then here is a note stating that the coal meters, who are now abolished, are chargeable upon this duty; but they are not more chargeable upon this than they are upon any other part of the corporation revenue. In reference to the package and scavage dues, those were abolished in consequence of the reciprocity treaties commenced by Mr. Huskisson. The corporation got the Government to give them 160,000*l.* out of the public money for surrendering those duties; and I am told by a very competent person that the right of levying them was very questionable. That gentleman told me that he refused to pay them. They threatened him with legal proceedings; he set them at defiance; but they never instituted any against him. I do say that for this corporation to obtain for those dues (perhaps a very small amount originally, but now amounting to a great deal by the increase of trade,) 160,000*l.* of public money, on the ground of their claiming to possess them, was most unjust.

2830. Have you ever turned your attention to the question of the expediency of giving municipal privileges to any other parts of the metropolis?—Yes. I should first say that the common council have been great reformers when they have been threatened with any reform being effected from another quarter. In the year 1834, after the Commission came into the City, a committee was appointed, of which I was one, and we agreed to most extensive reforms, but the court would not entertain the subject. Then there was a committee of the whole court appointed in the year 1836, to effect a reform in the corporation, and to consult with the Government as to a bill which was promised to be brought in, as it was understood, by Lord John Russell. They had an interview with Lord John Russell for the purpose of considering what reforms should be effected. I think they had an intimation that Lord John Russell did not mean to bring in a bill, and nothing further was done towards reforming themselves till a short time ago. There has been great dissatisfaction in the City with the corporation. There have been reform associations and various movements in the City from that day to this, for the reform of the corporation and defending the citizens against its oppressive exactions. My opinion is, that provided it be desired by the metropolitan boroughs to have municipal institutions, and I think it would be desired by them, I would constitute the metropolitan boroughs into corporations; and I would form a central body, appointed out of those sections, for certain purposes, giving to them great powers. For instance, it should have the power of carrying out all works which are necessary for general purposes which could not be carried on in sections. The sewers, for example, require such a combination and arrangement for the whole metropolis; public improvements would require the same, and so would the police. I would make the Lord Mayor, if you continued such an officer under such a name, to which I see no objection, the head of this central body; and I should have no objection to give him a liberal allowance for maintaining hospitality, so that the present hospitality towards foreigners and ministers of state, and other distinguished persons, should not be done away with, though I think, under an altered state of things, you would find men who would do those things at their own expense. Sir John Potter, the mayor of Manchester last year, was as munificent in his hospitality as any Lord Mayor of London, but the expense was all out of his own pocket, as I believe he had no salary allowed.

2831. Do you think it would be right that a man holding the situation of Lord Mayor of London should be obliged, out of his own private income, to keep up the hospitality which attaches to the office?—If I were to be placed in that office, I would much rather keep up the hospitality of the City by spending 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* in the year, which would do it in a very magnificent way, out of my own pocket, than by levying duties upon coal and corn, potatoes, salt, and other necessaries consumed by the poor. The Lord Mayors of ancient times do not seem to have had anything like the present amount which is attached to the office to maintain their great state and hospitality, for, as I stated before, 1,500*l.* was added in 1800, and 1,500*l.* more in 1811, to the allowance to the Lord Mayor.

2832. Do not the City now assume to represent the whole metropolis for certain purposes?—For no purpose except the purpose of taxing them.

2833. They are the conservators of the Thames, and also many of the City markets are metropolitan markets, are not they?—Yes; but they charge tolls for all those things, and make a large profit out of them.

2834. Do you think, now, the City does represent virtually the general interest of the metropolis?—In no respect whatever, as it occurs to me.

2835. Do you think the feeling of the common council and of persons of authority in the City is ordinarily in accordance with the general interests of the metropolis or antagonistic to them?—As far as I can understand their feeling, it is to preserve things as they are, which are not in accordance with the general interests of the metropolis. There are some good reformers and some highly honourable men in the Court of Common Council; but I look upon it that a large majority of them are not reformers, or they would have reformed themselves before now.

2836. Is it the general wish of the governing body in the City to maintain privileges which are disadvantageous to the metropolis at large?—I consider that pretty nearly the whole extent of their privileges are disadvantageous to the metropolis at large, especially those duties which they levy upon the most necessary articles of life.

2837. Have you turned your attention at all to the measures which you think it would be desirable to take, in reference to the municipal government of London proper, under the existing circumstances?—In my opinion, you cannot reform the present corporation of the City of London by any extension of the franchise to all the householders of the City, or by shortening the duration of the period for which the aldermen are elected. They have so much power, under their charters and customs, that it would be impossible, in my opinion, under the present system, even though greatly modified, to have a corporation which would give to the City a good, economical, municipal government. You have, however, a remedy ready made to your hand in the Municipal Corporation Act.

W. Williams, Esq.

30th Nov. 1853.

There is no reason why London should not come under that Act more than any other place in the kingdom.

2838. Do you think, if that Act were applied to the corporation of London, the government of the City would be satisfactory?—I have no doubt it would be as good a municipal government as that of any town in England.

2839. Do you think some special provisions might not be necessary in reference to the great amount of trust property vested in the corporation?—There is a large amount of trust property in many of the old corporate towns. Take the town of Bristol. The charters of Bristol were perhaps not so important as those of London, but they had charters granted to them from early times, which gave important privileges. It was considered to be a corporation conducted under the old system, most objectionably; but under the new system you see what the cost is; and a great deal of the cost which I have named arises from the payment, I have no doubt, of officers employed under the old corporation. I had the honour to represent the city of Coventry for many years; they have in that city a great many charities; I believe more in number than now belong to the City of London, though not so large in amount. The old corporation used to have the management of them. Under the Municipal Corporation Act, the Lord Chancellor is empowered to appoint trustees of those charities; dividing the trustees into classes. There was a universal complaint of the administration of those charities by the old corporation. They were said to be applied to political purposes and others, which were condemned. But since the trustees have been appointed by the Lord Chancellor, I have heard no complaint from any quarter. I have heard no complaint that the trustees administer the charitable funds improperly, or in any way to be found fault with; and so I believe it would be with the City of London, if trustees appointed by the Lord Chancellor were to manage its charity funds. As to the conservancy of the Thames, I would take it from the corporation, and place it in the hands of the Government; who ought to undertake the conservancy of such an important river, which supplies east and west a population of two millions and a quarter.

Mr. G. Edwards.

Mr. GEORGE EDWARDS (a Partner in the house of Messrs. RICHARDS and Co., No. 45, Bread Street,) having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2840. In what way are you connected with the City of London?—The house in which I am a partner is engaged in the manufacture of linens in Scotland, and we sell our goods in London on the premises which we occupy in the City.

2841. Are you the resident partner in London?—I am one of them.

2842. Will you have the goodness to state to this Commission any points which occur to you in reference to your particular trade?—We have never had any difficulty in carrying it on, except that on one occasion it was required that the persons we employed should be freemen instead of our own servants.

2843. In what capacity are the persons to whom you allude engaged?—We receive goods made up in a certain state from Scotland; we require to transpose them, and put them in a new shape occasionally.

2844. Will you have the goodness to state in what way your being required to employ a certain class of persons affects that branch of your employment?—We do not know in what shape foreign merchants may wish their goods to be put up, therefore we bring them up to London in a particular shape, and we have to put a part of them into another shape; that we do by our own people; we used to send them out, but we find it more convenient to do it at home. Some of the freemen of London thought they had a monopoly of the right to do this work because it was a calenderer's business. One of our partners was summoned to appear before the aldermen; the matter was gone into, but they declined to interfere with respect to it, so that we remain as we were.

2845. Then in point of fact you are not interfered with?—We are not interfered with.

2846. You were brought before the aldermen, but the aldermen decided in your favour?—Yes. All we do is this: we receive a quantity of goods in a certain shape, and it is convenient in selling them to put them into another, and instead of sending them to calenderers out of doors, we find it more convenient to do the work at home.

2847. Then in point of fact, the officers of the corporation have not interfered with your trade in that particular?—They have not.

2848. Have you any complaint to make on any other point in reference to your trade?—No, not at all.

W. D. Cooper, Esq.

WILLIAM DURRANT COOPER, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows.

2849. In what capacity do you appear before this Commission?—At the request of the vestry of St. Pancras, from a committee appointed by them for thep urpose of waiting upon the Commissioners and giving evidence generally as to their connexion, or rather want of proper connexion, with the City of London, and also the evils which they think they have to complain of in reference to the corporation as it now exists.

W. D. Cooper, Esq.

2850. Will you have the goodness to state the points which occur to you upon those subjects?—The first point which we complain of is, that they are taxed considerably for the improvement of the City proper, by the tax upon coals; no portion of that being expended within our parish at all, and we are grievous sufferers by it, inasmuch as in consequence of the improvements which have taken place in St. Giles's and elsewhere, the poor people have been driven out of the small tenements they held in those parishes into St. Pancras. The number of removals from St. Giles's during the last seven years into our parish, of persons who have since become chargeable as paupers to us, has been on the average between five and six hundred every year.

2851. You mean voluntary removals?—Yes. In consequence of the changes in the position of property, and the poor having their houses taken away from them for the purpose of making the new streets, they have been obliged to remove and have become chargeable upon us to the number of between five and six hundred every year during the last seven years; they thus amount to one-sixth of our out-door poor. 6,027 is the number of our out-door poor, and the relieving officer informs us that nearly 600 of them are chargeable in consequence of removals from St. Giles's and other improved parts. We also complain in reference to this matter, that the duties chargeable upon the coals are larger in proportion to the improvements effected than would be the case if we had an improvement rate. The burden falls upon those who have their coals in small quantities to a considerable extent, and also helps to increase pauperism in that way, whereas an improvement rate would fall upon property, and the same amount might be raised in a less objectionable mode to the parish. We have also to complain of the cartage dues, which you are aware of; and also they have to complain of a point which I will mention afterwards in reference to the City courts. The parochial authorities of St. Pancras suggest, and I am requested to state to you that they conceive they are a body who ought themselves to have a share in the representation of the entire metropolis, and that the parish is large enough for that purpose, whether jointly with Marylebone or separately from that parish. You will have a resolution on that subject presently from the vestry. If it is more convenient to you I will state how we are peculiarly situated, and why it is absolutely necessary that some measure of corporation reform extended to the whole of the metropolis should reach us. We have a population of 167,198 according to the last census within the parish of St. Pancras; increased now by the number of births alone over deaths as much as 3,200 a year; we have, therefore, a population of above 170,000 now,—the acreage in the parish is 2,500 acres, of which 1,728 are now built on. The rateable value of the whole of the parish as rated to the poor rate is 707,857*l.* The rateable value is larger I believe than that of the City of London, and the area is very much larger. The number of houses rated is 19,909, which is the largest number of any metropolitan parish except Lambeth. Having said so much as to the size of the parish, I will now state the difficulties under which we labour. It is not without some trouble that we have endeavoured to extricate ourselves from the difficulty in which we are placed. A portion only of the parish is provided for as regards paving and lighting, leaving one-fifth of the parish, as you will see by the map before you, wholly unprovided for. The parts which are provided for have seventeen paving boards under thirty different local Acts, varying in size from the smallest quantity to a very large space, as in Kentish Town. Out of those seventeen bodies, nine, namely,—Battle Bridge, Brewers, Calthorpe and Swinton, Doughty, Harrison, Holmes, Pancras Union, Somers Town, and the south-western districts; these are self-elected bodies, there being no control by the ratepayers over them in any way. The other eight are representative bodies, elected in some form or other by the householders generally down to a portion of the householders according to qualification. This is best shown by the abstract of a parliamentary return moved for by Lord Dudley Stuart, and produced in 1850,—it is No. 585 of 1850. The return, which I will leave with the Commissioners, will show that there are 46¼ miles of street paved by sixteen paving boards, and the whole expenses of the seventeen in 1849 was 37,288*l.* raised in the year for paving and lighting, still leaving, as I stated, one-fifth of the parish unprovided for, except as I will mention.

2852. The general law makes no provision for the lighting or paving of the parish?—None at all.

2853. There is no Act of Parliament applicable to the whole of the parish of St. Pancras with respect to lighting and paving, and there is no municipal corporation in the parish which has powers applicable to those objects?—None for the parish, in its entirety. We applied to Parliament for the purpose, at an expense of 3,800*l.*, in 1851. The Bill passed the House of Commons, and was rejected in the committee of the House of Lords. Notwithstanding this rejection by the House of Lords, and notwithstanding the case which was made by us, the Board of Health, well knowing the facts, through their representative, Dr. Milroy, now charges in one of their reports upon the vestry of St. Pancras, the neglect of the whole of the district (which is the celebrated Agar Town district, where cholera and other diseases are breaking out) upon the elected body of the vestry, who have no control over it whatever. In respect to the money spent by the vestry in endeavouring to get such a control, the North Western Railway Company filed a Bill against Mr. Churchwarden Billett, myself, and twelve other vestrymen, praying for an injunction to restrain the vestry from applying their funds to any purpose of that kind, or applying to Parliament again upon the subject. Although they objected to our using our funds for that purpose, they could use theirs for the purpose of preventing us. That railway company are large ratepayers in the parish, and they have recently avowed that they were the authors of the scheme for filing the Bill in Chancery against us. We, therefore, suppose that the only remedy for all these defects is, that we should have a municipal corporation. Out of 19,000 ratepayers it would be impossible to obtain the necessary majority in order to apply to the Government for a charter of incorporation under the present law, besides which, the expense and trouble of doing so would be very great, and even then the existing boards would not be compelled under the General Act to transfer their powers to the general municipal body.

W. D. Cooper, Esq.

2854. Is it your belief that the existing power under the Municipal Corporation Act given to the great London boroughs of applying for a charter of incorporation is practically inoperative?—We fully considered that point when we applied for the local Act. It was absolutely necessary for us to have a separate Act in order to do anything effectual. But in order to make the matter still worse, under the Metropolitan Roads Act, under which the New Road was formed, the turnpikes were taken off, and the maintenance of 4,439 yards of road and public highway is now flung upon the vestry, to be provided for out of the poor's rate, though the houses on each side of the road are rated to the respective trusts, who do not spend sixpence upon the main road. The New Road is rated as regards the greater part of it to the Southampton trust, but still it is maintained out of the general rates of the parish. There are 7,000 or 8,000 yards of road not included in any paving trust whatever. I speak of roads actually made, which we have no power at present to pave.

2855. Does not the state of things you describe very much discourage the erection of a good class of buildings in your parish?—We have not had any good buildings erected in our parish, except on the large estates, till recently, in consequence of the state in which we are. Agar Town, which is unprovided for, is a miserable lot of hovels, I suppose some of the lowest in London; but on the Marquis of Camden's estate and the estate of the Duke of Bedford and others, where their own local Acts give them control, they have a good class of houses.

2856. In consequence either of the want of municipal institutions or a good parochial Act, do not you believe that the value of building land is depreciated?—Certainly, where there is no good local Act it is so. In many cases districts under estate Acts are as bad as others. It is only on the large estates that any good is done under them. The returns in other instances show that much too large an amount of money is spent without efficient control; in one the rate amounts only to 9*d.* in the pound, whilst in another it amounts to 2*s.* 6*d.* We have, as the Commissioners are aware, in consequence of having the New Road and the public thoroughfares thrown upon us, the entire weight of the whole of the coals brought by the Great Northern and the North Western Railway Companies, carried over our roads, causing us great additional expense. While the City is taking the toll, we get nothing for it, though we have to incur all the expenses of the increased traffic, and the traffic has so much increased that we have been obliged to pave the New Road at an expense of 9,000*l.*, that sum applying, however, only to a portion of it. We have spent 9,000*l.* already, and we shall probably have 9,000*l.* more to pay to complete the paving of the roads. We therefore think that we are unjustly used by the corporation of the City of London in levying upon us what does amount to a very heavy tax in the course of a year, and which would be far better levied in another way—I refer to the coal tax. The amount spent, as near as I can state, in the parish in one year, is about 110,000*l.*, including the cost of paving and lighting; of this only 71,797*l.* is the amount levied in the shape of rates in the year, and spent by the vestry, and included the police and the county rate. The whole rates levied by the vestry are 2*s.* in the pound on the rental. The improvement rates all added together would come on the average to about 1*s.* a pound additional. Therefore there is expended in the parish about 3*s.* in the pound only on every account, notwithstanding the defects which I have mentioned. Out of this we have to pay, which we should not have to pay without control if we were a corporation, no less than 8,287*l.* for the county rate, an immense proportion, a sum which would be fully equivalent to meet the expense of any corporate body. We also have to pay 16,390*l.* for the police rate, these two items taken together making 24,677*l.*, or a little more than one-third of the whole, which the vestry has to spend; and this third is without their control, and without their having any means of checking the expenditure or thoroughly knowing how it is spent. For that police rate of 16,390*l.* we have only four police stations, and from the returns we can obtain, we have under 300 policemen employed in the parish. The return to us is under 200, but I do not wish to speak to the particular detail of that. Certainly it is under 300.

2857. Do you object to the system by which the metropolitan police is under one general management?—No; but we object to the system under which it is paid for at present. We have been to Lord Palmerston upon this subject. His Lordship went into some detail with us, and told us that he would assist us if he could by a remedy; but what we should prefer would be, that the whole of the metropolitan boroughs should be formed into different municipal bodies, and then one general body should be elected out of them to control the main features of expenditure, dividing the amount rateably between the whole of the boroughs. The police rate is levied not exceeding 6*d.* in the pound on the assessment of the entire of the parishes within a certain distance. We have to pay 6*d.* in the pound on our full rental; Marylebone does the same; but when you come to a rural parish or others not rated up to the full value, a large discount in the rating is of course taken off. The 6*d.* in the pound is fully levied upon us, and only a portion, amounting perhaps to two-thirds, upon them.

2858. That is owing to the defect of the present law of assessment, is not it?—Yes. We say, if there was a general municipal body, the whole amount required might be certified to that body, and might be rateably distributed throughout the whole of the metropolitan boroughs. We have also, which we need not have if there were a municipal corporation, to pay to parties not appointed by us, 4,359*l.* for lunatics, that amount being increased in consequence of the deficiency of the accommodation afforded by the county lunatic asylums. They have not accommodation for our lunatics; we are paying 8*s.* 2*d.* per head for the county lunatic asylums, while to the private ones we have to pay 11*s.* 9*d.* a head, largely increasing what we think is an extravagant charge in itself. If we had a corporation of our own, we think a large portion of that would be saved.

2859. From what body does your deputation emanate?—From the vestry.

2860. Were the vestry unanimous in preferring municipal institutions to the present parochial government?—They were. They are to-day discussing whether or not they think the parish sufficiently large to form a separate municipality, or whether they would be willing to join with Marylebone and Paddington for the whole borough. The committee have made a report to the vestry; the committee are unanimous upon the point of wishing for municipal institutions; but the question of detail we leave for the vestry to decide. I should give as another reason why we think we ought to have a corporation, or at least some amendment of the present state of things, and why we should have some special provisions to meet our own particular case, that we are very largely increasing every year, and that the proportion of 10*l.* householders in St. Pancras bears a very large proportion to the whole electoral body in the borough. Out of 19,665 registered electors for the whole borough, which is far too large a number for any practical purpose, we have 9,980 10*l.* shareholders in our own parish, a larger number than there was in the entire borough of Marylebone when the borough was incorporated in 1832; there were then only 8,901 electors for all three parishes. The relative proportions now are, 6,409 for Marylebone, and 3,196 for Paddington. We are, therefore, in St. Pancras, equal in the number of 10*l.* houses to Marylebone and Paddington together. There is also another point which we wish to impress upon the Commissioners: that whereas they have a sewers commission in the City, responsible to themselves and appointed by themselves, the sewers commission for the rest of the metropolis, not appointed by or responsible to the ratepayers, which can, and in this year does intend to raise a rate of sixpence in the pound, which will produce a very large sum in our parish, a halfpenny rate producing no less than 1,500*l.* a year. I may say, that on the new parts of Lord Camden's estate and others, the sewerage is provided for by the people who take the land before they can erect any buildings whatever upon it, and the expense is charged to the men who build the houses. Those houses will therefore have to pay twice over, and in respect to the rest of the parish, the sewers commission have not spent anything like the 3,000*l.* a year in the parish since the commission has been appointed; that is, I believe, an exaggerated estimate of their expenditure with us, so that there is an injustice done to the best houses, which are taxed to a certain extent twice over; and we think, if we had a deputation from the minor metropolitan bodies to one general municipal body, for the regulation of those matters which affect the whole metropolis, it would be an improvement upon the present state of things. The other point to which I wish to refer is, the supply of water, which in many towns is under the corporate body. We have three water companies supplying our parish. The New River Company supplies the largest portion. The Kentish Town and Camden Town districts are supplied by the Hampstead Company; and a portion of the Regent's Park by the West Middlesex Company. In the Hampstead, the water is very bad, and is stated to be unfit for private use, and the West Middlesex rates are very high. The details of our expenditure for the last year, showing that we spend a very small amount indeed in salaries, and that the chief part is expended for the benefit of the parish, with little or no unnecessary outlay, I have with me.

2861. How are your accounts audited?—By five auditors, annually elected by the ratepayers themselves.

2862. Have those auditors ample powers of going into the accounts?—They have; they can reject any items. They have not I see in this account objected to anything; but their practice is to make a note of anything objectionable at the end, even supposing they pass it.

2863. Are they generally professional accountants?—They are usually men well conversant with accounts, in a large way of business; not so much professional accountants as men who are well conversant with accounts, and who keep large accounts of their own in the parish; they are not paid, and therefore a professional accountant could not be obtained.

2864. Are they persons in an independent position, who might venture to object to what they think is objectionable?—They not only may venture to object, but they do object; and we had great difficulty in getting the sum for the proposed Act of Parliament allowed in the account even by the auditors, and they appended to it a note that they would not allow any similar account in future. They not only audit the whole details,

W. D. Cooper, Esq.

30th Nov. 1853.

and audit the whole of the receipts in detail, but they also require us to state and to state to the public our assets and liabilities at the end of every half year.

2865. Looking at the state of the law, and the facts which you have described, as to paving and lighting, and other points in the parish of St. Pancras, do the vestry feel that they are at present possessed of sufficient powers for the proper management of the affairs of the parish?—Decidedly not; otherwise they would not have tried at such an expense as they have incurred to get additional powers.

2866. Do they also feel there is very considerable difficulty in obtaining proper local legislation by their own unassisted efforts?—We say we are prevented doing so. The House of Lords having thrown out our Bill, and being advised by counsel that if we did proceed to expend any sum of money, we should be liable to an injunction, and should be liable to pay the costs ourselves; and the North Western Company having mooted the question, we have been obliged to pass a resolution that we will not proceed ourselves; negativing altogether the intention to proceed, though we all wished to do so.

2867. At present your parochial affairs may be said to have been brought to a complete stand-still?—As far as paving and lighting are concerned, and also on the other points which I have mentioned, which we have no control over, amounting to so large a proportion as one-third of the entire of our expenditure. Before I close this part of my examination, I wish to state that some observations may be made upon the small number of persons who actually vote out of 19,000 who have the power of voting at a contested election for vestrymen. 4,200 is the number who actually voted this year. The proportion voting for vestrymen, however, is larger than the proportion voting for a representative on a contested election for members of Parliament for our borough. I state this to correct an error in the return moved for by Sir Benjamin Hall, printed in 1849, No. 16. The actual number of voters at the election in 1847, which was the closest contest we have had between Lord Teignmouth and Sir Benjamin Hall, was 6,300 for the entire borough of Marylebone, including our parish, and not 15,050 voters out of 16,812 registered electors, as in the parliamentary return is stated; the person who made up that return having added the votes polled for the five candidates together, and given that as the number of persons who actually polled. We poll 4,200 for our division alone, at a local election in St. Pancras; while 6,300 only polled for the entire borough, at a general election. One point upon which I am requested to speak to the Commissioners, refers to a part of the practice of the Mayor's Court in the City of London, by which foreign attachments may issue upon the monies or goods of traders in the City of London. Great inconvenience has been experienced in St. Pancras, from the state of the law, as it affects that part of the City's jurisdiction. Whether it is right to continue it or not, speaking now as a representative of the vestry, I do not say. As the law stands, or is presumed to stand, if a man keeps an account at a banker's within the City of London, the monies are liable to be attached. If he keeps money at a joint stock bank, which has a branch in Marylebone, or any of the other parts of the metropolis, the City may attach the money still at the City house; and therefore they distribute over the entire district a power of attachment, which was originally confined to the City of London only. I am aware that one of the joint stock companies is about to dispute that point with them; but the law, as laid down in Mr. Locke's book, which is the best authority by far, on the City courts, is, that they have the power which is claimed, and they have hitherto exercised it undisputed. Therefore, while those who keep an account at a joint stock bank are liable to attachment if the bank has any branch within the City; those who bank with a west-end banker are apparently safe; but safe only till a partner of the bank is caught going inside the walls of the City. If such a partner walks to the other side of Temple Bar, and you have your attachment there, you may at once put that attachment upon the money lodged in his bank out of the City; it only wants the personal presence within the City of London of one of the partners of the bank. That is so flagrant an absurdity that it requires a remedy. The City of London, when this power of attachment first existed, at least when it was most used, had only bankers resident in the City. It is comparatively a modern practice for any bankers to carry on business out of the City of London. There was no practical difficulty, therefore, in days gone by, but now there is. Having mentioned the difficulty experienced by traders in St. Pancras, from the state of the law in that respect, I may mention, that as a solicitor I have myself had to use that power of the court for foreign attachment; and most recently in the memorable case in the attachment of monies belonging to the Queen of Spain. If the power is to be extended over the whole metropolis, as it ought to be, if it is to continue, some amendment of that part of the law which throws a difficulty in the way of bankers, and also in the way of persons keeping an account at a bank, should be remedied.

Mr. S. Stockton

Mr. SAMUEL STOCKTON, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

2868. Is there anything which you wish to add to the statement which has already been made as to the coal duties and the cartage?—Yes; Mr. Cooper has not gone into the principle of the coal tax so much as I am desirous of doing. I appear before you at the request of the vestry of St. Pancras, to which body I have the honour to belong. The rate-payers generally feel this tax to be very oppressive. I have endeavoured to ascertain how far the poorer ratepayers pay in proportion to their richer neighbours, and I find that the poorer persons pay more in proportion than those in affluent circumstances. The Commissioners have heard that the exact number of houses rated in the parish is 1,909. I will call it in round numbers 20,000. I find by inquiry, taking my own house for instance, where we have two fires, the kitchen, the parlour fire, and occasionally one in the bed-rooms. In the same street in which I live I made some inquiry, and found that the average consumption of coal by the middle class of society is about seven tons per annum per house. Looking over my own bills I found this, and then went to some of my neighbours and found mine about the average. I go to another part within 200 yards in another street, where the assessment is about 30*l.* a year, and I find that from apartments being let out, the average is five fires instead of two; consequently, the ratepayer whose assessment is lower, and who, according to my calculation, consumes ten tons of coal, actually pays 1*l.* to this tax, while the house which is assessed at a higher rate, pays 14*s.* per annum, showing clearly that this tax is most oppressive in its operation and most unjust in principle. I now am desirous of directing your attention to the fact that we have two large railway termini—the Great Northern and the North Western—in our parish; the consequence is, that the traffic, which is very heavy over our roads into the City, applies more to our parish than to any other in the metropolis; in addition to which we have the traffic into the City from the Great Western Railway. A great portion of the traffic, even of that line, comes over our roads, entailing, as must be evident, a very heavy expenditure upon the ratepayers in keeping those roads in efficient repair. We complain of the injustice of the corporation of the City of London having the power to tax us in the shape of a duty on coals, whereas we, the ratepayers of St. Pancras, are obliged to allow all this immense traffic to come over our roads without calling upon them to pay towards the expense of keeping up the roads a single shilling beyond their ordinary rates. The Commission is perfectly aware that we have no voice in the appropriation of this fund. I believe it is called an improvement fund. I have resided for thirty-three years in the parish of St. Pancras, and I never heard of one single penny being expended on purposes either ornamental or useful to that parish. I think, therefore, the case of the parish of St. Pancras must meet with the attention of this honourable Commission, and we trust that it will lead to some alteration of the present system.

Mr. S. Stockton.

G. Offor, jun., Esq.

GEORGE OFFOR, Jun., Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

2869. You are a broker, are you not?—I am.

2870. Are you in the habit of transacting business in the City of London?—I am, as partner in the firm of Offor and Gamman.

2871. Are there any points connected with the system of brokerage in the City of London to which you are desirous of calling the attention of the Commissioners?—There is one point only. I wish to call the attention of the Commission to this fact, that the body to which I belong, the ship and insurance brokers of London, are taxed by the City to the extent of 5*l.* individually each member of a firm for the privilege, as they term it, of carrying on our business of ship and insurance brokers. This tax, which is better known by the name of brokers' rents, is claimed by the City by virtue of certain Acts of Parliament passed in the reign of William III., Anne, and George III. Those Acts empower the corporation to make certain regulations as to the admission of brokers. I wish to point out to the Commission, in the first place, that the Corporation do require ship and insurance brokers to pay this tax of 5*l.* a year, and in the next place, that it is not only a very unjust and anomalous tax in its working, but, is also an actually illegal tax, the question having already been decided in a court of law, that the Corporation of the City have no claim upon the ship and insurance brokers. I have heard it stated, that we voluntarily apply to the corporation to be admitted as sworn brokers, and that they do not come to us and require us to be such. To speak from my own experience, when I succeeded to an old established business, where the principal had been in the habit for a long series of years of paying this brokers' rent, I applied at the town clerk's office to get his name struck off the list of sworn brokers, and I then stated that I was about to succeed him in his business. They said then, before you can commence your business it is necessary for you to take up your freedom, and to apply to the Court of Aldermen to be admitted as a sworn broker.

2872–3. When did this take place?—In December, 1849, I accordingly applied; I was admitted; I executed a bond or copy of which I have before me; I received a silver medal and paid some 6*l.* or 7*l.* in the shape of fees, and since that time I have paid my 5*l.* a year rent. Soon afterwards I received a copy of a little work published by the corporation, containing a list of all the sworn brokers, and I was surprised to find that in this list but a small proportion of the ship and insuance brokers in the City are included. Those which I have underlined are the only ship and insurance brokers admitted and sworn. I made inquiry among those who were not sworn, and I found from them that it was absolutely unnecessary, and the corporation have never attempted to enforce any payment. I find by the Post Office Directory there are about 200 ship and insurance brokers, who call themselves brokers, and out of that number only fifty-three are sworn brokers. In another list, which will be found in the Weekly Shipping List, which I have myself prepared as editor of that publication, it appears that there are 156 brokers who are now carrying on business, of whom only thirty-five are sworn. I consider, therefore, than it is extremely unjust that I and others should be called on to pay that 5*l.* tax, when the great majority of brokers are to be let off altogether, or equally unjust if the City have no power to enforce it. As to the legal decision, I find, on reference to M'Culloch's Commercial Dictionary, which is a great authority on commercial matters, it is distinctly stated under the title "Brokers," that a ship broker is not within the various Acts for the regulation of brokers in the City of London. He quotes a case in which the question was decided, which you will find in 4th Bingham, the case of Gibbons versus Rule, tried in the Common Pleas in June 1827. In that case, which the Commissioners may have heard of, a broker sued a shipowner for his brokerage. The shipowner pleaded that the broker was not admitted and sworn by the City,—that plea was at first held by the judge to be fatal to the action, but the matter was further looked into, and the rule was made absolute, which reversed the decision of the judge,—it being pointed out in that case, that the ship and insurance brokers do not come within the meaning of those Acts either in spirit or in letter. This is as far back as the year 1827. The City, therefore, have no legal claim, and they never attempt to enforce it upon those who do not willingly pay.

G. Offor, jun., Esq.

2874. If you believe the City to have no legal claim, and they never attempt to enforce it, why have not you redressed the grievance by simply refusing to pay it?—Simply for this reason, I have given two securities to the City for the due payment of the 5*l.* a year.

2875. It is too late, therefore, for you to demur to the payment?—It is.

2876. Do you know whether the corporation have taken measures in any case to compel the payment from other persons, or to compel other persons to become sworn brokers?—I believe they have never done so in the case of ship and insurance brokers. If you apply to the town clerk's office (as I did yesterday, in order to test the matter still further), and ask the question, am I, as a ship and insurance broker carrying on no other business whatever, liable to the 5*l.* tax, the answer is distinctly yes, and you can not carry on your business without it; and if you will lodge an information against any person who is carrying on business, not admitted and sworn, we will commence proceedings. I immediately lodged an information that my partner had been carrying on business with me for the last two years, and that he did not pay and never intended to pay it.

2877. You will have an opportunity now of seeing what course the corporation will take?—We shall. I find that several old brokers who were admitted many years ago have ceased to be sworn brokers; they carry on the same business, but no longer pay the brokers' tax.

2878. Does the City subject the person who is sworn as a broker to any examination, or take any steps to ascertain whether he is a fit person to exercise the calling of a broker?—They only require you to give them some certificate signed by six or seven householders of the City, that you are a fit and proper person.

2879. Does that certificate afford any security for the fitness and respectability of the person sworn?—I should think not.

2880. Do the public give any preference to sworn brokers over those who are not sworn?—Not the slightest. I have not derived the least benefit from it.

2881. The authentication of your admission by the City does not operate in the nature of a diploma in any way?—Not in the slightest degree. There is another anomaly which I ascertained yesterday at the town clerk's office. They stated to me: Though you are admitted as a ship and insurance broker, and are so described on our records, you have full power to act as a stock and share broker. But in reply, I say, the bond which a stock and share broker gives differs from mine. Yes, they say, and if you had been admitted as a stock and share broker, you could have acted as a ship broker, but, having been admitted as a ship broker, you can act as a stock and share broker.

Mr. A. Macnamara.

Mr. ARTHUR MACNAMARA, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

2882. Have you ever been employed as an agent in any elections connected with the City of London?—I have sometimes assisted in elections for the City of London.

2883. Can you mention any particular elections in which you have been engaged?—Principally parliamentary. I assisted in the late election for chamberlain.

2884. In any other City election?—I do not recollect that I ever took an active part. I have occasionally voted.

2885. Were you an agent in the last election for chamberlain?—Yes.

2886. On which side?—Sir John Key's side.

2887. It has been stated to us that considerable expenditure was incurred in carrying on that election; are you, as an agent, able to state whether you believe that to have been the case?—There was some money expended decidedly.

2888. Was any money expended in that election in paying voters?—In the usual way in the City of London; by paying men as canvassers, and flag-bearers, and constables, and the different avocations usually pursued by men at election times.

Mr. A. Macnamara.

2889. Were they voters who were so paid?—There were many voters who were so paid, and many persons who were not voters.

2890. In point of fact, was it the case at that election, that payments of that description were made to voters higher in amount than would have been made for the mere services for which the men were nominally employed, with a view to induce them to give their votes?—I never paid any myself.

2891. Have you reason to believe that such payments were made?—I have heard that there were payments made to the amount of 10*s.* or 15*s.* to a man for his day's work.

2892. Was any treating carried on at the election?—I think there were seven or eight days' election, and I paid expenses upon that occasion to the amount of 20*l.*; that was for the expense of the committee.

2893. Do you believe that the treating went beyond that amount?—I do not think there was any treating.

2894. Have you any means of knowing what was the total cost of that election on the side on which you were employed?—I have no idea at all.

2895. Is there any other City election in which you have been personally engaged?—Principally parliamentary elections. I think some years ago I was employed in one or two municipal elections.

2896. Do you believe that the practice with regard to elections for City officers has materially varied in regard to the purity of those elections of recent years?—I think there is much less money expended in the City of London at municipal elections than there is at parliamentary elections. The livery of London generally are a very respectable body of men. There are 10,000 or 12,000 liverymen, and I do not think it is possible to find above 200 or 300 men who would take anything for their vote, or even a glass of wine for refreshment.

2897. Had you anything to do with the bringing up of non-resident voters?—No.

2898. Do you know whether their expenses were paid?—I think they were. I paid in several instances from 15*s.* to 20*s.* to persons coming from a distance. I recollect two or three voters came from Gravesend and one from Brighton. In those cases I paid their expenses.

2899. Do you think the necessity of bringing up distant voters adds materially to the expense of a City election?—No doubt of it.

2900. Have you ever had anything to do with contested elections for the office of alderman?—In several instances I have.

2901. Do you believe that it sometimes happens that elections for aldermen are accompanied with considerable expense?—I was born in the ward of Portsoken, and we had some very severe contests in that ward. A person of the name of Scales, some years ago, was brought forward, and his election was carried on two or three occasions. After Mr. Johnson, who succeeded Mr. Scales, Mr. Moon came forward; he was opposed by Mr. Salomons, and there were law proceedings which protracted the contest to a period of seven or eight months. I had the management of that election the principal part of the time.

2902. Was there considerable expenditure in that election?—I should think the whole of the contest did not cost Mr. Moon more than 500*l.* or 600*l.*, and I do not believe in that election, though in a very poor ward, there was any one man received a shilling for his vote.

2903. How was that money spent?—It was spent in canvassing and evening parties. There was some money spent in refreshments; perhaps a dinner or two was given.

Mr. T. P. Rose.

Mr. Thomas Plant Rose, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

2904. Have you been engaged in conducting any contested elections for the City of London?—Very few.

2905. Were you engaged in the conduct of the late election for the office of chamberlain?—I was.

2906. In what capacity?—As a confidential agent for Mr. Scott.

2907. You mean in the contest between him and Sir John Key?—Yes.

2908. Are you able to state to the commissioners, from what you observed of that election, whether you believe there was considerable expenditure on both sides?—There was, but not more than usual upon those occasions.

2909. Do you mean that at the election to the office of chamberlain there generally is considerable expense incurred?—Yes.

2910. What is the nature of that expenditure?—Bringing voters from a distance to record their votes.

2911. Is there no expenditure besides that?—Sometimes they are paid for their votes, or, when they come a great distance, for loss of time: at times they are paid for refreshments.

2912. What do you mean by being paid for their votes?—F going down a considerable distance, and bringing them away from their work.

Mr. T. P. Rose.

30th Nov. 1853.

[2913]. Is not it the case that, indirectly, payments are made to voters who are not brought from a distance, to induce them to vote for particular candidates?—I have no knowledge of any such practice.

[2914]. Are there not a great many persons employed as messengers, colourmen, and so on, at elections of this kind?—There are.

[2915]. Are the payments made to the persons so employed merely the payments that would be necessary to obtain the service which is exacted from them, or are they larger than that, and in reality an inducement to voters to support certain candidates?—Not at all. The payment is so much for the colourman, or whatever the office may be, and the average amount of pay is about 7*s.* 6*d.* or 10*s.* a day.

[2916.] Do you mean that, at the election you speak of, no payments were made to persons employed in that capacity who were also voters higher than the rate of 7*s.* or 10*s.* a day?—Yes; there were some paid 20*s.*,—ten, or fifteen, or twenty of them.

[2917.] What were they paid 20*s.* for?—The same thing, only they went about and collected the voters from different parts. They knew where the liverymen resided, and they were in full employment.

[2918.] Do you know what was the total amount expended by Mr. Scott in that contest?—I think about 3,500*l.*

[2919.] Was the whole of that money spent in paying the expenses of travelling and the mere cost of agency in canvassing?—Entirely so.

[2920.] You state that no payment was made directly to any person to induce him to vote?—I never saw anything of the kind.

[2921.] Do you believe any payment of that sort was made?—I heard of payments of that kind, but I never saw any myself.

[2922.] Was there any treating going on?—Very little.

[2923.] Do you happen to know how much money was spent on the other side?—1,900*l.*

[2924.] Then Mr. Scott's expenses were greater than Sir John Key's?—That was only in one particular department. I think Sir John Key told me his election cost him upwards of 7,000*l.*

[2925.] You mean that the total cost of his election for the same objects as those for which Mr. Scott paid 3,500*l.* was more than 7,000*l.*?—Yes.

[2926.] Were there more out-voters brought up for Sir John Key than for Mr. Scott?—I believe I have as great an influence over the out-voters as any one, and I do not think there were any more than I brought up myself.

[2927.] To what is to be attributed the far greater sum which Sir John Key spent than that which Mr. Scott spent?—I think the greater part of it was spent in employing men to go and get votes from every part of the country.

[2928.] Do you think it is possible that such a sum could have been spent bonâ fide for agency merely?—It could not.

[2929.] Did you take an active part in the proceedings of the election throughout the whole course of it?—I did.

[2930.] You were probably to a certain extent conversant with the proceedings on the opposite side as well as on your own side?—I was.

[2931.] Do you believe that any portion of the sum of 7,000*l.* expended by Sir John Key in that election was spent in directly corrupting voters?—I think it was.

[2932.] Do you think any considerable part of that sum was so spent?—I should think so.

[2933.] Do you believe that Mr. Scott's election was lost, and Sir John Key's election gained by the money so expended?—I do.

[2934.] Was treating carried on to a considerable extent on Sir John Key's side?—I did not see any myself.

[2935.] Have you been conversant with any other City elections?—With all the municipal elections for some years.

[2936.] Was there anything particular in the character of that election of which you have spoken for the office of chamberlain, or is the description you have given more or less the general character of the elections for important offices in the City?—It is very different. In the case of the sheriffs' elections, in which I mostly interfere, they are very different.

[2937.] The sheriff's office instead of being an office which is coveted, is rather an office which is avoided, is not it?—It is sometimes coveted. Sometimes there are four or five in the field for it.

[2938.] Is corruption ever resorted to in the elections for the office of sheriff?—Never, [2939.] Is money ever expended on the other hand, to induce voters to negative a person nominated as sheriff?—I never heard of such a thing.

[2940.] Have you ever taken part in any other elections besides those of the chamberlain and the sheriffs?—No.

[2941.] Have you had anything to do with the election of an alderman?—Never.

Mr. Henry Trimbey Gray, having been sworn, was examined as follows :— Mr. H. T. Gray.

30th Nov. 1853.

2913. You are connected with the City of London ?—I am a citizen and freeman of the Drapers' Company.

2914. Were you once engaged in a prosecution in which the City of London bore some part ?—I was.

2915. Can you state to the Commissioners the principal facts respecting that prosecution ?—The facts were, that I prosecuted myself a gang of swindlers in 1847, their names being Gardner, Holliday, Seager, and Loup, residing in Pancras Lane, in the City, and carrying on business to a very great extent in a fraudulent manner, having various counting-houses in different parts of the City of London. Among others, I was robbed of a portion of property, cordage for shipment to the Cape of Good Hope, as was represented, to the amount of 297*l.* After finding out that they were a gang of swindlers, I commenced a prosecution. At the commencement of that prosecution I was given to understand that the cost of it would be merely nominal; that it would be under 25*l.* From misfortune, and the loss of my premises by fire, I could not undertake the whole very well. A friend of mine said he would pay 15*l.*, and I paid 10*l.* towards the attorneys' bill. It was to have been done for the sum of about 25*l.* As I proceeded with the case, I found that it involved many other cases; and among others, that there were forty-nine witnesses whom I had to send for, on behalf of the prosecution, to ensure a conviction. I obtained those witnesses. The prosecution involved the loss of my trade to a great extent, besides occupying my time, having two policemen mostly with me when I went to take down the depositions, and ultimately attending them at the attorneys' office to enable the case to be brought to a proper result. After having done so much as that, it was found necessary, as the expenses were much larger than was anticipated, to open a public subscription. That public subscription was opened. Many influential houses, Messrs. Travers, Baron Rothschild, and many others, gave donations in aid of that public subscription, and ultimately the corporation of the City of London, by a vote of the common council, gave 50*l.* in aid of the funds. After the affair had proceeded so far, the case was brought on for trial in December, 1847, at the old Bailey. A lengthened trial took place, and ultimately we succeeded in convicting three of them : Gardner, Seager, and Holliday, the other two escaped. One of the name of Loup was not convicted, and a man of the name of Herman Casel escaped, whose sureties were forfeited. When the case had gone on as far as that, and the trial was over, it was considered necessary to get my attorneys' bill. Mr. Barber had introduced me to my attorneys, Messrs. Hillary. I had their bill given to me to pay, and to my great astonishment the attorneys' bill which came in amounted to 352*l.* The total amount of the subscription that was raised by the public, including the 50*l.* from the corporation of the City of London, amounted to 304*l.* There was a deficiency in means, therefore, to pay the solicitors, independently of my losing my goods, and also my time, and the private expenses which I had incurred. I was advised that the better plan was to pay the solicitor 250*l.* on account of his bill, out of the proceeds which I had received from the public subscription, leaving a balance then of 102*l.* After that, to assist in the payment of the solicitor's bill, I was induced to petition the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury, on behalf of the estreats, which had been forfeited from this Herman Casel's sureties. I did so, and the Lords of the Treasury thought favourably of my petition ; and I received a communication from Mr. Reynolds, of Gwydyr House, the purport of which was, that I was to bring a copy of my brief, and a copy of my indictment from the solicitor, who carried on the prosecution, to convince Mr. Reynolds that I was the prosecutor. Mr. Reynolds was kind enough to say that the Lords of the Treasury had favourably entertained the petition, and that when the money was paid over, there would be an order given in the Exchequer for me to receive the estreats of Herman Casel's sureties, which had been forfeited, by his not coming forward to take his trial. I made several applications, and finding the estreats were not paid into Her Majesty's Exchequer, I inquired the addresses of those two sureties, and found that they were persons residing in Little Britain and Aldersgate Street, in the jurisdiction of the City of London. I then wished to apply to the corporation of the City of London. On applying to them, I went with Mr. Barber to the office of the under sheriff, Mr. Wire, to get his able support in recovering the estreats, and also to assist me in recovering the amount by a petition to the corporation. The corporation having lent themselves in a measure by a vote of 50*l.* to the prosecution, I thought I could take no better course. Mr. Wire at the outset promised me his able assistance, In the course of the twelve months which elapsed, I had several times been to the secretary's office, and I then received a letter from Mr. Potter, saying that he had received the fines from Herman Casel's sureties, 100*l.* each; advising me to petition through the City solicitor. I first saw Mr. Wire with my friend, and he told me in the presence of my friend, who knew quite to the contrary, that the fines were not received, nor were they paid into the secretary's office, and what is more, that they never would be paid. I was always given to understand that Mr. Wire must have known that the fines had been received; at all events, Mr. Wire then said I had made a very fine thing of the public subscription. I told him it was quite the reverse. He then said to my friend, "If you had a pocketful of money, would you like anybody to "come and put their hands in, and take it out?" There ended my correspondence with Mr. Wire. After that, I petitioned the City solicitor, by the wish of Mr. Potter, his request being contained in a letter to me. I received no answer from the City solicitor, and I was then advised to make a public appeal to the Court of Common Council, by a general petition; which I did, and that petition was presented by Mr. Norris, of Aldersgate Street. Prior to its being presented, I had seen Mr. Lawrance at his residence. I wished Mr. Lawrance to take charge of that petition, but he said, having become an alderman, it would not be in character for him to present the petition, and I had better get a member of the common council to do so. I did succeed in getting Mr. Norris to present it. When the petitioner came forward, Mr. Lawrance was sheriff elect. He immediately rose and opposed the petition, on the ground that the money belonged to the sheriffs, and not to the corporation. The petition I presented (of which I have a copy here) to the corporation, was brought on on Monday, when many friends who had promised me their support, were on the corn market and coal market, and could not attend till three o'clock. Consequently, the prayer of the petition was lost, and Mr. Lawrance's motion was carried that the money belonged to the sheriffs. Afterwards, the petition was presented again in another form, giving them credit for the 50*l.* which they had voted to me, and asking for 150*l.*, the balance of the amount which they had received. The court generally terminates soon after four o'clock, and this was brought forward just about that time, by Mr. Taylor, and was overruled by the majority; there being only twenty present instead of forty. Alderman Wilson, who had promised me his support, held up his hand in favour of the petition being referred to a committee to know what sum of money should be granted in aid of the expenses incurred. However, it was all lost, and there the affair terminated entirely. Mr. Hilleary waited no longer for his bill; he put it into another attorney's hands to get taxed, and on taxing it, the balance of 102*l.* was brought down to 63*l.* I received a communication from him to attend the taxation of the bill. I did not attend. I offered no obstacle, nor did I seek to resist the payment. This happened on Wednesday; and when I went home on the Friday evening, I found an execution in my house from Mr. Hilleary's solicitor, who was Mr. Carroll.

2916. There could not have been an execution in the house without many previous steps having been taken?—There was no further notice given to me than to attend the taxing master.

2917. There must have been judgment against you to warrant an execution?—It was all unknown to me. We had arranged to settle it with Mr. Hilleary by my paying 20*l.* on Monday and 10*l.* a month afterwards, but on Friday morning there was this execution put into my house. I managed to get the money together, and paid it with 9*l.* 16*s.* costs. That completed the expense of the prosecution. I have seen many members belonging to the Court of Common Council, but I have always been given to understand that the last was the final appeal I could make to the court under any circumstances whatever. The 200*l.* has been received, and has been paid into the secondary's office and transferred to the corporation, and the corporation have entirely closed the doors against me and against any application of mine for the purpose of recovering the money.

2918. You say that the money has been paid by those sureties into the secondary's office?—It has.

2919. What means have you of knowing whether this money was ever paid over to the corporation?—It was paid to Mr. Potter, who received it from the under sheriff on behalf of the corporation.

2920. The corporation could have no right to it if it belongs to the sheriff?—That is a disputed point. I understand that estreats have been actually given to the sheriffs, and Alderman Lawrance said they should have to pay certain expenses at the Old Bailey if the sheriffs were deprived of their right to the fines and estreats.

2921. If the money went to the sheriffs, it could not get into the funds of the corporation at all?—It was never disputed by the corporation that they had received it.

2922. Either the estreats in London belong to the sheriff as sheriff, or they belong to the corporation. If they belong to the sheriff as sheriff, they would never get into the funds of the corporation at all, because the sheriff would put them into his own pocket?—I am not clear upon the point.

2923. Did you ever make any application to the sheriff of the day?—Mr. Wire was the under sheriff at the time.

2924. The person to whom Mr. Wire was under sheriff would probably be the person, if the sheriff was entitled to it, who would have this money. Have you ever made any application to him?—None; always understanding that the money belonged to the corporation of the City of London. During the time the prosecution was going on, I was offered the sum of 500*l.* to make a flaw in the indictment, so that the whole of the prisoners might be acquitted, especially Herman Casel, who was the leader. That offer I rejected, and would not accede to any proposals on behalf of the parties. After the trial was over I wrote to the City solicitor, asking the aid of the corporation to assist in prosecuting Herman Casel, should he be apprehended, hearing from parties that he was likely to be apprehended; but I received no answer whatever to that letter. After the trial, finding that I had been reduced in circumstances, I had an offer of 250 sovereigns to give up the judge's warrant, to allow Herman Casel to come to England. That offer was made to me by agents of theirs in the presence of a respectable gentleman, a Mr. Dearsley, of Billingsgate, a fish salesman. I rejected the offer as I have rejected every bribe and temptation which has been offered. I have had 500 copies of my petition printed, and have circulated them among the members of the common council, but I have received no remuneration nor any redress from the corporation except the first 50*l.* Mr. H. T. Gray. 30th Nov. 1853.

2925. There does not appear to have been any refusal on the part of the corporation of what could be claimed by you as a right?—I do not claim it as a right. I claim it on the ground that it was a very hard case that I should have been put to this great expense, and have been almost ruined, and they should refuse me all assistance in the matter. It has appeared in all the petitions which I presented that there is a certain party connected with the corporation of London who invariably carry the day. Mr. Sheriff Wire, and Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Deputy Harrison, and Mr. Hall—all influential men—invariably side together, and they are the stronger party, and had I succeeded in getting their able assistance, I was told I should obtain my object. I paid them all personal visits, but I could not obtain sufficient influence with any one of them to take cognizance of the case at all. I believe if any member of the Court of Common Council were to ask for an account of the estreats and amerciaments which are levied within the jurisdiction of the City of London for a period of five years or any definite period, and the way in which they are disposed of, it would throw great light upon this case of mine and upon where the 200*l.* was paid to. I have never heard of those estreats being accounted for by any inquiry.

Adjourned to Friday next, at 12 o'clock.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY LABOUCHERE, M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

EDWARD LEIGH PEMBERTON, Esq., having been sworn, was examined as follows. E. L. Pemberton, Esq. 2d December 1853.

2926. You are solicitor to the Board of Land Revenue?—I am.

2927. How long have you held that office?—I think it was in the year 1830 I was first appointed. At that time it was the united Board of Woods, Forests, Land Revenue, Works, and Buildings.

2928. In the course of that time have you become acquainted with any disputes which have taken place between the corporation of the City of London and your office, with regard to the soil or the conservancy of the river Thames?—Yes, I have.

2929. Will you have the goodness to state to the Commission what you know on that subject?—First of all, perhaps the Commissioners will allow me to state that I attend here by their desire to give such information as they call for. It is now upwards of sixteen years since my attention was first directed to the question of the title to the bed and shores of the river Thames. The circumstances which led to it were these: the corporation of London have for a very long time, I believe immemorially, held the office of bailiff and conservator of the river. In the year 1837 the solicitor to the Admiralty called upon me, and he drew my attention to an Act of Parliament which had been passed in the previous session, the session of 1836, for constructing a pier and other works at Greenwich, which Act of Parliament contained a clause directing the payment of a fine and an annual rent to the corporation of London for the liberty of digging the foundations for that pier upon the shores of the Thames. At that time there was a Bill in progress through Parliament to amend and extend the Greenwich Pier Act, and it appeared to me that the corporation of London, in the exercise of their office of conservators, were usurping rights which could belong only to the owners of the soil. It also appeared to me that the clause which directed payment to be made to the City of a fine and rent, was an encroachment upon the property, and upon the rights of the Crown, in whom the shores of all navigable rivers within the flow of the tide are primâ facia vested. I thereupon communicated with the Board of Woods, and I was instructed to prepare clauses to repeal the clause contained in the former Act. A correspondence and interviews took place between myself and the City solicitor or City remembrancer, and the Commissioners of Woods and a deputation from the corporation of London; and eventually clauses were settled by the Attorney-General of that day, the present Lord Chief Justice of England, and the counsel of the corporation, by which so much of the former Act as directed the payment of rent to the City was repealed, and clauses were inserted saving the rights of the Crown in respect of its property in the soil, and the rights of the City in respect of the conservancy. At the same time an embankment of the river was required for the new Houses of Parliament. That happened to be about the same time, and those two circumstances together led me to enter upon an inquiry into the nature of the title to the soil and shores of the river. I then collected all the materials I could, including Luffman's printed edition of the charters of the corporation. I also collected what evidence I could as to the exercise of acts of ownership on both sides, and I embodied it in a case which I submitted to the Attorney and Solicitor Generals, the present Chief Justice of England and the present Lord Chancellor. They gave their opinion that the evidence in support of the Crown greatly preponderated —that none of the charters contained apt words for passing the soil; but they advised that the Crown should not voluntarily enter into litigation, but should act as if its title was undoubted. No proceedings therefore were at that time instituted; but the Commissioners of Woods proceeded to act according to the advice of the law officers. That was in 1837. In the beginning of 1843 reports were published in the newspapers of proceedings in the Court of Common Council, by which it appeared that the corporation had granted, or were about to grant, licences to embank portions of the river, and that they were granting such licences not only in the character of conservators, but in the assumed character of owners of the soil of the river. I then wrote to the City solicitor for copies or particulars of the licences which had been granted, or were about to be granted, and I received from him a copy of one licence, which had been granted to Mr. Cubitt, for an embankment in the Isle of Dogs. The licence appeared to me to be rather artfully framed; it did not contain any actual grant of the strand or soil of the river, but it professed to give full permission and authority to Mr. Cubitt to embank it, with a covenant that he should quietly hold the embankment without interruption by the corporation of London, or any person claiming under the corporation. The corporation were not described in this instrument as conservators of the river, and there was nothing on the face of the instrument to imply that they granted the licence merely as conservators; on the contrary, it was so framed as to imply that they granted as owners of the soil, and it appeared that they took a pecuniary consideration for making the grant. Upon that, by order of the Board of Woods, I consulted the Attorney and Solicitor Generals of that day, the present Lord Chief Baron and the late Sir William Follett, and they were of opinion that the claim of the ownership of the soil of the river being now openly made on the part of the corporation, and acts having been done by them in assertion of the right claimed, it was desirable that the question between the Crown and the corporation should be set at rest, and that an information should be filed in the Court of Chancery against the corporation and the grantees of the licences to embank, praying that the rights of the Crown and the corporation respectively might be ascertained and declared, and that if it were necessary to determine such rights by issues at law, such issues might be tried under the direction of the court. That opinion led to the information, which is still pending, being filed. That opinion was given in January 1844, and on the 15th of February 1844, an information was filed by the Attorney General in the Court of Chancery against the corporation of London and their town clerk, and against Mr. Cubitt and several other persons to whom the corporation had granted licences to make embankments, some of those embankments being complained of as nuisances and obstructions to the navigation. I will state the nature of the information, if the Commissioners desire. The information stated that the Crown, by virtue of its prerogative, was seised of the ground and soil of the coasts and shores of the sea and of navigable rivers within the flux and reflux of the tide throughout the kingdom, and among others of the river Thames, and had the right of empire and government over them. That the corporation of London had for a very long period, by prescription, and grant from the Crown, held the office of bailiff or conservator of the river Thames from Staines to Yantlett, and that the duty of the bailiff or conservator was to see to the navigation of the river and to prevent nuisances and obstructions therein, and to regulate the fishing thereof; but that he did not by virtue of his office acquire any estate or interest in the ground and soil of the bed or shores of the river. That the corporation had lately assumed to exercise acts of ownership over the soil and shores of the river beyond the powers of bailiff or conservator, and such as to imply that they claimed to be seised of the freehold of the ground or soil of the river, and in particular had taken upon themselves to make grants to parties possessed of wharves or land on the banks of the river, and other persons whom they thought fit, giving them licence to embank the strand of the river between high and low water mark. It then stated the grant made to Mr. Cubitt in May 1843, which I have already mentioned; another made to the Atlas Insurance Company for an embankment at Rotherhithe in April 1843, for which the corporation received 200*l.*; and a third grant made to Cornelius Park, in May 1843, for an embankment at Battersea, for which the corporation received 10*l.*; and it charged that the two last-mentioned embankments would be nuisances and obstructions to the navigation. It also alleged that the corporation had made a great many similar grants to other persons, and had received large sums of money for them, and it required a discovery and account of the same. The information required the corporation also to set forth under what charter, letters patent, or other grant they claimed to be entitled to the soil, or to have had their title recognised or confirmed; and it concluded with praying that the rights of the Crown and of the corporation respectively might be ascertained and declared by the decree of the court; and that if it were necessary that issues at law should be tried, the same might be tried under the direction of the court; and if it should appear that the corporation had no title to the soil, that the grants to the other defendants might be declared null and void. The information also prayed an account of the fines, rents, and profits received by the corporation for licences to embank, and that they might be decreed to pay the same to the Crown, and that the title of the Crown might be decreed and established to the avoiding multiplicity of suits. The corporation have complained a good deal that an oppressive mode of proceeding has been adopted in suing them in the Court of Chancery rather than in a court of law. The Crown has a right to sue in whatever court it pleases. In the present case a subject as well as the Crown would have been entitled to a discovery; and even if we had waived the right to a discovery, which we could only get in a court of equity, the question of title between the Crown and the corporation could not have been effectually tried in any other court than the Court of Chancery, to which the equity of the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer had been transferred. An information for intrusion against the corporation of London, grounded upon their licences to embank, could not have been sustained at law, for the licences contained no grant of the soil; and if such information had been filed against the grantees acting under them, although the grantees might have been evicted, the corporation, being no party to the suits, would not have been bound to the results of them, and endless actions might have been tried without ever settling the question between the Crown and the corporation. Moreover, cases in which breaches of trust are charged (they are charged in this case) properly appertain to the Court of Chancery. That information was filed on the 15th of February. On the 14th of March 1844 the corporation and the town clerk entered their appearance to the information as the first step to their defence. A very unusual length of time was allowed them to put in their answer, the City solicitor giving me to understand that they intended to put in a very full and complete answer, and required time for that purpose. On the 5th of July the corporation and the town clerk put in an answer and a demurrer, answering only so much of the information as charged that the embankments which they had licensed were nuisances, and demurring to all the rest of it, alleging that the Crown was not entitled to any relief in a court of equity, or to any discovery from the defendants concerning the other matters in the information mentioned. The demurrer was set down to be argued before the Master of the Rolls, and it came on for argument in January 1845, the demurrer being filed in July 1844. On the 17th of April the Master of the Rolls gave judgment overruling the demurrer. The corporation were not satisfied with the decision of the Master of the Rolls, and they appealed to the House of Lords; and on the 27th of March 1848, three years after the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, the case came on to be heard, and the House of Lords affirmed the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

2930. That decision disposed of the demurer?—It disposed of the demurrer, deciding that the corporation were bound to put in a full answer and give the discovery that was prayed for. In the month of July, after the judgment of affirmance by the House of Lords, the corporation put in a further anwer. I should state, that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls is reported in 8th Bevan, 270, and in the Law Journal, vol. xiv., page 305. That is the first judgment upon the demurrer. The judgment of the House of Lords is reported in Clarke and Finnelly, House of Lords Cases, vol. i., page 440. In the month of July 1848, the corporation, as I have said, put in a further answer. The answer, in the opinion of the Crown counsel, was insufficient; and the Attorney-General applied to the Court for leave to file exceptions to it. That motion was opposed by the corporation of London,—that was in July, and by arrangement it was ordered to stand over till Michaelmas Term. On the 16th of November 1848, the motion was heard, and the court gave leave to file exceptions. On the 24th of November, the exceptions were filed, and in the usual course of practice, referred to the Master. The exceptions were argued before the Master in December, and on the 22d of December the Master allowed the exceptions. The corporation were not satisfied with the judgment of the Master, and in January 1849, they appealed to the Master of the Rolls, taking exceptions to the Master's report. The case was argued for three days in the month of February, and on the 4th of April 1849, the Master of the Rolls gave judgment over-ruling the defendants' exceptions and confirming the Master's report with costs,—that is, allowing that our exceptions were well-founded, and that the answer was insufficient. That judgment is reported in the Law Journal Reports, vol. xvii., page 314. Still the corporation were not satisfied, and they appealed to the Lord Chancellor. The appeal was heard during four days before the Lord Chancellor in the month of December 1849; and on the 14th of January 1850, the Lord Chancellor finally dismissed the appeal with costs. That judgment is reported in the Law Journal Reports, vol. xix., page 314. On the 16th of February the corporation put in a third answer, which, like the others, was still considered to be insufficient; and on the 26th of February the Attorney-General obtained an order referring all the answers back to the Master upon the old exceptions. On the 6th of March the Master made his report, finding the answers still insufficient.

2931. What was the ground upon which the several answers were held to be insufficient?—It was, that the information contained in them was not sufficiently full; that they did not fully answer the information, nor the interrogations which were put to the defendants as to the nature of their title,—whether they claimed under charter, or whether they claimed by long enjoyment,—in short, under what title they claimed.

2932. Did they distinctly claim property in the soil?—They denied the title of the Crown, and they distinctly claimed the property, but they did not say under what title they claimed,—we could not get them to say under what title they claimed.

2933. But they did claim the property?—They did claim the property. After the third answer had been reported insufficient, the course of practice was to move for a sequestration against the property of the defendants. On the 11th of March notice was given to the City solicitor of a motion for sequestration; and therefore, at length, on the 19th of April 1850, the corporation put in their fourth answer, setting forth in the first schedule a list of charters and documents which they claimed to be exempt from producing, on the ground that they were evidences of their own title to the soil, and did not tend to prove the title of the Crown; and in a second schedule, setting forth minute-books and presentments relating exclusively to the conservancy of the river. We had a right to know what the nature of the title of the City was, but we had no right to inspect the evidences of their title. We had a right to know whether they claimed by charter or under Act of Parliament, or by prescription or long enjoyment, but we had no right to see the evidences of their title.

E. L. Pemberton, Esq.

2d December 1853.

2934. On what ground was that?—That is a principle of equity, that a defendant is not bound to produce the evidences of his title for the inspection of his adversary, that his adversary may pick holes in them.

2935. Is there no distinction made between the title of a corporation, such as the City of London, and a title to a private estate?—I am not aware of any. On the 2d of May 1850, we obtained an order for the production of the documents contained in the second schedule, those which were not protected by their being evidences of their title. We entered upon the examination, of those documents, which occupied I think more than a fortnight, and the result of the examination made it expedient to amend the information; but I was advised first to prosecute for the searches for ancient and other documentary evidence bearing upon the points in controversy. In June 1850, instructions were given to two gentlemen who were versed in ancient records, Mr. Fearnside, the keeper of Land Revenue Records and Enrolments, and Mr. Hewlett, to make the further searches which counsel had recommended. In November 1850, and January 1851, reports having been made by those two gentlemen,—which, though incomplete, were sufficient for the purpose,—I instructed counsel to prepare the amendments, the purport of the amendments being to place upon the record charges, negativing the statements in the answers that the corporation had been immemorially seized of the bed and soil of the river, and that their title had been recognized or confirmed by Royal charters, and to show that any acts of ownership on which they might rely, were attributable to their office of bailiff or conservator; that their application for and acceptance of charters was inconsistent with their alleged right by immemorial possession; that other grants had been made and acts of ownership exercised by various Sovereigns; Acts of Parliament passed and decrees made in courts of law or equity, also inconsistent with such alleged right; and that the title of the Crown had been declared in various courts of law or equity, and evidenced by the returns to various inquisitions in several reigns. The proposed amendments likewise alleged that the court of conservancy was a court held under and for the Sovereign, and showed that the matters in which the defendants had for some time past assumed to act as owners of the soil, were matters which formerly they would have taken and ought to take cognizance of as conservators of the river, and that the licences in the information mentioned were granted by the corporation in violation of the duties of their office. In February 1851, I applied to the Master, according to the practice of the court, for leave to amend the information. The corporation opposed the application, but the Master made the order. On the 5th of March, the information was amended and filed. On the 24th of March, the corporation applied by motion to the Master of the Rolls to discharge the order giving leave to amend the information, but the motion was refused. The Solicitor General did not press for costs, the defendants engaging not to present any further appeal. The defendants were not required to answer the amended information, but they were at liberty to answer it if they pleased, and they were to have a month for that purpose. On the 30th of April 1851, they put in a further answer, not making any new case, but still resting their title on immemorial possession, and claiming a right to apply the proceeds of the shores and embankments to their own use. On the 3d of May 1851, replication was filed, and the cause was at length brought to issue and ripe for the examination of witnesses. Since then, about 200 ancient records have been proved in evidence on behalf of the Crown, and from 50 to 100 still remain to be procured from the various record offices. No evidence has yet been given on the part of the defendants. The extent of the evidence may be judged of, perhaps, by the fact, that Mr. Fearnside's and Mr. Hewlett's reports, which contain only an analysis of the documents in support of the title of the Crown, extend altogether to 420 brief sheets.

2936. When do you think it is likely that that cause will be decided?—I think it would be utterly impossible for any human being to calculate. The corporation of London have not yet gone into any evidence at all. I take for granted they will,—and it is likely they will apply for time to do so. Publication will pass in the next term if it is not enlarged.

2937. The decision will be made by the Court of Chancery, will it not?—Yes. I expect a decree will at once be made establishing the title of the Crown; but it may be that the court will direct an issue to be tried at law.

2938. Is it not probable that there will be an appeal to the House of Lords whichever way the decision may be?—I have no reason to anticipate an appeal to the House of Lords.

2939. How does the exercise of the right stand now; does the City continue to exercise the same rights over the soil and bed of the Thames as it exercised before the filing of the information, or is the right considered as being in abeyance between the two parties?—The right, in fact, is in abeyance; but the corporation of London go on granting those licences, being directed by the Master of the Rolls to give the Commissioners of Woods fourteen days' notice. An appeal to the House of Lords does not stay proceedings in the court below, and we either did apply, or were about to apply to the court to suspend the exercise of all acts of ownership till they had put in their answer. It would have been inconvenient to have had a total stop put to all works upon the river, whether useful or otherwise, and it was arranged that the corporation should undertake to keep an account of all fines and rents which they received for embankments, and give the Commissioners of Woods notice of any embankments which they intended to licence, that the Commissioners might, if they thought them objectionable, apply to the court to stop them. In that way it has gone on from that time to this. They have gone on granting various licences in the same form, I believe, as those which are stated in the information, giving us fourteen days' notice before they grant the licences. The Crown is no party to the grants, and they confer no right of soil, and will not entitle the grantees to hold their embankments adversely to the Crown if the title of the Crown be eventually established.

E. L. Pemberton, Esq.

2940. Does the Crown exercise any rights of ownership over the bed of the river?—The Crown has exercised them. I do not immediately recollect an instance of recent exercise, except in the case of the Houses of Parliament; in that case notice was given to the City that the Crown intended to embank, and the embankment was made without any licence from the corporation. We admit, that as conservators, they have the right to have an opportunity of judging whether any embankment proposed to be made will be injurious to the navigation. If they can show that it is injurious to the navigation, they have the right to stop it.

2941. You did not ask their permission on the part of the Crown, when the embankment was made for the Houses of Parliament, in a manner which implied that they had any right to the soil of the river?—No.

2942. With regard to the conservancy of the river, has the Crown ever been in conflict with the City?—I do not know that we have been in conflict with the City regarding the conservancy, excepting that at times I think there have been various schemes for the improvement of the river and for the alteration of the conservancy. I am sorry to say that I have not had time, since I was told that my evidence would be required, to make myself master of all the proceedings which have taken place, but that I shall be prepared to do on a future occasion if the Commissioners desire it.

2943. Is the right of conservancy claimed by the City disputed by the Crown?—No. Perhaps I ought to qualify my answer to that question. If it were disputed at all, I imagine it would be by the Admiralty. I do not represent the Admiralty. The claim of my office is merely in respect to the soil. The conservancy jurisdiction is a matter which rests with the Admiralty. In regard to the office of conservators, the Commissioners will find information in Lord Hale's Treatise de jure maris, part the 1st, chapter 5, which speaks of the commissions which have been granted in common rivers, "Commonly called "commissions of conservancy or water bailiffs, which commissions have of late time "especially been granted in all the great rivers in England, and under which the patentees "have exercised a jurisdiction irregularly enough, and to the damage of the people. There-"fore, touching their office, the office of the water baillie or scrutator is a bare ministerial "officer, which the King doth or may appoint in those rivers or places that are his in "franchise or interest. And his business was to look to the King's rights, as his wrecks, "his floatsam, jetsan, water strays, royal fishes; and he had no jurisdiction at all quâ "talis, but his office was only ministerial, to receive an account for the casualties belonging "to the King upon public or great rivers, which did or in common presumption might "belong to the Crown. Such was that office of searcher, scrutator, or baillie of the river "Severn, usque ad pontem Wigorniæ. The office of conservator of rivers and fish in rivers, "and of these patents of conservancy, we find mentioned in the statute 1 Elizabeth, "chapter 17. And by a grant made to the City of London and confirmed by the Parlia-"ment of 17 Richard II., chapter 9, the conservancy of the river Thames from Stains Bridge "down to the Medway, is granted to the Mayor of London. This office of conservancy is of "two kinds, or rather there are or may be two branches thereof. First, the conservancy "in order to nuisances in rivers. This is grounded upon the statute of 1 Henry IV., "chapter 12, whereby it is enacted that there shall be commissions granted to survey and "keep the waters and great rivers, and to correct and amend the defaults. And this "for Thames is annexed to the Mayor of London. By the statute of 17 Richard II., "chapter 9, the justices of the peace are appointed conservators of these statutes, except "only as to the conservancy of the river Thames, and Medway annexed, to the Mayor "of London."

2944. In any part of the litigation which has taken place under the direction of the Office of Woods with the City upon the subject of the right to the bed of the river, has the right of the City to the conservancy of the river been in any way disputed?—As it has not been disputed, we account for many acts which they have done upon which they will rely as an exercise of the ownership of the soil, by attributing them to their office of conservators.

2945. Your case is, that the City are and have been from time immemorial conservators of the river, and that all the acts of jurisdiction or power which they have exercised with respect to the river are to be accounted for by their functions of conservators?—We say that they have exceeded their duties; but many acts which they rely on as evidence of ownership of the soil are attributable, and were exercised in the performance of their duties of conservancy.

Mr. Edward Beck.

Mr. EDWARD BECK, having been sworn, was examined as follows.

(Vide Minutes of Evidence of the 9th December.)

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

WILLIAM EDWARD HICKSON, Esq., was further examined as follows.

2946. When your examination closed the last time you were here, you were about to state to the Commission your general views as to the remedial measures which you thought it would be desirable to apply to the municipal government of London?—In reply to that observation, let me state that I wish not to occupy the time of the Commissioners with any theoretical view of what might possibly be applicable to an entirely new state of society, but rather to consider the practical problem, which I have no doubt anxiously engages the attention of this Commission: how existing evils are to be overcome; how a transition can be most easily effected from the present state of things to something better; how that change can be rendered progressive, and such as to secure ultimately as much perfection in our municipal institutions, as we can hope to realize by human legislation. I wish also to bear in mind what I understand to be the limited scope of the present inquiry, and therefore chiefly to confine myself to the reforms required in the City of London as a separate municipal district; but at the same time keeping in view, that the local interests of the City should always be considered in relation to those of the other metropolitan districts by which it is surrounded.

I will refer first to measures which I think should be adopted in the way of abolition of existing abuses, and then turn to the re-construction of our present municipal organization; a question involving of course that of the functions to be given to any new municipality to be created.

The first practical measure which I would take the liberty to suggest is, simply the introduction of the principle of Free Trade into the City; a principle which has now been long successfully introduced into all other cities and boroughs in the United Kingdom. I would propose the application to the City of London of the 14th clause of the Municipal Reform Act, passed on the 9th of September 1835, which was as follows: "And whereas in divers cities, towns, and boroughs a certain custom hath prevailed, and "certain byelaws have been made, that no person not being free of a city, town, or "borough, or of certain guilds, mysteries, or trading companies within the same, or some "or one of them, shall keep any shop or place for putting to show or sale any or certain "wares or merchandize, by way of retail or otherwise, or use any or certain trades, occupa-"tions, mysteries, or handicrafts for hire, gain, or sale within the same: be it enacted, "That notwithstanding any such custom or byelaws, every person in any borough may "keep any shop for the sale of all lawful wares and merchandize by wholesale or retail, "and use every lawful trade, occupation, mystery and handicraft, for hire, gain, sale, or "otherwise, within any borough." This clause seems to me one of easy application, and at the same time one of comprehensive utility. It would meet the case of all exactions levied by such bodies as the fellowship porters, the Thames watermen, the town carmen, and generally the metage officers of the corporation. In fact it would relieve the metropolis from all tolls and dues not levied by the authority of Acts of Parliament, and would be attended with very extensive benefit. The case of the fellowship porters, fruit and oyster meters, &c. is exactly the same as that of the numerous guilds which were everywhere found before this Municipal Reform Bill was passed; and this clause affected similar vested interests, as they were called, in as many, I think, as 187 corporations. The whole of them were at once swept away, and an end put to that class of petty annoyances. If the Commissioners should not be prepared to go any further this next session, but would merely introduce a short Bill, embodying this one clause, they would confer a great boon, and the thanks of the public would be greatly due to them.

I would propose next (but this involves larger questions) the application also to the City of London of the first clause of the Municipal Reform Act, which abolished all charters and prescriptive rights then held or claimed to be held by the provincial corporations: "Whereas divers bodies corporate at sundry times have been constituted within "the cities, towns, and boroughs of England and Wales, to the intent that the same might "for ever be and remain well and quietly governed, and it is expedient that the charters by "which the said bodies corporate are constituted should be altered in the manner herein-"after mentioned: be it therefore enacted, That so much of all laws, statutes, and usages, "and so much of all royal and other charters, grants, and letters patent now in force, "relating to the several boroughs named in the schedule (A) and (B) to this Act "annexed, or to the inhabitants thereof, or to the several bodies or reputed bodies corpo-"rate named in the said schedule, or any of them, as are inconsistent with or contrary "to the provisions of this Act, shall be and the same are hereby repealed and annulled."

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

2d December 1853

The important object to be effected by the application of this clause to the City, is not the abolition of ancient privileges where they can be shown to be useful, which may be conferred by an Act, but the simplification of the law, so that there may be an end to the business now carried on in the name of different committees of the corporation, usually to the extent of from thirty to forty in different courts, founded on questionable pretensions. By this clause we should get rid of the most fruitful source of corporate litigation, close proceedings otherwise interminable, and at the same time obtain a clear stage for the construction of a better system. Without making a clear stage in this manner,—without in fact legislating, as in 1835, for the extinction of all claims founded upon charters and prescriptions, and de facto putting an end to the existing corporation, that its place may be taken by a new one—all the efforts we are now making for municipal reform would end in failure. Some would be content with an equalization of the wards and an extension of the suffrage, thinking that if we improved in that manner the local representation, the new blood introduced into the Court of Common Council would soon purify the whole system. I am quite certain this would prove a mistake. The consolidation, for example, of useless offices, is quite impracticable by any graduated process. Unless we begin by saying that on a certain day, after the passing of the new Act, all offices, without exception (so as to make no invidious distinction), should cease and determine, they would be continued indefinitely. When lucrative offices fall in, one this year and another next, the time for making a change never arrives. The local pressure brought to bear upon those who enjoy the patronage cannot be resisted. Suppose the office of chamberlain were next year to become vacant: although there might be many persons in the common council as convinced as I am that the Bank of England, or some one of the private or joint stock banks, might manage the funds of the corporation not only without expense to the body but to a considerable profit, yet those very persons, finding among the candidates some one of their own friends or relatives, would be induced to agree to an adjournment of the question, in order that the interest of their friend or relative might be served. So we should go on with the new representative body, no matter how elected—first, as we have been doing for the last twenty years, talking about various reforms, making a little progress now, and soon retrograding quite as fast,—unless the invidious task of disappointing the hopes of place expectants be, in regard to all useless offices, taken out of our hands.

The abolition of charters and prescriptive rights would affect another question: that alluded to this morning by the preceding witness. The conservancy of the river is claimed by the corporation, not under any Act of Parliament, but ancient charters. There has been a Chancery suit on this subject between the corporation and the Woods and Forests of many years' standing; and no one knows when it will terminate.

2947. Do you know whether the conservancy of any river was vested in any other corporation before the Municipal Reform Act?—I believe it was so in some cases.

2948. Do you know in those cases whether the conservancy has been preserved to those corporations, or whether it was taken away from them by the Municipal Corporations Act?—I believe that it exists in the case of Liverpool, or that the right has been claimed because there have been disputes between the people of Liverpool and the Crown about the embankments at Birkenhead; but I cannot speak with precision on this subject.

Among the functions which I would not restore to the corporation of London, nor give to any strictly municipal body, is this of river conservancy. It appears to me a question totally distinct from that of local administration. Municipal government relates, of course, to matters exclusively belonging to a municipality; rivers do not belong to them. The river Thames is not a mere local concern—it is the national highway; and with reference to all matters in which the nation at large is interested, the nation itself, by the national representatives or some department of Government acting for them, is the party that should govern. I think, therefore, the conservancy of the river should be provisionally handed over to the Woods and Forests, until among the reforms sometimes talked of in the Admiralty, which may perhaps lead to a special department for rivers and water courses, some better organization is provided.

I mentioned before, but I may here state again, that in proposing so sweeping a change as is involved in this repeal of existing corporate offices, subject, of course, to the re-appointment of officers really found indispensable, the question of compensation requires to be considered. I would repeat my conviction that compensation should be given, and on a liberal scale, as the soundest policy for the public.

Among the other functions which I would not restore to a City corporation is that of excluding the City from the jurisdiction of the metropolitan police. The present corporation claims the right of closing the gate of Temple Bar against the metropolitan police, and even of keeping the Sovereign herself waiting till the Lord Mayor has been consulted on the propriety of her Majesty's admission. I think this privilege has been found to work extremely injuriously both for the interests of the City and those of the metropolis at large. It involves the City, by its independent police force, in a very heavy expense, an expense quite disproportionate to its need; and it impairs the efficiency of that protection which ought to be given to persons and property both in the City and out of it. The practical result of the present system is, that criminals take up their residence in the City, and rob there, till their faces become inconveniently familiar to the City policemen, and then leave the City to pursue their depredations in the surrounding metropolitan districts. By the time they become known to the metropolitan police, they are perhaps forgotten in the City, and then they return. This, of course, is a system of watching more effectual for the protection of thieves than honest men, and I cannot imagine how it can be for a moment defended,—excepting on this principle, that every municipal body entrusted with the power of passing byelaws, ought to have the power of making those byelaws respected by an executive force of its own. This principle I respect. I do not think it at all necessary or desirable to deprive the City of the power of appointing an auxiliary police force in addition to that of the metropolitan police; I would deprive it only of the power of defeating precautions necessary to the common safety. The larger municipality should in all cases have power to overrule the byelaws of a district board; but if, after admitting the metropolitan police into the City, the City ratepayers should be of opinion that that force was not sufficient for their protection, they should be at full liberty to rate themselves for additional watchmen. To this there appears to me not only no objection in point of principle, but I believe it is one of those prerogatives which ought, as a constitutional question, to be secured to them. It is a principle recognised by the Municipal Reform Act in the case of all provincial boroughs, and I would certainly not make the City an exception. In my own case, as a private individual, if I wish at my own expense to place a watchman at my own door, as an additional protection to that of the police, no one would hinder me; and I can conceive no good reason why every municipal board should not be left at liberty to act in the same manner. The check upon the appointment of too many police would be the heavy burden it would throw upon the rates. This would prevent any disposition to carry the privilege to a preposterous extent.

2949. Do you consider it objectionable that the metropolitan police should be in the hands of the Government in so large a population as that of the metropolis, while it is left in the hands of the municipal authorities in towns of small extent?—If we were now prepared to legislate for the whole of the metropolis and to constitute at once a metropolitan municipality, I should propose to introduce the popular element more or less in the appointment of the metropolitan police. As advocates of public liberty, which all Englishmen are presumed to be, I think we should keep before us what has recently passed on the continent, where we have seen policemen in the dead of the night arresting the first generals of France and the first statesman of the age, and carrying them off into exile. Such an abuse of the executive should teach, with other facts of history, the propriety of not placing it too exclusively in the hands of one individual, nor of one body of individuals.

2950. In performing those operations, the police of Paris were backed by a large military force?—It was so, but the military only took part in the conflicts in the streets. The coup d'état was really struck and rendered effective by the Paris police. All who could have headed the subsequent movement were arrested, and the people were left powerless because without leaders.

A slight misapprehension might arise from the answer which I gave to a question put to me on my last examination, in reference to the area of the metropolis. I was asked what was the proportion of the area of the metropolis to the area of the City? I replied that the City area was about one-twenty-fourth part of the uncovered portion of the whole. But there is a great deal of confusion about the meaning of the word "metropolis," from its being employed by different boards in different senses. I was referring to "the metropolis" of the Commissioners of Sewers, but "the metropolis" of the Registrar General is a different metropolis to that of the Commissioners of Sewers; and I am not certain whether "the metropolis" of the Census Commissioners is quite the same as that of the Registrar General. "The metropolis" of the police commission is different from them all; is much more considerable than would be inferred from the proportions I named. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the exact fact, and I find that the area watched over by the metropolitan police at the present moment, which embraces a circle having a radius of seventy-five miles round St. Paul's, is as much as 700½ square miles in extent; while the City of London only occupies an area of one and a half square miles. The whole of this area of 700½ square miles is watched over by a body of but 5,600. The corporation employ 500 policemen for watching over their area of one and a half miles, exclusive of City marshalmen, ward constables, and the private watchmen of the Temple and of the large banks and warehouses.

Connected with this subject of administrative functions, is that of the propriety of abolishing the right of general taxation, even in those cases where it has been conferred, not only by charter but by specific Acts of Parliament: as the coal duty, the wine duty of 4*s.* a tun, the profits on apprentice fees, and some other imposts of which I have not the particulars. I think, if we propose to abolish indirect taxation in the shape of exclusive privileges affecting the fellowship porters, town carmen, and others, it would be well to consider, while we are about it, whether, instead of making a new corporation collectors of coal duties for the benefit either of the City or the metropolis, we should not at once make an end of all imposts of that description.

2951. Do you mean the 4*d.* duty?—The 4*d.*, the 8*d.*, and the 1*d.* duties. I think there are several reasons why we should abolish the whole. I may mention, that when I had the honour of sitting, as you gentlemen are now doing, as a member of a Royal Commission some time ago, the Hand-loom Inquiry Commission, we had a good deal of evidence brought before us relative to the southern districts of England, showing that the pauperism and general destitution which prevailed in places where the trade of woollen and silk weaving had formerly flourished was mainly to be attributed to the high price of fuel; through which those branches of industry had changed their seat; now in the north, where fuel is cheap. Since that time I have been impressed with the conviction that in taxing coals in the port of London we are legislating on a false principle; or if a coal duty should be levied at all the place to levy it is at the pit's mouth, where the price is so low that the addition of 1*s.* 1*d.* would not be sensibly felt. Here, in the south, we levy a duty where the price has been already greatly enhanced by the cost of carriage, and to keep up that price allow a drawback on its exportation. I think if we are to retain the duty at all, we should at least change its locale; levy the duty at the pit's mouth, and allow the drawback upon coal carried to those parts of Great Britain where there are no coal fields.

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

2d December 1853.

2952. Would not that observation apply more strictly if we were dealing with the coal duty as a general tax, rather than a tax for local purposes?—Perhaps it would; but it is still a question which comes immediately before us, as we are considering whether the power of levying coal duties is to be given to a new corporation; and it comes somewhat pressingly before us at the present moment, from the extreme dearness in London both of fuel and food.

2953. How would it be possible to raise a tax for the benefit of the City of London at the mouth of the coal pits in Northumberland, giving a drawback for that portion of the coal not exported to London?—I am not proposing that the whole proceeds of such a tax should be applied to the City of London, nor endeavouring to show the facility of its collection in that form. I am merely stating the principle upon which we should proceed if we are to have a coal tax at all; but it appears to me one of those taxes which a free-trade government should exert itself to get rid of, as next in objectionable importance to a duty on food. While I was a member of the commission to which I have alluded, I was on this subject impressed with another fact; that we ourselves, who have always a chaldron or two of coals in our cellars, are scarcely the persons fairly to discuss this question. We are apt to think very lightly of a duty of 1*s.* 1*d.* upon a ton of coals; but it is because we know not what it is to buy them by the bushel. I remember one occasion, when I went round with one of our assistant commissioners among the weavers of Whitechapel and Spitalfields. It was a bitter cold day in the midst of winter, and the number of families we saw shivering round an empty grate made a very painful impression upon my mind which I have never been able to efface. At that time I was in communication with Sir Frederick Trench, Mr. Martin, and others, about an embankment of the Thames, and we were considering whether, for such a great metropolitan improvement, the money might not be raised by a slight increase of the coal duties; but I made up my mind from that moment, and have retained the same opinion ever since, that the coal duties were as indefensible as the corn laws. Having now got rid of taxes on food, taxes on fuel, the next great necessary of life, should follow. These duties are said to amount only to 1*s.* 1*d.*; but I am inclined to think that evidence could be adduced to show that the 1*s.* 1*d.* is practically 1*s.* 6*d.* All indirect taxes increase the cost of production, by interfering with the freedom of commercial transactions; and these must seriously do so in many ways. The present system upon which they are collected is open also to other objections. I have somewhat pertinaciously, as it may appear to the Commissioners, insisted upon the propriety of these coal duties appearing in the annual accounts of the corporation of London, not only because the corporation ought to be held responsible for whatever has to pass through its hands, but because the responsibility in this case ought to be increased by great vigilance on the part of the public. Very little is known of the gross proceeds of the coal duties, and of the deductions for collection, &c., to which those proceeds are subject. The machinery required for their collection is every day becoming more and more cumbersome, and I think more and more inefficient; tending to the same class of abuses which are everywhere found on the continent in connexion with inland custom-houses. In the collection of the duties upon the coals which come by railway the corporation is obliged to associate itself with the railway companies as a sort of copartners. The rule is, for the railway companies to send in an account of the number of tons of coal they have carried, certified by one of their officers as a true account, and for the corporation to take for granted that so many tons, and no more, have been imported by railway into the City of London. But knowing, as we do, what has passed in some railway companies,—knowing, as we do, how much disposition there has been to prepare accounts for shareholders, so as "to make things pleasant,"—knowing, as we do, that the duty upon 100,000 tons of coal carried by a railway (no uncommon occurrence) amounts to a sum of money at 1*s.* 1*d.* a ton which would greatly assist a dividend,—I think, if the duties are to continue, there is ground for a much more searching inquiry into the whole question than has yet been attempted. We want at least to know how much ought to be received, what is received, how much sticks by the way on its passage into the public coffers, and what precautions are taken to prevent coals being smuggled into London; for instance, coals deposited twenty-five miles from St. Paul's might very easily be brought by waggon within the prescribed boundary along the ordinary turnpike roads.

2954. Do you think it would be worth while to do that to any appreciable extent?—Not for the whole distance; but I think it would be, and is, for distances within a journey of five or ten miles. I should be inclined to assume that a great deal of coal finds its way within the prescribed boundary without paying duty. I have endeavoured to ascertain what kind of check the corporation put upon such proceedings, and it is understood that they employ on the high roads a great many scouts occasionally for the purpose of keeping a good look-out. If they do so, that is another objectionable part of the system. Inland dues necessitating such an agency are quite incompatible with the policy of free trade.

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

2d December 1853.

Then with regard to the mode of getting rid of them; it does appear to me that there really ought not to be felt in such a metropolis as this the slightest difficulty about the means. I do not know exactly how much of the loans raised upon the coal duties remains still unredeemed; but I think if the 8*d.* fund, which has produced 2,000,000*l.* since 1831 has been fairly managed, the amount now to be paid off ought not to exceed 750,000*l.* Supposing it to amount to 1,000,000*l.*, which must be the outside, that is but a consideration of 48,000*l.* or 50,000*l.* a year. A single penny rate, which might be called a coal-duty compensation rate, on the rental of the whole metropolis, would produce that amount; and every householder in the metropolis would cheerfully pay it. The rental of the metropolis is, as assessed to the police rate, somewhere about 12,000,000*l.* sterling; that is, 10,600,000*l.* as assessed to the metropolitan police rate, and the City rental making up the difference.

2955. Would not that be substituting a rate which would last for ever for a tax which will expire in the year 1862?—I should propose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order to pay off the existing loans, should borrow the money upon a new stock of terminable annuities. I think, among other constitutional principles which we may hope one day to see adopted, is that of never mortgaging the interests of posterity. There is no necessity that national loans should ever be raised by such means; for by giving a very slight difference, depending of course upon the state of the money market, but often not exceeding a half per cent., the same amount may be as easily borrowed upon terminable annuities as upon annuities made perpetual. I think, in addition to raising 48,000*l.* by a penny rate, a fund sufficient for the ultimate redemption of the rate might be raised by a separate assessment on the owners of furnace chimneys, the largest consumers of coal. It would be easy to ascertain what had been the average consumption of the gas companies, breweries, &c., and to rate them separately with a view to this great object.

2956. What is your opinion with respect to maintaining a separate system of sewerage for the City?—That question reminds me of one which has been often asked since the commencement of this inquiry: What would you give a new corporation to do? Some witnesses having proposed to transfer to a metropolitan municipality most of the present duties of the corporation:—My view of municipal government is, that as far as it relates to business exclusively local it is injudicious to assign any limits to the powers of a local administration, whether in regard to sewers or other matters. The great defect of the Municipal Reform Act was that it simply reconstructed the old corporations, without giving them powers for any useful object, the appointment of a police excepted; so that the new corporations, after they had appointed their police, found it a very doubtful question whether they had liberty even to erect a pump in a market place for the benefit of their fellow citizens without a special Act of Parliament for it. If the difficulty was met by going to the House of Commons, and getting permission to erect their pump, it it would frequently be discovered that a further extension of their powers would be required, as the liberty to erect a pump would be useless without permission to sink a well; and so another Act would be applied for, giving powers for well-sinking. This characterises (of course a little extravagantly) what has really been the general course of our legislation on questions of local administration, from the time of the Municipal Reform Act down to the last discussion on the question of education in the House of Commons. It is a reproach to the age that we should not have yet made up our minds whether or not a local municipality should have power to apply a portion of its own funds to purposes of popular instruction. Neither upon education nor any other subject would I limit the power of a municipal board, properly constituted, by any other rule than that of a general subordination of all local interests to public interests. I would say, "Do what you please with your own money; the money which you raise from your own rates; but leave alone the money of other people, and do everything in accordance with the common laws of the land. The legislature should of course retain power to overrule all byelaws passed by local corporations, when those byelaws interfered with the public welfare; and a metropolitan municipality, if we should ever live to see one, should overrule, when necessary, in a similar manner, the byelaws of all local district boards at variance with the metropolitan interest. It is in this way I would meet the question of the sewers, and generally that of all matters of local administration. I do not see why, in regard to drainage, for permission to make a drain from a private house into a sewer running through the street it should always be necessary to apply to a metropolitan court of sewers. Clearly it would be more convenient to apply to a district board for such a purpose. For objects, therefore, of this class, I think a committee of a new corporation might act as it does now as a district court of sewers; but such a board would be quite incompetent to deal with the question of arterial sewerage. The direction of the main sewers and outfalls required for the metropolis should obviously be intrusted to a board representing, not a section, but the whole. It is now referred to a metropolitan commission. Ultimately I should hope to see that commission superseded by a board composed of men of special qualifications for the task, appointed by a metropolitan municipal council.

2957. You would make the presumption always in favour of the local body, and every power which it seemed possible they could exercise in a proper manner you would give to them, only withdrawing from them those powers which they were manifestly unfit to exercise?—Yes; so arranging that the greater interest should always be enabled to overrule the less.

The paving of the City of London, as far as the side streets are concerned, might be left to the paving board appointed by the municipal council of the City; but here again, the same distinction applies. A metropolitan supervision requires to be exercised over the paving of our great arterial communications; because it is of great importance, when any of those arterial communications are repaired, that the repairs should be executed throughout the whole of a given line at one and the same time, under the best possible arrangements for promptitude and despatch, and so as to interrupt the traffic as little as possible. Upon the system of divided and conflicting jurisdiction, which has hitherto governed, nothing is done with any unity of purpose. The pavement of a street is disturbed to-day by one parish, and it is disturbed to-morrow, a little lower down the same line, by another parish. Paviours are employed to reconstruct a roadway, and as soon as it is finished the Gas Companies take it up again; then the Water Companies or the Sewerage Board interfere with it, destroying all that has been done before; so that even with such thoroughfares as Fleet Street, the Strand, and Oxford Street, we have seen them under repair from one cause or another all the year round.

2958. With regard to those great measures of improvement which affect more or less the whole metropolis, how would you provide for them?—By a metropolitan board. I have said that a district municipality, such as the City, should have full power to effect district improvements; but I think the course should be, to have all local plans submitted to a metropolitan board in the first instance, so that they might be made to accord. If the proposed improvement was such as would interfere with some general scheme, such, for example, as the direction of a new main thoroughfare to run through the heart of London, it should be overruled; if not, I would leave the district municipality at liberty to carry it out.

2959. What would you say in respect to lighting; do you think that need in any case be taken away from the local municipality?—I do not know that it need; yet I can conceive that cases might arise in which it would be desirable to overrule the byelaws of a local district, even in reference to lighting. I would therefore make no exception to the general rule of rendering the sectional interest subordinate to that of the aggregate. This is the general principle I would lay down. I would not pass an Act forbidding a new corporation to do this or that or the other. I would, on the contrary, give it full power to act as it thought best for the common interest, but with this general understanding, that its byelaws might be overruled, either by the Legislature, or by a municipal council formed for the whole metropolis, whenever those byelaws were found to interfere with metropolitan interests.

But there are some powers which I would specifically intrust to a new City municipality which the present corporation does not possess; and I am now confining myself chiefly to the City of London proper, because our endeavour should be, first, to render the City of London proper, as far as possible, a model district, before we proceed to organize other municipal districts for the metropolis, and to federalize them under one head. Among the new functions which I would give to the municipal council of the City of London would be, the power to elect a board of guardians to carry out for the City the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act. I alluded to this subject before, and in bringing it again forward it is very satisfactory to me to know that I speak in the presence of one gentleman who has had great experience in poor law administration, and is therefore fully able, both to correct any inaccuracy of statement into which I may fall, and to appreciate the importance of the facts to which I would draw his attention; facts of which the public are generally ignorant. The Poor Law Amendment Act has failed altogether in its application to the City of London. The burden of the poor rates is now considerably greater than it was before the City was formed into three unions. I have a statement of the comparative expenditure of the City Central Union for the relief of the poor in different years; namely, for the three years, 1834, 1835, and 1836, and the three years, 1850, 1851, and 1852. The population of this union, which contains ninety-eight parishes, has decreased within the last three years referred to from 57,100 to 55,168, and yet there is this difference in the expenditure. Before the Poor Law Amendment Act was introduced into the City, the sum expended in poor law relief in those ninety-eight parishes was 59,110*l.*; and for the last three years the average has been 88,449*l.*, showing an increase of 29,000*l.* per annum; and yet the last three years have been years of unusual prosperity. This arises in part out of our present complicated municipal organization. The number of parishes in the City being very great, and the principle of the Poor Law Amendment Act being, that every parish shall be represented by one or two guardians, we have in the Central City Union an unwieldy board of no less than 101 guardians, exclusive of guardians ex officio. The two other City unions have about 25 guardians each; so that altogether we have about 160 guardians to elect every year in the City. Now where are we to find 160 men of the right class, in such a busy place as the City, to attend to matters of poor law administration, and at the same time to find 100 men of intelligence and probity, or upwards of 200, as at present, to discharge the ordinary duties of town councillors? One consequence of this separation of municipal functions, and of preserving a distinct machinery for the administration of the poor rate, has been, not only in the City but throughout the whole country, a general deterioration, since the time when the Poor Law Amendment Act was introduced, in the character of these local administrations. I acted myself for three years as a member of a board of guardians, and was then deeply convinced of the necessity of either throwing the unions upon the municipalities, or throwing the municipalities upon the unions. It is an important principle of local administration, that the sphere of local usefulness should never be so confined as to interest only men of confined views. Our object should always be to get first-class men,—I speak not of the richest men to be found in a community, but men of the largest grasp of mind, and of the highest character,—to take part in matters of municipal administration. The original idea of the framers of the Poor Law Amendment Act was, that the poor law unions should have thrown upon them as much as possible of the ordinary municipal business of the district in which they were situated, with a view to this object. That idea has not been carried out. The duties of guardians have been limited to the care of paupers; and I speak from experience when I say that to have constantly before one the various varieties of human suffering, all shades of demoralization, ignorance, coarseness, and brutality,—cases of scrofula, cases of delirium tremens, as well as those of undeserved misfortune,—human nature under its saddest aspect,—is enough to overturn the balance of any mind endowed with strong sympathies. This has been often felt, and the result has been, that men of superior education and position, who became guardians of poor law unions in the first instance, have gradually left them; and I am quite satisfied, from the general tendency now manifested towards a revival of old abuses, that the whole of this question of poor law administration will have to be reconsidered. The proper machinery for the administration of relief is that of a municipal council, as in the neighbouring district of Marylebone, where the guardians are elected every year, and the same members of a common vestry alternately take upon themselves the onerous duties of guardians.

There is another function which I would propose to throw upon a new municipal corporation; and that is the consolidation of the numerous parishes to which I have alluded. I mentioned on my last examination, that the burden of the church rates and other charges connected with our ecclesiastical establishments are very serious, and amounting to as much as 70,000*l.* per annum; and I may now add, that so long as the existing system is maintained there can be no material reduction; because, however small a parish may be, it must have its separate staff of officers, forming a little nucleus of expense, the tendency of which is constantly towards augmentation. Among these functionaries there is generally an esprit de corps in favour of building new churches, or repairing and beautifying the old.

2960. Surely no one proposes to build new churches in the City of London, the number of churches there being already excessive?—So you would suppose, à priori; but the fact is, there is always some one connected with the parochial administration who has a particular reason for proposing the building of a new church, or the repair of an old church, and very large sums are continually being expended upon such objects. In the parish of St. Sepulchre, some years back, it was proposed to repair the church, which of course no one could object to; but those who directed the repairs contrived to make the cost amount to 10,000*l.*, a sum which would have built a new one. In the parish of St. Dunstan, Fleet Street, a new church was built not very long ago, at an expense of 16,000*l.*; but that sum included the purchase of a burying ground in Fetter Lane, the last place in the world where a site should have been so appropriated, and which has very properly been shut up under the new Interments Act. In one of the parishes in Cornhill there is a fund accumulating for building a new church; and I know sufficient of the enterprise and perseverance of some of our City architects to be morally certain that 10,000*l.* will one of these days be applied to the erection of a new church in that neighbourhood; yet we have as many as eighty churches in the City, or nearly that number, exclusive of St. Paul's, and the greater part of them every Sunday comparatively empty. The consolidation of parishes is, however, not a measure to be considered as at all antagonistic to the Church, because I have reason to believe that the attention of the Bishop of London has been drawn to this subject, and that he is favourable to the proposition. I do not wish now to discuss the mode in which it should be effected. I would not insist that the whole of our 110 ecclesiastical jurisdictions should be consolidated into one. I propose only that among the functions to be given to a new municipality should be that of conferring with the ecclesiastical authorities, and preparing with their concurrence, for the approbation of Parliament, a Bill for the consolidation of our City parishes into fewer districts.

2961. For ecclesiastical purposes, you mean?—It is a matter for deliberation, what functions should be intrusted to a new parochial organization, both for ecclesiastical and secular objects. A measure of consolidation would affect funds relating to both. In my statement of City revenues I introduced the word "tithes," and I did so because many of the parishes in the City of London are at this moment lay impropriators of tithes.

Various questions might arise out of their application. I would also give to the municipal council of the City power to assist by a committee the new Charity Commissioners in their investigations, and to prosecute, in all cases requiring prosecution, parties committing a breach of trust. I mention this, because without some enlargement of the machinery created by the Charity Bill passed this last session it is very certain that no reasonable progress will be made in our lifetime in the general reform of charity abuses. Too much is expected of the public; and no private individual can have a sufficiently stirring motive to occupy himself constantly with matters of this kind. Every now and then, it is true, we see a person appear as a relator in the Court of Chancery, to take up the case of some charity abuse for the benefit of the parties concerned; but there is not one man in 10,000 who will sacrifice his time for such an object. It should, however, be somebody's business, and the machinery of the Charity Commissioners being quite inadequate for more than preliminary investigation, the municipal council of the City should, I think, have power to assist the Charity Commissioners with reports on the subject, and to employ a legal officer as a public prosecutor where necessary. We have long enough seen a City solicitor employed to enforce petty exactions, under the name of corporate privileges. Let us now employ one for the more legitimate object of restoring public money to its proper use, and for the protection of the rights, in a bonâ fide sense, of the poorer classes of citizens.

The next point upon which I would ask the attention of the Commissioners is the subject of a municipal elective qualification. There are now different kinds of constituencies for the various local boards that exist throughout the country; and we have to consider whether we should adopt the franchise of the Municipal Reform Bill, that of the parliamentary qualification, or that of some one of our almost innumerable local acts, such, for example, as the Vestry Act of Sir John Cam Hobhouse. I am inclined, upon the whole, to think that the best qualification to be adopted in the present case is that of the Poor Law Amendment Act,—the qualification of electors voting for a board of guardians, the important feature of which is, that it gives a vote, not only to all ratepayers, but also to the owners of property.

2692. That involves also a system of plural voting, as determined by the amount of property, does it not?—It does so; which I am not urging as its chief recommendation. I wish principally to show, that household suffrage, as far as it is understood to mean resident household suffrage, would not meet the case of the City, which in some respects is a peculiar one. The most influential men in the City—the class of men to whom the citizens of London originally looked, and would still look, as the best protectors of their rights and privileges,—are scarcely resident, in the ordinary sense of the word, in the City at all. Even in the Court of Aldermen, as now constituted, although, as its members are elected for life, they are indifferent about their qualification, there are many who are now not resident householders, although resident when first elected. Our first merchants, most of whom may be found in their counting-houses every day at eleven o'clock, often reside at great distances from the City. Many City men have their families all the year round at Brighton, and come up and go down every day with season tickets. One of the witnesses who first came before you, Mr. Dillon, is at this moment living at Croydon. Mr. Mechi is a well-known man in the City of London, but he is not always to be found in his shop in Leadenhall Street. He resides on his farm in Essex. I have myself, though not by any means a large owner of property in the City, a greater interest in the improvement of City local administration than most of my fellow-parishioners in the parish of St. Dunstan's, and yet I habitually reside twenty-four miles from London; yet I can be in the City whenever required, as I was this morning, by ten o'clock. Railway communication giving us rapid means of transit, and the penny postage having cheapened correspondence, the habits of town populations are fast changing. There is now no difficulty whatever in persons interested in a particular locality transacting daily all their business connected with it, and yet living with their families, for the benefit of a purer air, twenty or thirty miles away.

2963. You would not be afraid of the evil which generally is found to attend out-voters being brought up for those municipal elections at which the constituent body have to exercise their votes?—No; because in this case the out-voters would not be pauper freemen, but the class of men least likely to be influenced by local jobbing. The great danger to be guarded against is that active canvassing of personal friends which goes on whenever patronage has to be exercised, or when there is a competition for some profitable contract. In boards of guardians I have often been struck with the effect of such canvassing. The duty of relief is of such an onerous character that few persons can be got to attend to it systematically. Any guardian who pleases may look after the school children or the infirm poor himself. A quorum of guardians sufficient for a board is often made with difficulty; but when new appointments are to be made, or contracts for clothing or provisions given out, then invariably there is a full attendance. The meaning of that is, that some of the parties interested in those appointments or contracts have been going about from guardian to guardian soliciting their attendance and votes.

2964. Still the system of out-voters has a tendency to increase the expense of elections, has not it?—It has undoubtedly such a tendency; but not as carried out under the Poor Law Amendment Act, to any serious extent.

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

2d December 1853.

2965. Under the Poor Law Act are not owners of property allowed to vote by voting papers?—Yes.

2966. Does not that prevent expense?—It very materially limits expense, and in some cases reduces it to a lower minimum than is practicable upon any system where personal attendance is required at the poll. I think the principle of distributing voting papers, and having them collected by a proper officer, is a very important improvement in our modes of election. It is one of the provisions, not only of the Poor Law Amendment Act, but also of the Health of Towns Act. We have now two important branches of local administration in which this mode of voting has been found to work successfully; and I should much like to see it extended to our parliamentary franchise, with permission, in county elections, to send the voting papers through the post.

2967. You believe that that has worked satisfactorily as far as it has been tried?—I do. In many cases it has been the means of overruling public-house influence, and rescuing a parish from jobbers. Respectable men, who could seldom be induced to attend parochial meetings,—because disinclined to listen to noisy oratory, or to come in contact with persons interested in local abuses,—have been found perfectly willing to make use of their franchise in this form, and by doing so have often upset that public-house influence which was at one time everywhere omnipotent.

This question of qualification involves another of serious moment, and that is, the constitution of the London chartered companies. I understand that the powers of this Commission do not extend to an inquiry into the state of those companies; but you will perceive in a moment that any alteration of our municipal qualification in the City necessarily brings this subject before you. Hitherto no person has been allowed to vote at common-hall elections without having taken up his livery in one or other of those corporations. The chartered companies, therefore, form a part of our existing municipal constitution; and in modifying that constitution we ought now to consider what is to be the constituency these companies should represent for the future, and what is to be done with the funds which they administer, and which they claim as their private property. The funds held by the London companies, not included in the account which I gave before of the City revenues, are supposed, upon the lowest estimate, to amount to 250,000*l.* per annum. To whom is this money to belong? We take away from them the power of compelling the citizens of London to enrol themselves as freemen and liverymen of these companies, and of course the tendency is for the whole of those funds ultimately to assume the form of family estates belonging to the master and wardens, or two or three members of the court of assistants. I do not envy any man his private property; I do not deprive the companies of any property to which they are legitimately entitled; but I should like to see the question settled. I should like to see the parties clearly defined by some Act of Parliament who are to hold this property, and of the uses to which it is to be applied. This is not a question of trust estates left specifically for charitable objects, but that of funds which have arisen out of the produce of what was formerly heavy municipal fines; fines at one time severely enforced, although this is no longer the case, the richer companies having their own reasons for not caring to increase their number.

2968. Are their funds chiefly derived from estates or fines?—Their revenues are now principally derived from estates, but those estates were to a great extent purchased with the produce of municipal fines. Within the last forty years, no person, under any circumstances, could take up his livery in the City of London, and become entitled to the ordinary municipal privileges, at a less expense than 50*l.*

2969. If the connexion between those companies and the City was severed, the fines would altogether cease, would not they?—The fines would cease, but the property they have produced would continue to exist.

2970. The companies would be left owning these estates, in trust for certain public purposes, would not they?—Those purposes have to be defined; and on the part of the ratepayers of the City of London, or on the part of any constituency now to be newly created in the City, I claim a portion of this property, as the produce of municipal fines, which ought to be made more heavily chargeable with local burdens than the property of private individuals not belonging to such incorporations. The last Commission sought to obtain a little explanation from the chartered companies of the nature of their property, and of what they did with it; but the richer companies declined to give any information, and they can only be compelled to give it by an Act of Parliament. I think, therefore, this Commission should either have its powers extended, with a view to this object, or that a new Commission of Inquiry should be appointed, assisted by the first law officers of the Crown, or men of high legal standing, able to form a sound opinion upon all the points at issue. Apart from the question, as I put it, as between the municipality of London and those chartered companies, the relations at present subsisting between the master and wardens or the court of assistants and the livery generally of these bodies require adjustment. Many of these companies are composed of very discordant materials: the livery thinking their surplus revenues not equitably distributed; and where there is no murmuring the mode of distribution is one of waste. The rich companies get rid of some of their wealth by giving the most expensive dinners; and it is still customary to place a five or ten pound note under the plate of a liveryman invited, if a member of the court of assistants. Two guineas is a common fee for attendance at a dinner, even in some of the poorer companies. I would much rather appoint a commission fairly to divide the whole of this wealth between the masters and wardens of these companies, when, perhaps, it would be made a better use of, than that the existing system of eating and drinking, and corruption of manners, under the form of hospitality and good fellowship, should be continued indefinitely.

Another point which occurs to me has reference to the principles of representation. When we are considering how a new municipal franchise is to be carried out, we have to determine what share in the representation should be given to each elector. It now greatly varies. In some wards of the City an elector votes for four, six, or eight members of the Court of Common Council; in other wards, for fourteen and sixteen; and it is one of the curious anomalies of our representative system, that in the neighbouring district of St. Marylebone every elector has the power of voting for 116 members of the governing body. Now, if the principle be right, that an elector should have a voice in the election of 116 representatives, a system which limits him in Farringdon Without to the choice of sixteen cannot be equally right, nor that which limits him in other wards to the choice of four or six. It is time we thought of laying down some consistent rule on the subject.

2971. Is not the rule a very simple one, namely, that each elector has as many votes as there are persons to be elected?—That applies only to the question of equality in the representation, not of fitness.

2972. In a district where the number of persons to be elected is smallest, the number of electors is smallest, is not it?—It is so; but something more is required. I think that all elections should be so conducted that every voter should be put in a position to exercise an intelligent choice. In the case of election by large batches it is impossible for an intelligent choice to be exercised. The list system followed in Marylebone and in the ward of Farringdon Without I regard as essentially bad; and as applied in France it was the means of destroying the fruits of the revolution of 1848. It threw the elections of that country into the hands of different factions, the public at large voting completely in the dark. In Paris every elector was required to vote for thirty-four candidates, none of whom perhaps he knew personally. Marylebone is practically governed by a self-appointed body, for no one person knows the whole of the 116 vestrymen for whom he is requested to vote.

2973. What you object to is the system of voting for candidates by lists?—Yes. I would recommend, in place of that, that every elector should have but one representative.

2974. Would you give him one representative, by subdividing the City into wards or districts?—I would divide the City into wards; but I do not think a subdivision of the wards would be necessary. I should suggest ten wards as sufficient; and there might be ten candidates elected in every ward, but every elector in each ward should vote for only one of them. I would draw your attention to the importance of providing for a representation of the minority in a municipal assembly as well as the majority. That is a principle as yet but little understood, but which will one day be seen to be indispensable to any system of real representation. I have always passed for a radical reformer, and have no objection to be called one at the present moment; but I do not at all regret the delay which has taken place in reference to the improvements required in our Parliamentary representation, on this account. The public mind is scarcely yet sufficiently awakened to a number of important questions connected with the subject; among others, this of the minority having a place in every deliberative assembly appointed for either local or national objects. We have talked a long while about the extension of the suffrage, and vote by ballot, which I would not undervalue; but the only effectual way by which corruption at elections, and all that party strife and bitterness which now disgraces them, can be made to cease, is by allowing the minority their fair share in the representation. In a national assembly the representation should be a reflex, as much as it can be rendered, of the nation itself. The nation itself consists of majority and minority, and in the minority the most intelligent part of the nation is often found. In drawing attention to the subject, not as an abstruse one, but really as a practical one, which fairly comes before the board, I would beg to put in this paper, containing the sketch of a scheme of municipal representation which has been carried out, and which I understand works very satisfactorily. It appears to me to be an important document, both as an official one, and as the first instance on record of this principle, that the minority should be represented, having been fairly recognized by a Government department, and acted upon. It is from a report of the Commission for South Australia, which sat in 1838. This part of their recommendations was drawn up by Mr. Hill, the father of Mr. Rowland Hill of the Post Office; was embodied in the local act, and is now in operation in South Australia.

The witness read the same as follows:—

Extract from the Third Annual Report of the Colonization Commissioners for South Australia, for 1838.

"We would recommend that the towns in South Australia respectively, as they acquire a population of 2,000, may, upon application to the Governor and Council of the province, obtain a municipal constitution, consisting of a common council of at least fifteen members, a body of aldermen of at least three members, and a mayor; the common council to be elected by the ratepayers, the aldermen by the council, and the mayor by the aldermen. And in order to counteract the tendency to exasperated party feeling which is sometimes found to exist in small communities, as well as to make timely provision against the arbitrary power which, under popular governments, the majority exercise over the minority, we would further venture to recommend that the municipal elections may be so conducted that a majority of the ratepayers may not have the power to exclude the minority from returning their due proportion of members to the common council. In order to accomplish this desirable object, it is proposed that the municipal elections shall be conducted in the following manner :—When the number of which the common council may consist is determined, and the number of electors ascertained, then the electors shall, by voluntary classification, form themselves into as many equal electoral sections or quorums as there are members to be elected, and each of the equal quorums shall, provided they can agree upon a unanimous vote, return one member to the common council. By this mode of election parties will bear the same proportion to each other in the council which they may bear in the elective body, and the minority will be secure of being fairly and fully represented. In whatever might be the numbers of common councilmen to be chosen, fifteen, or twenty, or thirty, a minority consisting of a fifteenth, or a twentieth, or a thirtieth of the whole electoral body, might form themselves into an electoral quorum, and return a member of their own party. A minority sufficient to form two of the equal quorums at which the electors might be dividable would be able to return two members to advocate their principles, and so on. And we would further recommend, that the aldermen be elected by the council in the same manner that the council is elected by the ratepayers ; that the election of councillors, aldermen, and mayor shall take place once in three years, and that the mayor and aldermen shall be ex officio magistrates within the municipality."

With respect to the last part of the recommendation, I do not fully coincide in it. I think, for several reasons, and especially as aldermen are often named in local acts, that it may be necessary to have a body of municipal councillors so called ; but I would not make them magistrates ; and I would propose that the aldermen should be elected by the common council ; not by the popular vote of the constituency generally. Supposing the municipal council of the City to consist of 100 members (a number not too great for division into committees), to that body I would give the power to elect from their own number a mayor and ten aldermen.

2975. Would you render it obligatory upon them to choose a mayor from their own body ?—I would.

2976. Why do you think it would be right to confine the choice of the mayor to their body, and not to permit them to select any other individual in the City of London ?—It is the rule of the Municipal Reform Act, which has generally worked well ; and I think the best means of securing the fittest choice. A town council choosing a mayor from among themselves is in a much better position for making a suitable selection than the members of a common hall.

2977. The question rather refers to the propriety of rendering it obligatory that the mayor should be chosen from among the members of the common council. Do not you think, if any citizens of London might, without having been common councilmen, be chosen to fill the office of lord mayor, there are many merchants who might object to mix with the common council, who might not object to be chief magistrate for a single year ?—I have not very recently considered the whole bearings of that question, but I have done so in former times, and the result is an impression, that upon the whole it is desirable the selection should be from their own body, though all the reasons by which I could support it may not occur to me at the moment. One reason does occur to me, which is, that it is in all cases important that every individual elected to an office of importance should have had some previous training for it in the exercise of subordinate duties. It is generally best for the public that a candidate should have passed through inferior offices before he arrives at the higher. I know there is a disposition on the part of many persons to look about for the greatest magnate in their neighbourhood, whenever any high office is to be filled ; but the man who occupies the most prominent position in a locality from his wealth may not by any means be the most efficient person to select for the duties of local administration. As Mr. Baring's name has been mentioned, and, I think, Baron Rothschild's, I might refer to both those gentlemen as City magnates; but I should not say that they were necessarily, because of their superior wealth, best fitted to act as a mayor of the City of London. The kind of training which consists in negotiating large loans with foreign powers is not the best municipal training. A person may be very competent to give an opinion upon the present relations of Austria and Russia, and the problem of the Eastern question as affecting the finances of those countries, without being at all fitted, or so fitted as even small shopkeepers might be, for promoting, by a careful discharge of the duties of administration, the welfare of their fellow citizens.

2978. It might by no means be desirable that the office of chief magistrate of the City of London should be given to the first-class merchants who transact business there ; but does it not seem an anomaly that there should be any system by which, almost necessarily, the greatest merchants of the City of London should be debarred from the probable acceptance of the office of chief magistrate ?—I think so, undoubtedly ; but the reason why they are now practically excluded, or practically exclude themselves, is, that the sphere of usefulness hitherto open to them in the corporation is of too circumscribed a character to be worthy their ambition ; and this is one of the reasons why I have insisted before upon the importance of a system of consolidated management. Give our first merchants something effectual to do for the benefit of their fellow citizens, and you would at once find, I do not say Baron Rothschild, but such men as Mr. John Dillon or Mr. Travers, allowing themselves to be put in nomination at a municipal election.

2979. The time of a first-class merchant in London is very much occupied in his business; it is necessarily a very active kind of life ?—It is in the early part of his career. Afterwards the general rule is to take in a junior partner, and for the senior partner to become sleeping member of the firm. We find that Mr. Mechi has time to enlighten the whole agricultural world on various matters connected with agriculture. I myself, though originally a city man, occupy myself partly with farming, and I can always find time to assist, as I am now endeavouring to do, in the removal or reduction of our public burdens.

W. E. Hickson, Esq.

2d December 1853

With regard to the aldermen, I was going to say, that in some respects it would be desirable to get rid of the term, as one which has sunk rather into disrepute; but the word, on the whole, is a good one; it is a Saxon term; the aldermen of London were simply the elders of the commonalty of London. The word is derived from the Saxon aeld. The elders of the commonalty of London were the persons principally looked up to to conduct the business, and were often left to conduct the business, as a matter of course, without going through any form of election. In that way came about the system of election for life. The Municipal Reform Act does not explain very clearly what the aldermen have to do. They are not magistrates under the Municipal Reform Act, and I think they should not be magistrates under our new constitution for the City. Under the Municipal Reform Act, they assist the mayor of the municipality, and take his place as president, when he is not himself present. They act as trustees of the corporate estates.

2980. Would you continue the aldermen of the City of London as a separate court?—For some purposes they might be continued. If we had 100 members of the court of common council, I would give them power to elect ten from their own body, who might be called aldermen; who might be a sort of senior council to assist the mayor in his duties, act as trustees of the corporate estates, take the place of the existing aldermen in those cases in which Acts of Parliament refer to aldermen, and represent municipal interests of the City in any central metropolitan municipality to be hereafter created. So that if we had ten municipal districts in the metropolis similarly constituted, we should have a body of 100 aldermen or senior councillors sitting as a central metropolitan board, or upper chamber. In some such way, I think a metropolitan municipality might ultimately be organized. But I have not prepared myself to go largely into a scheme for one, because it is very clear to me, from the magnitude of the subject, that we are not in a a position fairly to legislate upon it without further inquiry. Among the recommendations of your report, perhaps there should be one for extending the powers of this Commission so as to enable it to embrace the whole question of a metropolitan municipality. You will, I doubt not, point out in your report the necessity of the corporation being brought into harmony with metropolitan institutions generally, and of some kind of representative body being provided to act for the whole of the inhabitants of the metropolis. It has been suggested that each of the parliamentary boroughs should form a separate municipal district. That was originally my own impression; but on looking to the population returns of the metropolitan boroughs it appears to me that the parliamentary borough boundaries should be set aside as altogether irrelevant. That subject will have to be considered, perhaps, during the next session of parliament, as part of the question of the improvements required in our parliamentary representation. Our boroughs are now somewhat anomalously constituted. The City of London has a population of only 129,000 persons, and yet returns four members; and the borough of Marylebone (which is distinct from the parish of Marylebone) has a population of 370,000, and yet only return two members. So again, the Tower Hamlets, which is the largest of the parliamentary boroughs of the metropolis, has a population of 539,000, and yet only returns two members.

Mr. T. Woodley.

Mr. Thomas Woodley, having been sworn, was examined as follows:—

2981. You exercise the trade of a butcher, do you not?—I do.

2982. In what part of the City?—Aldgate High Street.

2983. How long have you been established there?—Myself and my father previously for a long time.

2984. Are there any points connected with your trade to which you are desirous of calling the attention of this Commission?—I have been annoyed very much by a class of journeymen freemen. Ours is a district in which there is a great deal of slaughtering carried on; I think there are between thirty and forty slaughter-houses; and there is a class of men who attempt to monopolise the whole of the work; they make their own claim for price, and do not allow us a free choice of servants. The plan they pursue is this: they demand 2*s*. 6*d*. a bullock for slaughtering, which is a great deal more than there is any occasion to pay; but they will work on no other terms. I have always kept my servants in the house, and paid them according to their respective value. About two years ago I was applied to by one of those men for work. I refused him. He then threatened me with an action. They first apply for work as freemen; they then change their ground, and say that they will punish me for employing non-freemen. The mode is to proceed at the Lord Mayor's Court, serve me with notice to discharge the man, and if I refuse, an action is brought against me, suing for a penalty of 5*l*. for employing a non-freeman.

2985. What class of freemen are they who thus claim the right to be employed in your trade?—I believe there is a byelaw of the Court of Common Council, passed as long ago as the year 1712, which ordains that no freeman shall employ a non-freeman in the City of London, under a penalty of 5*l.*

Mr. T. Woodley.

2d December 1853.

2986. Is there any particular fellowship of labourers who are employed in the butchers' trade?—No; I believe every journeyman and every shopman in the City of London employed by a freeman (the action will not lie against a non-freeman) is liable to the same thing, if it were enforced.

2987. It is not as members of any particular fellowship, but as freemen of London, that they claim to be exclusiuely employed?—Yes.

2988. What has been the course of those actions which have been brought against you for not employing freemen?—I compromised the first, and took up freedom for the man. Very shortly afterwards I was served with another notice, and I took up freedom for a second, and I did so with a third. Immediately that freedom was taken up for those men they become my masters. They considered it a matter of obligation if they stayed and served me, and they either required a great advance in their wages, or they left me. It is a very obnoxious system, because nearly 7*l.* is an important amount with a journeyman butcher. If he is induced to part with that amount for his freedom, he has very extravagant notions as to the rights he obtains by it.

2989. You mean that it costs him 6*l.* or 7*l.* to take up his freedom?—Yes.

2990. How many journeymen are you in the habit of employing in your trade?—I employ three in the slaughter-house, and a man in the shop. This is a system which is unknown anywhere, except just in our neighbourhood; but several persons, years back, have resisted those actions, and I believe always unsuccessfully; therefore they are afraid to resist the claims of those men now when they make them.

2991. You were brought into the Lord Mayor's Court, were you not?—Yes; I had an action commenced against me, I suppose, about three months ago, and was served with a declaration as lately as the 28th of October; but I believe decidedly it is quite against the will of the present officers of the corporation that such things should be carried on; and when I obtained an interview with Sir John Key on the subject, he appointed a day, and had the whole of the parties brought before him, and strictly prohibited any further proceedings in the matter.

2992. When was that?—It was about a month since.

2993. On what ground did he give that direction?—The action is brought in his name.

2994. What were the circumstances in the case which induced him to stop what appears to be the usual course of proceedings?—The man who brought the action was ordered to appear before him to confront me; the whole of the circumstances were inquired into, and Sir John Key considered it was merely a question of malice. This man had left my employ in an improper manner, and he thought it was one of his rights that he could sue me for this penalty, and he did so.

2995. In the butchers' trade generally in the City of London, do you know whether this claim, that journeymen should be exclusively freemen of the City of London, is enforced?—It is not enforced anywhere but in our market.

2996. It is not enforced generally in the City, you believe?—It is not.

2997. Which is your market?—Aldgate High Street. Whitechapel Market it is called.

2998. Is it generally enforced in that market?—Yes.

2999. Why is a distinction made between your market and others?—Several masters have been punished years ago, and they submit to it.

3000. Is not it enforced in Newgate Market?—No. A large portion of the meat which is supplied to Newgate Market is killed in our market; but at Smithfield, where there are several large slaughtering establishments, no such law is recognised.

3001. Is there any distinction made between carcase butchers and other butchers?—Those men only apply in the case of slaughtering; they charge 2*s.* 6*d.* a bullock, and by the system they can easily earn 10*s.* or 12*s.* a day.

3002. There is no difference, is there, between employment in slaughtering and employment in other branches of the butchers' trade?—None whatever; the law would equally apply to any journeyman.

3003. According to your statement, the City regulation in respect to the employment of freemen is capriciously applied in regard to your trade?—It is not applied in any other case than ours. Those men have exercised the right. They know they can enforce it, and they get a large increase of wages by paying 6*l.* or 7*l.* to take up their freedom.

3004. You say that you consider 2*s.* 6*d.* an unreasonable charge for the service in question. What do you think would be the natural payment for the same thing?—I think it is quite thirty per cent. too much. I can get my business done without any difficulty at thirty per cent. less, without the interference of those freemen.

3005. Is there any other point which you wish to mention?—There is nothing else. I think the whole system of freemen journeymen should be abolished.

3006. Are you aware of any advantages which it produces?—No advantage, except to the man himself; all the advantage to the man is a disadvantage to the employer.

Mr. THOMAS PILLOW, having been sworn, was examined as follows. Mr. T. Pillow.

2d December 1853.

3007. You are a lighterman, are you not?—I am.

3008. Your premises are No. 73, Lower Thames Street?—I have an office in Thames Stree. My chief place of business is Symon's Wharf, Tooley Street.

3009. Will you have the goodness to state to us any points relating to your trade to which you wish to call our attention?—It is at your request I am here. I wish that to be understood, though I am not an unwilling witness by any means. A gentleman from Isleworth has appeared before you this morning. I perceive he is labouring under a wrong impression, as to the bearings of the Act of Parliament for regulating watermen and lightermen. He says, we have jurisdiction over the Medway as well as the Thames.

3010. You mean the corporation of the City of London?—The corporation of the City of London and our company are distinct.

3011. You are a member of the watermen's company?—I am.

3012. Are you a member of the governing body of the company?—I am one of the court of assistants.

3013. You are aware of the manner in which the concerns of the company are managed, are you?—To a considerable extent. I am but a young member of that court. I should prefer not giving evidence as to that, with which I am imperfectly acquainted; but I think it desirable that you should not remain in error respecting the statement which the gentleman who was examined from Isleworth made. He thought he could not carry goods to the Medway. He was complaining that he could have a collier up from the north, and discharge her at his wharf at Isleworth, but could not bring goods from the Medway to his wharf. That is a mistake; he has as much the privilege of carrying goods from the Medway as he has from the north; that is to say, the vessel could be manned by others besides freemen of our company.

3014. What are the restrictions which would be put upon the vessel under those circumstances?—There would be no restriction whatever; he is quite in a mistake.

3015. Can you explain what the extent of the restrictions is?—The extent of the restrictions in our business is this:—Our Act of Parliament confines the navigating of barges and craft of that description to our freemen. Our freemen enjoy an exclusive right; not from any charter, but from Acts of Parliament. Their Acts of Parliament give them the exclusive right to navigate and manage all craft upon the River Thames, extending from Yantlet Creek, Kent, to Windsor, Berks. Within that distance they have the exclusive right and privilege of managing those barges. There are certainly practices which are, I think, injurious to the community at large, which arise out of that exclusive right. I am persuaded, that for want of power under our Act of Parliament in our present management we have great reason to be complained of by the public in general; but some of the witnesses who have appeared before the Commissioners have not been fully acquainted with the nature of our privilege, and have not stated it quite clearly. In respect to the secretary of the General Steam Navigation Company, I read that he complained that their servants could not load their barges. We have no privilege in that respect; our only privilege is confined to navigating craft, &c.

3016. The gentleman who gave evidence in the earlier part of the day stated that your privileges would prevent him from navigating with his own servants a barge from the mouth of the Medway to his own wharf at Isleworth. Would not the privileges of your company, as you have stated, prevent him from doing so?—No; because he comes out of the Medway,—out of our district; he commences his voyage beyond our district.

3017. The mistake he made was, as to the limits of your jurisdiction, but not as to the nature of the privilege itself?—Quite so. He took the jurisdiction as relating to the City of London.

3018. Could that gentleman have sent his own barge with his own servants from Isleworth to the mouth of the Medway?—Yes; any distance beyond Yantlet Creek.

3019. Both the point of departure and the point of arrival must be situated within the limits of the City?—Within the jurisdiction of the watermen's company.

3020. He could not unload any part of the cargo within the limits to which your limit extends?—Our privilege does not embrace loading or unloading.

3021. Supposing his barge had set off from his place at Isleworth, and had touched at some point of the river within your jurisdiation, and landed some part of its cargo, and had then gone on lower down the river out of your jurisdiction, would that have been a legal operation, or would it have been an infringement of your privileges?—If the goods had been his own it would have been legal; but he could not have legally carried for hire or gain other person's goods.

3022. Is that privilege enforced by the watermen's company?—It is. Our Act of Parliament so provides for it.

3023. Is the Act of Parliament carried into effect? Do you practically exclude any person within those extreme limits from navigating any barge for hire, unless he employs your freemen?—Yes. The nature of our occupation involves the necessity of that exclusive right, as no man can thoroughly understand our business unless he is early initiated into it by apprenticeship, for which we provide.

3024. Were you yourself ever fined by the company of watermen for infringing their privileges?—Yes.

Mr. T. Pillow.

2d December 1853.

3025. Under what circumstances did that take place?—The last case was, when a strike took place with about sixty or seventy men. We had about fourteen of them in our employ. There are three prominent branches in our business; namely, corn lightermen, coal lightermen, and legal quay lightermen. I belong to the legal quay lightermen; and this strike was confined principally to the legal quay lightermen, which affected wharfingers and merchants connected with the shipping of foreign produce on board steamers and other vessels going foreign. I believe this strike principally originated from the fact of what Mr. Pratt complained of. He complained that the company could not get their steamers discharged in the time they required, on account of the want of men and barges to perform that operation. Their work is often confined to about twenty-four hours; they unload from 300 to 500 tons of goods, and take in the same amount, within that space of time. The men, therefore, are obliged to be in attendance both night and day. I believe that the origin of that strike arose from their arduous duties in attending to those ships and others of that class, which they complained they were not properly paid for. We, ourselves, as employing those men, felt that we had cause to complain of their conduct towards us. On account of their having the exclusive right to navigate our craft, led us to feel that we were oppressed.

3026. You thought they made unreasonable demands, presuming upon the exclusive privileges which they possessed?—Yes; and in consequence of that we resisted the claim which they made upon us. I gave my foreman instructions that in this case the business must not stand still; that he must employ anybody that he could get, whom he thought capable of navigating the craft under the circumstances. We could muster, with our foremen and apprentices, and one or two freemen who did not strike, something like twelve persons, besides our watchmen, and we were enabled by that means to carry on our business during this strike of the men. We felt, as masters, that we had not that authority which we ought to have over them; and at that time, I thought that the best thing that could be done for us would be to throw the privilege open.

3027. Were you fined for doing so?—In the instance before referred to I had a nominal fine imposed upon me. One of these men who were on strike saw one of my watchmen assisting the apprentice to bring up a barge to a certain place,—that is contrary to our existing Act of Parliament,—and on that ground summoned me before a magistrate at Stone's End in the Borough. I complained to the magistrate of the state in which we were, on account of our men having struck, and that we were hardly able to help ourselves, and that I had given instructions to my foreman to employ any one whom he could trust, in order that the business might not be neglected. The magistrate, I believe, was not aware that I was one of the Court, as I had been but recently elected. I did not inform him of that; but the result was, that he said that that state of things must not be permitted to continue, and if the men persevered in that conduct they would certainly have their privilege taken from them; and he recommended me to apply to the Court of Aldermen, and if I stated my grievance truly he was persuaded that they would be empowered to give us relief.

3028. Had you to pay a fine?—I had to pay 1*s.* fine, because he could not set aside the Act of Parliament altogether; he was obliged to fine me.

3029. What would be the effect if the privilege were taken away, according to the advice of the magistrate?—I fear the remedy would be worse than the disease. I am quite an advocate for free-trade principles. I believe they will always operate best with the community at large; but in that case it would operate injuriously to all persons engaged in business on the river, and to the community, if it were thrown open. I think, on account of low wages, the temptation to employ incompetent men would be great; and there is no question that many men would be put into barges to navigate them who would occasion collisions and loss of property, and in some instances lives of persons too.

3030. Supposing the trade were thrown open, should not you think it your duty and interest to take care that proper men were employed in navigating your barges?—I should.

3031. Do not you think other persons engaged in the same line of trade would do the same?—There would not be enough men found to do the work, I fear.

3032. Why do you imagine there would not be enough persons engaged in the occupation, so long as it was remunerative?—There would not be enough persons competent to be trusted to navigate our craft.

3033. The object of the present system is to restrict the number of competent persons, is not it?—It is.

3034. Therefore, if you took away the restriction, the probability is that the number would increase?—It would not increase so as to meet our wants. I would beg to suggest a plan, which I think would be far preferable to breaking down the barrier which now exists. I should, however, prefer its being thrown open entirely, than for it to be perpetuated in its present state without amendment. The framers of our Act of Parliament evidently showed a disposition to restrict as much as possible the supply. That is seen by the way in which apprentices are taken.

3035. You said there was a course which you thought it was advisable to follow; what is that course?—At present, our law restricts us from having more than one apprentice. A freeman must not have more than one apprentice till that apprentice has served four years, and then he may have a second. If he has twelve craft, he may then have two apprentices at one time; if he has twenty barges he can have three apprentices, but no more, although the number of barges he may have may amount to 100. What I would suggest would be, that any freeman might have as many apprentices as he liked. We find there is not one person in forty who will take apprentices at all, but there are many who could employ two or three apprentices, and would bring them up to be good lightermen, if they were allowed to do so. I would remove the present restriction with respect to apprentices.

3036. There are some persons who have no apprentices, are there not?—Yes.

3037. What do they do now?—They employ freemen but the influx of business since the free trade principle has been fairly brought into action has certainly made the number insufficient. The number of competent persons who may be employed has not increased in proportion to the demand.

3038. Do you think, as a kind of police regulation, it is desirable that there should be some means taken to ascertain the competence of the persons employed as watermen on the River Thames?—Yes. There is a great deal we could correct if it were left in the hands of practical men. I have been on the water for forty-four years, and have worked at it twenty-eight or twenty-nine years (occasionally), night and day, so that I fully understand the nature of the work, and I can see the injurious effects which now prevail, which might be remedied by introducing what I should propose in regard to apprentices. We find that unless the lads are brought up to it from an early age they do not acquire that competence or skill which it is very necessary they should possess.

3039. Is the business of a waterman on the River Thames one which cannot be learnt in a short space of time?—It may be learnt by lads who have been previously connected with the water in three years; by others in four or five years at the farthest.

3040. To an active intelligent man, would not two or three months be enough to make him a good lighterman?—No. The traffic on the river is very great, and the navigation difficult, and we are constantly exposed to collisions. We are intrusted with a large amount of property, and much depends upon the skill of the men employed.

3041. If the trade were thrown open, would the present freemen be losers to any considerable amount?—I think the generality of the present freemen would not be losers.

3042. Would the rate of payment fall in consequence of the privilege being abolished?—I think it would, but not much. We should not find a sufficient supply to meet the demand. There are several matters which might be very much improved if they were referred to persons who were empowered to bring about a reformation. I may state that our company is not a constituent part of the corporation of the City of London. The City of London Companies, I believe, almost all of them hold their privileges by charter, but we have no charter; we are simply incorporated by Acts of Parliament.

3043. Is it necessary to be a member of the watermen's company that a man should be a freeman of the City of London?—No; to be a member of our company does not give the freedom of the City of London.

3044. Are not they entitled to take out their freedom?—No; they are not entitled by that means to exercise any franchise in the City of London at all. We have no political standing in the City of London.

3045. What is the number of the members of the watermen's company?—The number of freemen on our books is 7,786.

3046. Has the number been gradually increasing?—Lately it has.

3047. Not in proportion to the increase of the trade of the port?—No; the restriction on the number of apprentices should be removed. The Government, I think, should sanction that, because the transition is so easy from our service to the navy and to the mercantile shipping.

3048. Is there any rule or law by which the watermen's company is bound to furnish men to the royal navy?—Yes; they could draught 500 men from us to-morrow in the event of hostilities breaking out.

3049. Will you point out the clause in the Act of Parliament which relates to that subject?—The clause is as follows:—"And whereas in this time of war divers watermen, "bargemen, lightermen, and wherrymen belonging to the said river do abscond and not "enter themselves into Her Majesty's service; and it being highly necessary that a "convenient number of such watermen, bargemen, lightermen, and wherrymen should from "time to time be obliged to serve on board Her Majesty's fleet: Be it enacted by the "authority aforesaid, that in case such a number of them as the Lord High Admiral or "any three or more of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral "of England for the time being shall from time to time give notice to the said Company "of Watermen, there shall be occasion for to serve Her Majesty, her heirs and successors "(being duly summoned by leaving notice in writing at the place of their usual abode, "by the company,) within ten days after such summons shall not appear before the "rulers of the said watermen's company, to be sent on board Her Majesty's fleet, such "person or persons so summoned, and being duly convicted before the Lord Mayor and "Court of Aldermen of the City of London, or two justices of the peace of the said City, and "two of the said rulers, that then he or they so doing and offending shall suffer imprisonment during the space of one month, and be disabled from rowing or working upon the "said River of Thames and of enjoying any the advantages or privileges of the said "company for the space of two years." It appears we are bound to supply the Government with as many men as they need, to the full extent of our whole number if the necessity of the state so required.

3050. Has that power ever been acted on?—Not to the full extent (namely, our entire body); but we have draughted 500 at different times, when required.

3051. When was that last done?—I think on the breaking out of the last war. All the men were subject to be impressed; and I have heard that about 4,000 served in the navy and river fencibles.

3052. Do you mean the war after the peace of Amiens?—At the commencement of the French revolution. If a notice is sent to the company to supply so many men we are obliged to do so.

3053. Do you happen to know whether there is any similar regulation to this in the case of any other body of seamen in the country?—I am not aware of it. With the permission of the Commission, I will hand in a statement of the number of freemen and the number of craft employed by the members of the company.

The same was delivered in, and is as follows:—

Number of freemen of the company of watermen and lightermen -	7,786
„ apprentices - - - - - -	1,680
Master lightermen, included in the above number, but being the owners of craft for carrying goods, &c. - - - - -	800
Number of barges, lighters, &c. registered to the above master lightermen	5,007
Number of barges registered to coal merchants and others, for the purpose of carrying their own goods - - - -	1,212

The following statement shows how the above 7,786 freemen are presumed to be engaged at the present time:—

2,500	lightermen, of whom 800 are masters and owners of craft.
1,500	watermen, scullers, &c., and in Customs, Admiralty, Thames police, and harbour service.
500	steamboats, tugs, &c.
800	pilots, and attendants on vessels.
700	fishing boats, yachts, &c.
300	navy and merchant service.
500	out-pensioners, inmates of asylum, and Greenwich Hospital.
1,000	abroad, and not following the occupation, &c.
7,800

Mr. C. Brown.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN, having been sworn, was examined as follows.—

3054. Are you the ruler of the body of fellowship porters?—I am one of them.

3055. How many rulers are there of that body?—The governing power is lodged in the governor, who is at present Lord Mayor, Alderman Sidney, his deputy, twelve rulers, the law clerk, beadle, two corn shifters, salt shifter, and fruit shifters.

3056. What is the number of members of the body?—The number is limited to 3,000, but I suppose at the present time it does not exceed 2,000.

3057. By what rule are the numbers limited to 3,000?—By the act of the common council.

3058. Have there even been more than there are at present?—Yes; they have been as numerous as 2,800.

3059. What has been the cause of the reduction?—The restrictions which have been placed upon them by the corporation.

3060. Is there not as much work for them as there used to be?—I should say, generally, not.

3061. What is the nature of the privilege?—The body of free porters of the fellowship of London, though admitted to be a legal institution, is not a corporation itself, but they claim their rights of labour under prescriptive right from the corporation. They have existed as a body as long back as the time of Edward I., and they were originally established and now exist for the purpose of landing and delivering coal, corn, salt, apples, pears, plums, onions, and other things in their nature measureable, water-borne, brought into the limits of the port of London, that is, from Yantlet Creek eastward to Staines Bridge westward. The fellowship porters claim this species of labour, and their wages have been regulated and fixed from time to time by the Court of Common Council.

3062. Do they exercise their rights under any grants from the Crown?—No; they claim their privileged rights under prescription of the corporation.

3063. How are they admitted into the body?—All the members of the fellowship must be citizens of London, and they make application to the company of the fellowship to be admitted as members of that body.

3064. Can any citizen of London, as a matter of right, insist on being admitted into the company of fellowship porters?—He must go through the ordeal of presenting a petition to the court of rulers, and he must wait his turn.

Mr. C. Brown.

3065. Who is it determines how many there shall be in the body?—That has been settled by an act of council.

3366. Does that act of council settle it once for all, or does it vary?—Previously to 1619 the body was governed by ordinances issued from the Court of Aldermen; but in December 1619 the Court of Common Council passed an act for the better regulation of the company, altered the number from 120 to 200, and from that time to the present they have made various alterations to meet the increasing demands of trade; and the numbers of porters which was last fixed on in 1822 was 3,000. From that period to the present no alteration has been made in the number.

3067. I suppose the amount of business to be done by those fellowship porters varies, does not it?—Very considerably.

3368. Does not the number of fellowship porters vary with the amount of business to be performed by them?—It does.

3069. Did not you say that it had been fixed for a long time at 3,000?—In consequence of a very large portion of the corn labour being taken away by the various dock companies, the men have left the employment, and when there are spurts of work, as is the case at the present moment, we find some little difficulty in getting men to do the labour. It shows the utility of the body to those who employ them, that no longer ago than last week, in consequence of a large importation of potatoes, the principal merchants signed a memorial to the Lord Mayor, requesting him, as governor of the body, to supply them with more porters, for they had themselves employed men who were not freemen, nor under the control of the rulers of the fellowship, but only labourers, waiting about in the locality to which the potatoes come, and the consequence was that five sacks of potatoes were stolen, and in the course of the week that number extended to ten, and the merchants were very desirous that they should be supplied with more porters, or the rulers should bring those actually employed under the jurisdiction of the fellowship.

3070. What steps do you take in protecting those who employ fellowship porters from depredations of that kind?—Each fellowship porter, upon his admission, has to find two sureties, who give a bond in 40*l.* each for his honesty and general good conduct; and in case of dishonesty by a fellowship porter, on complaint being made and proved to the satisfaction of the Court of Rulers at Fellowship Hall, he would be immediately dismissed from the company, and be no longer permitted to work at the employment; or in case of other misconduct, he would be fined, and probably suspended too.

3071. How is the rate of wages regulated?—It is fixed by tariffs made by the corporation; and I should very much like to call the attention of the Commissioners to the remunerating prices which the men receive for their labour, as they have been so frequently misrepresented during this inquiry and at other places. I think, when the subject is fully explained, a great deal of the prejudice to those men as a body will be removed. With respect to corn labour, the fellowship porters receive for working oats 2*d.* a quarter; this 2*d.* is to be divided among as many fellowship porters as may be employed in the job, either seven or eight. That is the only sum they receive, and out of that they have to pay the shift; that is, a sum of money deducted from them for the purpose of paying the counting-house department of the fellowship; and a portion of that goes also towards the governing expenses. When they are doing peas, tares, wheat, and barley, they receive the sum of 2½*d.* per quarter, and whatever other charges may be added and sent in (from any other quarter in a general bill) to those who employ the porters. These are the only amounts of money received by the porters for their labour.

3072. Do you consider that the charge made by the porters is not above the market price of labour?—I should say it was considerably below it. I am satisfied in my own mind, if the porters were removed to-morrow, the corn trade themselves would find great difficulty in getting the work done, in fact they could not get it done at the price the porters are now paid.

3073. If the privilege were removed, the porters themselves would be no losers by the abolition of the privilege?—My private opinion is, that they would get more money than they actually receive now. Porters, under existing circumstances, are frequently compelled to go to jobs which they are out of pocket in consequence of taking.

3074. Is it an unpopular trade? Is there a difficulty in getting members to join your fellowship, or are there many applications to do so?—There are generally many applications.

3375. Do you think if the belief of the porter was that your tariff of prices was below the market price there would be many applications?—There are applications now, but I believe they apply in error, supposing the porters are in the receipt of the prices for labour as fixed by the corporation, and that the whole of the claimed corn labour is done by the porters, which is not the case in either instance; and as a proof that other labouring men will not work for our price, a strike took place yesterday with the men, not fellowship porters, employed in landing oranges. Our men continued work at the prices previously paid to them.

3076. When there is an occasional press of business, so that there are not enough o your men to do the work, do you then raise any objection to others being employed?—We then select freemen, and give them a ticket, appointing them to the backing department of the employment,—but never to the loose corn department,—when to be measured during the press of business.

Mr. C. Brown.

2d December 1853.

3077. Was it some of those freemen who struck?—No; they were not freemen at all.

3078. How did they happen to be employed? Was not their employment illegal?—I do not think it exactly illegal.

3079. They were neither freemen nor members of the fellowship, I understand you, and yet they were employed in the porterage business?—Many men who are neither fellowship porters nor freemen are employed in landing oranges, on occasions.

3080. Is there a distinction between the orange trade and other trades in that respect?—They do say there is a distinction.

3081. Is it a distinction in law or in practice?—Merely in practice.

3082. Is it on account of the perishable nature of the article, and its being important to have it landed at once?—Yes; there is always a provision in respect to perishable articles. I would now proceed to call the attention of the Commissioners to the article of potatoes. These are the corporate charges: "For delivering potatoes and turnips out of one vessel into another, if not carried on the porter's back, 1*d.* per sack." Those sacks weigh a hundred weight and a half. "If carried on shore from the first, second, third, fourth, or fifth vessel, on the tier, to any distance not exceeding ninety yards, whether delivered into carts, waggons, warehouses, or otherwise, 1½*d.* per sack."

3083. Is there any connexion between the fellowship porters and the City meters?—One of the privileges which the fellowship porters claim is that of attending the City bushel in all its engagements, and that is one complaint which the fellowship porters make against the corporation, that they do not enforce the fellowship porters' right with the meters in those various docks. Lord Denman, when Common Serjeant, and Mr. Russell Gurney, were of opinion, on a case submitted to them on the subject, that the corporation act illegally in suffering the meters to go unattended by the porters, for by so doing they remove from the merchants, factors, government, and all persons connected and interested with the corn trade, that protection for correct measurement secured to them when the meters are attended by the fellowship porters, because the porters strike off the superfluous grain from the bushel, and are a responsible body of men, equally bound to do justice as the meters.

3084. What are the occasions on which you conceive the City act illegally in allowing the meters to measure without the attendance of the fellowship porters?—I consider that there is not that responsibility attached to the labourers working within the dock that there is to the fellowship porters. When the porters are working with the meters, the porters are equally bound to see justice done between the parties as the meters.

3085. Are the fellowship porters never employed within the docks?—They have not been for some years.

3086. But the meters are employed?—They are.

3087. And your complaint is that the City do not enforce the privilege of the porters to be employed within the docks?—Yes.

3088. Is there any other case besides that of the docks in which the porters are not employed?—Yes; there have been, of late years, innovations made upon their privileges, by various mill owners on the banks of the river.
